Lessons from the Birds.

BY HENRY BACON.

I THREW open the window this morning, and like the mingling of the breath of a thousand angels with their morning benison, in rushed the warm, sweet south wind, and the voices of a multitude of birds were heard as they flew past on bright, swift wings, as ready to bear up to the throne of glory the responses of human hearts to the spirits of the morning. To me there is nothing more spiritual than the birds. My natural sight is not far reaching, and the hues of my fancy give all the colors and radiance needed to fill up with beauty where I cannot discern the reality. God's tinting I know is better than man's, but the colors woven in the plumage of the bird, ill defined by the near sightedness of my eyes, were not prepared by me. I never was, and can never be wise enough to do such a divine work. God placed the sun in the heavens and in my soul. When the windows of morning are opened and down comes the flooding light, gilding and glorying every form of the outer world, it is but as the turning of the Divine countenance towards our earth. And when from out my soul, as the windows of sense are thrown open, goes the spiritual radiance, crowning with the diadems of angels bird, tree, flower, and cloud, I own the gift of God, and rejoice that he can so condescend to bless unworthy me. It is this light that encompasses with surpassing loveliness many a distant object and makes me eloquent in its praise, while to others—the far, keen and clear sighted, it hath not more than ordinary attractions. And thus I find 'God hath set one thing over against another,' and in a new sense—

'Tis distance lends enchantment to the view.'

I have been moving among the busy, the sick and the bereaved, and I find that the great want in all is that of which our Master thought when he turned the attention of his disciples to consider the birds—the winged spirits that only touch on earth that they may soar higher, or to build and bring forth to fill the blue air with beauty and music. Look at that Oriole, with its golden wings, tipped to my sight with a fringe of light. How lightly he sits upon that slender bough, and with what delicious song is he regaling me! as though he knows I am as happy as he to greet the Spring again. Bless you, sweet bird! you shall not want for food if you will come to my window, from which goes daily food for the birds. If angels take forms of earth, what more beautiful than thine! and to me thou art an angel. Warble again that note, my spirit responds, and a delicious flow of melody runs through my frame, vibrating a thousand nerves, lifting me up to meet yon beautiful cloud as a chariot.

But in my raptures few may sympathize, and I will tie myself down to soberer meditations, and talk of lessons of faith and trust from the birds, in a calm mood—though deep feeling will still run strong, as the bough quivers long after the bird has flown from it, or as the flower flutters long after the zephyr has kissed it.

I have said that Jesus bade his disciples consider the birds. He did so when he sat upon the Mount and taught. Doubtless they were winging their way around him, giving beauty to the beautiful tree while they lighted on it, and springing up from the flowers as if full of joy from their sweets. Happy birds to be gazed on by the pure sight of Jesus! They knew not perhaps the favor, or their little throats would have swelled with a more ambitious song, and they would have courted the clear sunbeam to display their beauties in. But the fact that Jesus looked on the birds and thought of the divine lessons they teach, makes them dearer to me, and wins me more to learn of them. O that I had a portion of his appreciating wisdom, by which the spiritual correspondences of nature were read and felt, and God recognized in all the beautiful, majestic and grand—not less in the dew-drop than in the pendant world. How much greater would be the enjoyment of this universe of types and symbols, could we at all times read their mystic language—give a suggestive power to every material object, so that it might be that of us the poet would sing:

‘Nothing is lost upon him that sees
With an eye that feeling gave;
For him there’s a story in every breeze,
And a picture in every wave.’

When the feeling is truly devotional, laws will not be deified, but the heart fully acknowledge that it is God who ‘maketh the earth soft with showers, and blesseth the springing thereof;’ and nature’s varieties in all their departments are to be made spiritual teachers, carrying the mind up from the visible to the Invisible, and tracing out reasons for, and persuasives to, a more confiding trust and cheerful reliance upon God.

Thus the sacred writers and teachers of old have used nature’s wonders and beauties; they have drawn images and illustrations of spiritual truth from her various kingdoms, and the eye can scarce rest upon any feature in the world around us, that is not associated in the scriptures with a divine lesson. Wherever curiosity or science may lead the traveller, he will find that the holy men of our holy book have been there before him, and if his soul has treasured up their wisdom and counsel, he will greet uprising in the chambers of thought the beautiful images they have drawn from the varied scenes of the outer creation; whether as a Newton he strives to unravel the mysteries of revolving worlds; or as a Buffon or Cuvier he lay open the wonders of the irrational animate creation, or as a Linnæus searching into the beautiful world of the plants and flowers; or as a Lavoisier investigating the make of our earth, penetrating its depths, and by his discoveries in geology and mineralogy, opening new sources of aids to science, and leading on to great benefits to man; or as a Spallanzani revealing a new universe by the magic glasses of the microscope, and showing surpassing skill in the anatomy of the most minute of living things; or with whomsoever he follows out nature, he will find from the mysteries of a dew-drop as well as from the stars in their courses, spiritual voices speaking out wise counsel to his heart. But to search, contemplate, and admire nature without the remembrance that ‘all things are of God,’ is as though we were to choose the hour when the mountain mist is dense and covers the scene around to view the prospect that others at other times have enjoyed; for that veiling mist does not more cloud the beauty of the landscape than does the forgetfulness of God dim the soul to the grandest beauties of the universe.

Our Master did much to lead his disciples to recognize the revelations of God in the outer world—to read his wisdom, his goodness and impartiality in the operations in nature, and to feel that in the grove and on the hill they were in God’s ancient sanctuary, where he was adored

‘Ere man learned
To hew the shaft, and lay the architrave,
And spread the roof above them,—ere he framed
The lofty vault, to gather and roll back
The sound of anthems.’

On a certain occasion, he had been speaking to his disciples of that over-anxiousness which was, and is, so commonly indulged in, wearing the very springs of life, and clouding with the shadows of imaginative fear the brightest visions of joy and hope. He would guard them from this evil habit of mind, as he would by the same truths guard us, and wake up a cheerful reliance on the providence of God, which confidence gives energy to toil, and assures the possessor that he does not labor in vain—that the honest purpose, the steady pursuit of duty, and pious trust in a better wisdom than man’s, will be blessed of Him whose blessing maketh rich, and who addeth no sorrow with it.

This lesson we are to learn from the birds; and as the time of the singing of birds, with all its bloom and beauty and fragrance, is around us, and whose sweet and reviving influences steal in even amid the hum of the busy and crowded city, it is fit that we make the winged tribes of the air speak to us of faith. Faith is our greatest want. It is this want that makes so weak religious principle; that permits policy, fashion, fame, and a thousand other phantoms to lead from unswerving adherence to the right; that weakens the power of the soul to hold to the duty of overcoming evil with good, and deprives affliction of its comforter. Faith has much more lip service than heart devotion from men; and though while around her shrine, admiring her lovely features and seraph form, they acknowledge her power to

And save us from its snares,’—

yet when the world comes with its temptations, its shining baubles, and its syren charms, faith is forgotten and with her heaven; and soon, like Adam, amid a beautiful paradise, guilt makes us fearful to hear the voice of God. In short, it is the want of faith in God and the admirable fitness of his commandments to promote man's highest interest and happiness, that is the secret of all the sin that mars the beauty of the moral creation—that has alienated the soul from God—degraded the affections, and robbed the spirit of its heavenly wings.

Much do we need a stronger, ever-present faith, as an active principle in the soul, fixing the affections on God and heaven, and sanctifying to a good end all that we love or desire, so that we may enjoy true liberty—the freedom of holiness. It was such a faith that gave our Master victory over the world—that gave him omnipotent power of resistance against all the antagonists of goodness, and made him harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners. He was tempted in all points as we are—he was assailed by as fierce tempters as we have ever met or shall ever meet—and as keen shafts were thrown against his virtue as will ever be thrown, but the shield of faith resisted them all, and they fell at his feet, as the like may fall at our feet, blunted and broken. Hence almost his first lessons were of this virtue—faith; for he knew, as we may know, that the soul that has a right and ever living faith may go, like Shadrach, Meshack, and Abednego, unharmed through any fiery furnace prepared by any of the enemies of their religious trust and their virtue.

But how would he have us learn the lesson of faith from the birds of the air? How would he have us behold their beauty, hear their melody, and mark their flight, to a spiritual end? We answer, by considering the economy of God's government over them—the provisions he has made for their sustenance, the unerring instinct he has given them, their adaptedness to the climes they inhabit, and their migrations; and when these have been considered aright, we are to learn that God has even more bountifully provided for us, as he is our heavenly Father. 'Are ye not much better than they?'

Let us then in thought behold the birds of the air, and consider—

The abundance and variety of food and material provided for them. The air teems with insects, and mountain and vale, field and garden, yield them abundant supplies; and as the farmer upturns the earth in readiness for the seed, he opens rich stores of food for the birds, which their keen eyes can readily discern. From tree and plant and flower are imparted fruits for their use. The breeze shakes the shrub and bush and tree, and passing through the fields of grain, bears to the crevices of the rocks and furrows of the hill the precious morsels, and God teacheth the birds to know where to find them. Wonderful is the variety of their food, from the wild products of forest and wood, from the cultivated field, and the rich stored garden. And art with all its aids cannot out-rival the beauty and finish of their cradles for the young in the tree, or the hill, or by the habitations of men; and never did a tender mother smooth with more care the bed for her sick and wearied child, than they exercise to prepare the place for their own, as if conscious it were only for the tenderest age. Far off they will travel for the soft down; unwearied, fragment after fragment bring, and will even yield the plumage of their own breasts rather than be without the desired finish. They are around us now, busy in their work. I love to watch them and learn perseverance. How dares that Oriole go out to the tip end of that drooping elm-branch and tie there the twigs together for a nest! Some farmer's graft has lost a string, but he can learn enough to pay for it—if he will, as he sees the patient bird weave round the frame-twigs the covering, gathered wherever the material could be found. Far down in this swinging pouch rests securely the soft cradle; the winds cannot harm it, and the rain and the sun are kept off by the shading arbor of leaves above it. What a reproach to many a neglecter of home! The birds work more carefully and diligently to construct a cradle, than they do to prepare a life-long home! And many who expose themselves to great evils by the love of display—'the pride of the eye,' might learn a lesson from the birds, as they see the females in the nest of a color the least likely to attract attention; as, for instance the female of the brilliant Scarlet Tanager is of a yellowish green, which would not be noticed among the leaves.

How wonderful is the change effected for them! Mild, soft airs have taken the place of the rude and boisterous winds; the naked branches of tree, bush, shrub and vine, are covered with verdure; the earth is unlocked from its prison bands; the fields are teeming with fruits; and more innumerable than the stars on every side, are insects within reach; and though the birds sow not, nor reap, nor gather into barns, yet our heavenly Father abundantly provideth for them; and the chorus that rises from field and wood, from the hill and by the way-side, seems the tribute of praise to that beneficent Power that openeth storehouses of bounty for the humblest of his creation.

Consider their discernment in the choice of their food. Amid the vast variety each knows its own, adapted to its organization and sphere. While one dips beneath the surface of the sea, another searches in the folds of a flower; one flies to the lone and far off wood, another lingers around the homestead; and while one soars in the air, another penetrates the furrows of the earth; all find that which they seek as instinct guides them. And they are as wisely organized, to receive and digest the food chosen; and their conformation is as beautifully adapted to their habits of life, and the exertion needed to obtain their food. One must receive it from the shells on the sea shore, and his hatchet beak readily opens the way, or he bears it up till a fall on the rock is sure to break it, as doth the raven and the gull; another must sail over the water, and he has contracting and expanding oars for the purpose; another stalks on stilts through the lowlands, and an exquisitely delicate nerve in its beak enables it to discern its prey; while others from the lofty height can look far down in the water and watch the fish till the sure plunge can be made. One must peck, another plunge, another spoon, another carve, another cut, and so through a vast variety, and all are suited to the end needed. The storm and the calm, the land and the sea, the hill and the vale, the forest and the field, the morn and the night, the lonely cottage and the crowded village, the town and the city, have all their peculiar birds, all formed to enjoy their particular spheres of life, and float as forms of beauty in the air!

From this variety proceeds the variety of their songs or music, and their various and often beautiful movements; for while the dwellers near the roaring waters or heaving waves rise above the thunder and the crash by their scream, the warblers of the peaceful grove sing strains of sweetness and softness, and their shrillest notes are unlike the sharp and piercing cries of the deep forest and the mountain birds; and even on the frozen coasts of Iceland the sweet lyre-notes of the flying swans are heard, betokening the return of the short vernal season.

Our country is rich in its bird melody. 'The clear piping of the baltimore, and the canary-like whistle of the goldfinch, are as pleasing to the ear, as their fine colors to the eye; the glowing red-bird is not more distinguished by the splendor of his dress, than the wealth and fullness of his song. The brown thrasher excites the delighted surprise of all who hear him; and nothing perhaps exceeds the delicious note of the warbling vireo and the red-eye, whether heard over the rattling streets of the city, or from the quiet elm that overhangs the cottage door. Every one enjoys the song of the blue-bird and the robin—in part, perhaps, because they come as heralds of the spring.' God would not have made the earth so rich in song, did he not delight in joy and desired the happiness of man.

But most mysterious of all is their migrations, according to the wise law that has appointed to every climate its own birds. The bleak winds, and the departing freshness of summer, warn them to seek another home beneath milder skies; and unaided, save by their mysterious instinct, they sail league upon league through the air, over deserts and oceans; and when the cold winds as they whistle through the disrobed trees of our forest make the only airy music, they are making vocal sunny groves and lovely vineyards. 'The stork in the heaven knoweth her appointed times; and the turtle and the crane, and the swallow observe the time of their coming.'

The birds of France have been seen spending their winter in the isles of Greece, Syria and Egypt, and just when their favorite fruits are ripening; others light upon the isles of the Levant, at the very epoch when the swarming insects begin to threaten the harvest; and others come not in harvest time, but divine, with wonderful accuracy, the season of casting seed into the earth; and even in our own country, the invalid who from the remote north seeks, as winter approaches, to dwell in a milder air at the south, finds that the robin and oriole of his native bowers have gone before him; but their notes are like the breathings of his own heart, the notes of a stranger, for they sing their sweetest songs only in the regions where they reared their young; and when the robin in the succeeding year sings its own welcome to its native bowers, and the oriole gladly returns to build again its nest on the hanging branches of the elm, do they not well betoken the joy of the restored to his home, the sinner to the paths of righteousness, the soul to heaven?

And is there not in all this good lessons of faith and trust for us? something to quicken our confidence in our Maker, that will lead to cheerful obedience to duty? He who taught them to fly from region to region, fearless to cross the desert and the ocean, and find in all their wanderings the sustenance needed, does by them teach us to trust and faint not; and if, says the wise lesson, your heavenly Father feedeth them, will he not care for you? will he more abundantly provide for his fowls, than his offspring? Why should ye doubt his care? Are ye not much better than they?

Better than they! As much better as the difference between a father and mere creator; as much better as the image of God is better than any likeness of beast or bird; as much better as the reasoning, reflecting and directing intellect is better than animal instinct; as much better as the spirit that goeth upward is better than the spirit that goeth downward; as much better as the child upon the bosom is better than the bird upon the tree; yea, as much better as a glorious immortality and blessed re-union with the loved is better than gloomy, withering annihilation.

And we should feel and cherish this, that the dark shades of despair may be kept from the soul; that we may trust to the guidance of his wisdom who leads the bird along the pathless coast and through the illimitable air to the home desired; and that we may believe, that when he shall bring our souls through the 'path which no fowl knoweth,' to the everlasting habitation of the spirit-land, he will be there as here, through eternity as in time, our Benefactor and Friend.

With this trust, we should be grateful when prosperity is pouring in its treasures, and not poison the present joys by undue fears of reverses; then the beauty of the serene to-day, would not be forgotten in dread of a storm to-morrow; and when the amiable and intelligent child is sporting round our form, we should not lose the enjoyment of its presence and its happiness by the tremblings of a superstitious fear that it is too good to live on earth—that its superior, uncommon amiability and intelligence are sure tokens of an early death. How much present enjoyment is lost, lessened, or embittered, by these shadows of the imagination; and all, or in great part, resulting from not connecting religion with our happiest hours, and making it a companion only suited to the chamber of gloom, or the afflicted and bereaved; whereas it should be our second self, to sanctify our enjoyments, and make us enjoy the present comforts and pleasures without prodigal excess, or embittered by irrational fears; remembering that God is well pleased when thus his children seek to gratefully enjoy his blessings.

We have many lessons of faith around our daily paths, many incentives to lead us to trust in God, to love mercy, and walk in honesty with all men. Faith should be made more a sentiment of the heart, and not be permitted to dwell only with the intellect, for we need it to cause us to feel right and act right; and discerning God as our common Father and heaven our final destiny, to exercise brotherly kindness towards all men, and gratitude towards God.

I cannot better close this article than by the use of the beautiful and well known poem on the carrier dove, as it gives a rich lesson from one of the birds of the air:—

'The bird let loose in eastern skies
When hastening fondly home,
Ne'er stoops to earth her wing, nor flies
Where idle warblers roam;
But high she shoots through air and light,
Above all low delay,
Where nothing earthly bounds her flight,
Or shadow dims her way.

So grant me, God, from every stain
Of sinful passion free,
Aloft through virtue's purer air,
To hold my course to Thee!
No sin to cloud, no lure to stay,
My soul, as home she springs,
Thy sunshine on her joyful way,
Thy freedom in her wings.'

Rose and Caro.

'TWAS a Sabbath eve, and a summer scene;
The sunset streamed o'er the darkling green,
And the woodlark's notes, from the bending spray,
Had softened, and faltered, and died away.

The cardinal-flower by the murmuring brook,
Had drawn from the wave its last fond look,
And hung its head 'neath its soft green wing,
To sleep in peace till the bright day-spring.

A stream went stealing along the glen,
And a song was heard from the sleepy wren;
But other than these, no sounds broke forth
From the lonely haunts of the quiet earth.

Two fair young girls, in the spring of youth,
With eyes of beauty and lips of truth,
On a bank where the fragrant wild-mint grows,
Had set them down at the sunset's close.

While the dew was filling the moss-cup's brim,
Their voices were raised in a soft low hymn;
And the moon her radiant beams threw down
To gild their brows with a silvery crown.

Deep love was theirs; it had grown in light
Since the days when they searched o'er the woodland height,
For the fox-glove bells, and the purple star
That dwells alone in the wilds afar.

Oh! sweet were the days when their gay young feet
Sought out the bee in his dim retreat,
And tracked the path of the vagrant hare
O'er the gray old rocks to its hidden lair.

But sweeter now were the days of love
When their hearts from the earth had turned above,
When soul with soul was in converse blent,
And their days in beautiful thought were spent.

The eldest had circled the fairy form
Of the fair young Rose with her gentle arm,
While the beautiful girl reposed her there,
And breathed for Caro a low-voiced prayer.

* * * * *

The scene is changed; 'tis a winter's night;
The sky is flushed with a polar light;
The stars gleam bright in the far blue sky,
And the winds through the leafless branches sigh.

On her childhood's bed young Caro lies;
But sleep hath fled from her violet eyes;
The rosy hue, like the blush of morn,
From the dimpled swell of her cheek is gone.

Rose kneels in tears; and a cloud comes o'er
The eyes that ne'er looked sad before;
Her heart like a flower in the cold spring storm
Is breaking o'er Caro's wasted form.

'My gentle friend,' speaks the dying girl,
Smoothing from Rose's brow a curl,
'Thou must weep no more; I am richly blest,
For this weary spirit hath won its rest.

I go, ere the light of the rosy morn
On the snowy brows of the hills shall dawn,
To the holy sleep which the grave can give—
For sweeter, my love, than here to live.

And thou, sweet Rose, by my grave shall tread,
And plant bright flowers on my peaceful bed,
While I will hover on wings of love
Thy gentle duties and toils above.

And thou shalt come to that same sweet rest
I shall there in thine own pure love be blest;
A home shall be ours in that glorious world
"Where the flag of beauty is never furled!"

Her murmuring voice grew faint and broken;
She gave one kiss for a dying token;
Her mild eye closed, and her smile congealed
On the pale cold lips where the thought was sealed.

She drooped like a rose with its leaves all bright,
When the wind comes chill o'er its form at night.
How beautiful thus from the world to part,
With a trusting faith and a pure young heart!

* * * * *

Another scene o'er the earth was spread;—
The eastern sky grew intensely red;
The lark on his air-filled wing uprose
And gilded his crest where the day-beam glows.

The bee for his burden of sweets had come
To the roses that clustered o'er Caro's tomb;

And the butterfly, leaving its chrysalis shell,
Came down 'mid the violets there to dwell.

On the grassy turf of that lowly bed
They heard the sound of a gentle tread;
And the violet there, in its bright blue bell
From a rival eye caught the tear that fell.

Young Rose had come with her morning prayer,—
—A holy altar to kneel at there!
She had come in her perishing frame once more,
But the roseate bloom of her life was o'er.

Yet brightness was still in her pale young face,
And sorrow had left not the faintest trace;
But the spirit of life from her gentle frame
Had wasted away in a soul-lit flame.

The wind in passing had caught her prayer,
And spread it abroad on the morning air;
As it trembled and thrilled in the weeping flowers,
They shook o'er her forehead baptismal showers.

A smile of peace on her delicate cheeks
Dimples in beauty the while she speaks;
'Caro, I come! I have yearned for thee long—Meet me, sweet angel, with beauty and song!'

* * * * *

By the side of Caro a grave is made—
There Rose in her beauty and youth was laid.
Not a year hath passed since their hearts were riven—
But twin-born of God they are joined in heaven!

What Christianity has done for Woman.

BY REV. ELBRIDGE G. BROOKS.

CHRISTIANITY, in the progress and development of its power, has done much for the world and for man. It has ameliorated the laws. It has bidden forth a new spirit to preside in the minds and hearts of men, the influences of which are to be seen in all his relations and concerns. But in all the changes which our religion, in the diffusion of its influences, has wrought, none strikes me as more remarkable than that which it has accomplished in woman's behalf—in all her circumstances and relations. The full extent and greatness of the work which has thus been done for her, is, I fear, but too little realized by woman generally. In the estimate which she makes of its general effects, and great as she knows the work it has done for man to be, she feels not how much greater even, is that which it has accomplished for her.

But let the questions be asked,—What was woman before christianity came? What was her condition, and how was she regarded? What now is her condition and the estimation in which she is held, where the mild and holy spirit of Christ's religion has not been breathed out and diffused? And what, on the other hand, is her condition where that spirit has been diffused—where the power of that religion has been exerted and its influences felt? Let these questions be asked and answered, I say, and how great is the contrast presented to us, and how mighty is that work which christianity has done for woman demonstrated to be! In the former case, we see her degraded, trampled upon, despised; in many instances, looked upon as a soulless creature, given only to serve man's interest and man's pleasure, and everywhere treated as a slave and the lowest menial. Indeed, it would be hard, if not impossible, to picture forth all of woman's degradation, and all the woe and misery of her condition without christianity. Much is now being said relative to the condition of slaves at the south. And that condition doubtless is a most wretched one, calculated to excite the deep commiseration and sympathy of every philanthropist and lover of human happiness. Down trodden, abused, trampled upon as they and their dearest rights too generally are, it may well be said that a living death is theirs. But to the condition of those slaves, I would that I could direct the attention of every woman in this and every christian land, as a fitting picture of what was the condition of their sex ere Jesus came, and what still is their condition in most countries where the influences of his religion have not come. Let not those to whom the name of woman belongs, startle at this. It is true. Without christianity woman was, and generally is, a slave, and a slave as degraded and down trodden as are those in our own land. They are fed and clothed; so is woman. They are looked upon as fit only to abide their master's bidding and to subserve his pleasure; so was woman. They are bought and sold; so was woman. And as it sometimes happened that some of them are privileged with the confidence and indulgence of their owners, so it was with woman, she sometimes secured the favor and indulgence of her husband or those whom she served.

But look now on the opposite side. What is woman with christianity, and where its power has been exerted? She is no longer down trodden and trampled upon, degraded and despised, the mere creature of man's caprices and the slave of his will. She has become his equal, ranked and considered so; and from the dust at his feet as a slave, she has been raised to his bosom and cherished as his dearest companion, friend, and counsellor. Man now sues to her for her smile and her love. And instead of being looked upon as without a soul, she is regarded as the best and gentlest of God's creatures, with a mind to think and a heart to feel, and is thus acknowledged to have possessions, as well as man, in moral and intellectual strength, possessions that rival his in capability and extent. Her duties, too, are now recognized as equally necessary and equally important as those which man has to perform. In fact, the whole condition and complexion of things is changed in relation to her; the chains with which she was once, both physically and intellectually bound, have been stricken off, and now, in every sense in which she ought to be, she is free.

And now, what has effected this great and mighty change in woman's condition? What is that power which has thus gone forth, raising her up from her degradation, freeing her from her thralldom, and thus advancing her to an equality and companionship with man? Jesus of Nazareth first stood forth as her great champion and friend, and the answer must be, therefore, it is his religion which has accomplished this great work. Christianity has redeemed her from her slavery, built her schools and seminaries, and placed her upon man's bosom. Christianity has made man feel the dignity of her true character, taught him to respect and esteem her, and to regard her not as his slave, but as a companion and friend of whom he may well be proud. Christianity alone has done this. Else, why are not these effects produced and witnessed where Jesus is not acknowledged, and where our religion has not been? Why in such places, is woman still degraded and denied her proper station and influence? These questions cannot be answered. The conclusion, therefore, is pressed upon us, that all that has been done for the elevation of woman is the consequence of the operation of the principles of christianity. 'All the moral and intellectual and social advantages that females enjoy in christian lands above the members of the same sex in savage and ignorant nations, have been procured solely through the ameliorating and heavenly influences of the gospel of Jesus Christ.'

How much, then, does woman owe to christianity? Indeed, what does she not owe to it? Of all that is dear and precious to her in the relations which she sustains in life, what is there that it has not given her? All the joys of home—all the delights of social intercourse—all her opportunities for improvement—all, indeed, without which existence itself is poor, has it bestowed upon her.

How strong, how especially strong, then, are its claims upon her for friendship, love, support! 'When she ceases to love Jesus, she neglects her greatest friend. When she proves recreant to his religion, she forsakes her guardian angel, by whose arm she has been elevated to her station as an equal in society with intellectual man, and by which she is still upheld.' When she puts forth a sacrilegious hand to lay hold upon and pull down its altars, she would destroy the mightiest bulwark of her safety and defence. God forbid, then, that she should be thus regardless of her best interests. But as she prizes her present privileges—as she would not give up her high mission as man's friend and companion and equal, to be his menial and slave, let her, whatever man may do—however much he may scoff and ridicule and oppose, oh, let her not trample on the bleeding Jesus, her friend, but let her choose the good part of Mary, and delight to learn of his truth, to prize his precepts, striving ever to bring home and apply their holy and sacred power to her heart.

The Rose Bud.

A SKETCH OF SYMPATHY.

God gave us a rose-bud, and our joy was great. Its opening breathed out the sweetest fragrance, like the breaking of the alabaster box at the Lord's anointing, when 'the odor filled the whole house.' We tended it carefully, for we knew its frailty—that one rude breath were enough to scatter it to fragments. We bore it out to the sun only when the air was mild and the wind was still, and watched it every moment to withdraw it when the harsh change should come. The dew was too cold for it and the rain too heavy, and we moistened it as best we could. O it did bloom sweetly! never one more so. Many a one not ambitious to be styled a lover of flowers, tarried to smile on it and inhale its sweetness, feeling new life was inspired as they drank its rich breath; and many a harsh feature was softened by sympathy with its loveliness. The aged gazed on it with solemn look, and whispered one with another of the most beautiful fading earliest, but we interpreted it not. The little children ran in at early morn to behold it, and their eyes would sparkle with delight, and their cheeks seem to borrow roseate hues from our rose-bud, but the bud lost none of its richness. It was beautiful on the bosom as oft it lay there, and beautiful when laid softly and tenderly on the downy bed. We thought not of its fading—its smile charmed away every thought not kindred to its own beauty.

One morning our rose-bud lay with drooped eyelids and parched lips, and our hearts were sad. We raised it, bathed it tenderly, and took it to the sun, but it drooped the more, and we shaded it. It revived, and was lovely as ever. We wore it on our breast to the sanctuary, and the holy man at the altar smiled upon it and blessed it, and talked sweetly of its being a heavenly flower, to be trained for God. We kept his words in our hearts, and loved our rose-bud with a better love. At evening it drooped again, and as the golden flowers of heaven blossomed in the blue fields above, it began to fold closer its leaves and quiver. We strove to warm it, but still its leaves trembled and wore a strange glow. It could not lie still, though not a breath stirred round it. We turned away and wept. We looked again—it was pale and still quivering, and then came the thought that a worm had nestled itself close to its heart, and that our rose-bud must die. O what a thought! How could we bear to see it die—to miss its presence—to greet no more its sweetness! But the flowers must perish, though human beings weep—weep showers of tears. Yet those tears wash away the film of earthliness from the spiritual vision, so that the spirit sees farther into the paradise of God—catching glimpses of the forms that went out from our homes to be glorified. The joy of meeting us will dissipate the only shadow that lingers on the immortal brow.

Weeping could not save our rose-bud, and it died. We laid it down in its holy beauty and wept bitterly as we cast the last look on its meek aspect. It is holy ground where the perished lies. We love to visit it alone when the meek stars look out in sympathy, and we are shut in upon our own thoughts—so still that we hear the ticking of the village clock chiming with the beating of our own hearts. What a bright world pleasant memories can make! At the spirit's bidding, the air is filled with beautiful forms, and the very atmosphere is poetry. We talk with the lovely images, and they answer us with tones as soft and pleasant as the healthy breathing of a babe—the out-rushing of the fragrance of our rose-bud. The passing traveler hums the careless tune, or whistles to the silence, but it is but the creaking of the door when a friend enters—we heed it not. We are alive only to heaven—dead and buried to earth. And when the dew and the night-winds make us chill, and force us to remember we are not yet unclothed from mortality, we go home in cheerful company—with spirits of heaven; and as they vanish one by one, they disappear with smiles, and the last—loveliest of all—bears on his breast our own rose-bud, beautiful as in its early freshness. We reach for it—but a whisper is all we gain, as the angel is lost in the mist, which is gilded by his parting smile—‘You shall have it in heaven.’ We trust it will be so. God grant it. He is a Father, and we will not doubt. Doubt is too dark a tomb to live in. God pity the souls that dwell in such. Their rose-buds are all earthly, never symbols of heaven, and thought never leads them up to the Mount of Transfiguration! Our rose-bud is on the breast of Jesus there.

Death.

BY MISS M. A. DODD.

To the Memory of Mrs. Harriet A. Porter.

THOU sleepest!—and so very still thou art,
Thus in that deep, unbroken slumber lying;
I watch to see the beating of thy heart,
Or some emotion o’er thy features flying;
Sad ones are gathered round thee, wildly weeping—
Why shed they tears for one so calmly sleeping?

How fixed, how statue-like thy resting seems!
I hear no sigh forth from thy bosom stealing,
Such as is often linked with troubled dreams,
The weary heart’s unquiet state revealing;
That placid look unto my thoughts replying,
Says, thou art ever freed from pain and sighing.

How beautiful! the soft and glossy hair
A portion of that pure, high forehead shading;
The still, wan lips; the cheek so cold and fair,
Like a white rose upon a snow-wreath fading;
The marble lid over the dark eye closing,
And the long lash on the pale cheek reposing.

Can this be Death? Comes he in such sweet guise,
The cherished idol from our bosom taking?
Has his cold hand sealed up those gentle eyes
In the calm sleep which knows no earthly waking?
Deceitful Death, thus to the fond gaze leaving
The casket fair, while of the gem bereaving.

Yes this is death! to the dark, silent tomb,
In all thy loveliness thou wilt be taken;
Spring’s balmy gales, and summer’s wealth of bloom,
To life and health can thee no more awaken;
How little dreamed we of so soon beholding,
The coffin and the shroud thy form enfolding.

VOL. X.

Rest thee in peace!—Thou hast been called to meet
The babe who went a little while before thee;
Soon will its loving eyes thy coming greet, —
Its seraph wings e’en now are hovering o’er thee.
Thanks be to God! there is a hope remaining,
The mourner’s heart in this sad hour sustaining.

Hope in a Savior, who with dying breath,
To the tried soul hath a sure promise given,
That all who triumph over sin and death,
Shall walk in white with the redeemed in heaven;
And every heart his blessed words receiving,
Shall find sweet peace and comfort in believing.

New England.

‘LAND of the forest and the rock,
Of dark blue lake and mighty river—
Of mountains reared aloft to mock
The storm’s career and lightning’s shock,
My own green land forever.’ WHITTIER.

THESE breathings of a lofty spirit are from a son of New England; they are the beautifully majestic and stirring expressions of one, who can, although once nursed and nurtured under the roof of a retired and humble Quaker, enclosed within the hills of an unnoted parish, fully conceive how great is the glory of his home—the land of the pilgrims, and can comprehend the worth of his own country, compared with all others on the globe. It is true, he does not speak of scenes like those we might view in the eastern world,—the splendid palaces and beautiful gardens on the banks of the Seine and Rhone; the cultivated vineyards and sunny plains of France; he does not speak of the magnificent dwellings of royalty on the Thames; nor of the stately remains of ancient castles, the fine country seats of envied lords, and their villages, here and there, with Gothic spires and spacious domes; nor of the extensive parks, the green hills, fertile vales and hawthorn hedges of Old England; nor does he speak, directly, of the noble minds, the independent intellects, and the free and affectionate hearts of this land of the West;—he speaks of the land itself—he alludes to its old forests, its huge rocks, its great and enclosed waters, and its rushing and unchained rivers, and those towering and everlasting hills and mountains which withstand the powers of the elements of nature. He alludes to all these separately, then joins them all in one, and terms it his ‘own green land,’ with deep and affectionate feeling. He makes one think that he prizes New England infinitely above all that lies beyond the ocean, though European towns, cities and villages have been polished, and European scenery has been made beautiful by science and art. He makes one feel that he loves the land of his fathers, far more than all other lands, though it is yet uncouth, and has still, in many of its parts, the appearance of wildness.

But what has induced him to express so much affection for the ground on which he treads—for the lakes, streams, mountains, woods and rocks, which he calls his own? What, but the spirit of the noble dead, which still lives near him—the spirit which is within him and all his countrymen—the Spirit of God which rests on the land and makes it sacred? Let one consider that they who crossed the heaving billows to make this country their home, breathed the spirit of liberty; that, ere they went down to their graves, they breathed it into their children, and that thus it has been transmitted to our day; let him consider that every New Englander—every one worthy of the name—is controlled by the spirit which directed the wise and good who have lived before him,—that each one is bound to all, under the widely spread wings of the eagle of liberty, with cords so strong that they cannot be easily broken; and let him also consider that in our land the holy influence and divine operations of the Almighty are most evidently perceived, and he will not ask what induces an intelligent and feeling man to love it, and deem it hallowed ground—he will not desire to know what induced our poet to speak so warmly and enthusiastically of external or natural things, which lie within certain and well known boundaries.

New England, though once an uncultivated wild, and the home of the savage, is now the birth place of wise and good men—of thousands whose intelligent minds exert a powerful influence in the cause of virtue and peace. Upon her shores have risen cities and villages, wherein dwell the industrious, the pure hearted and true—the friends of education, of science, art and trade. Upon the banks of her rapid and winding rivers, may be found clusters of the dwellings of her sons, with minds like those already described, and upon many of her hills, and within many of her vales, are the schools of knowledge and wisdom, and the temples of God and liberty. Within her precincts yet live some of our fathers, whose stern, yet pleasant visages, are furrowed and wrinkled, and whose heads are wearing hoary and venerable crowns. They led us from our cradles with kind and protecting hands, have cautiously taught us the words of wisdom and duty, and have left us to act for ourselves—to make their life's descending road easy and peaceful, and to continue, as they did, to make our land good, great and honorable, and to be the friends of all who mourn, and fly to us for relief from despotic climes. Within her precincts, too, live some of our mothers, who still have affectionate and virtuous hearts, who still love us and are true. They were the pure and watchful guardians of our infancy, the beautiful forms, whose spirits, under the control of love, sought skilfully, and in a degree effectually, I trust, to mould our minds after the similitude of true strength and heaven born virtue. New England is thus blessed—is thus filled with what we prize with commendable pride and esteem; with the works of nature and art; and with the busy forms of intelligence; and it is the spirit which pervades all—which is breathed by the mass—the spirit which came from those who have gone to a better country than this—the spirit of love and liberty, which came from God, and not the forms of nature, art and intelligence themselves, which causes our hearts to love them. We love our country itself—its hills, woods, waters and all things natural connected with it, not solely because of itself, but because of what is in it, unseen by the natural eye. We love it because of its soul—the great and good spirit which presides in it. Do we not, then, fully account for the poet's alluding to material things, and manifesting affection for the land he lives and walks on? Though he does not directly speak, as before remarked, of the noble minds, the independent intellects, and the free and affectionate hearts of New England, his words are not without strong and deep meaning. He speaks of them nevertheless; and I would to heaven that every one, dwelling within the borders of our favored country, and claiming it as his birth place, could manifest feelings as deep and strong, as fond and true.

I very much admire the manner in which Whittier expresses his fondness for, and his feeling of everlasting attachment to, his native land. The following lines, addressed to it, and which should be read in connection with those already remarked upon, breathe the very spirit of manliness, true and noble love, and pure and lofty ambition.

'Land of my fathers! If my name,
Now humble and unknown to fame,
Hereafter burn upon the lip,
As one of those which may not die,
Linked in eternal fellowship
With visions pure, and strong and high;

If the wild dreams, which quicken now
The throbbing pulse of heart and brow,
Hereafter take a real form,
Like spectres changed to beings warm,
And over temples, wan and gray,
The star-like crown of glory shine!
Thine be the bard's undying lay,
The murmur of his praise be thine.'

To go farther in reference to our poet, I would say I admire the manner in which he speaks of the character of New England. How well does he seem to know her character—how much confidence does he seem to have in her virtue and moral courage, while we read the following spirited lines.

' Shall our New England stand erect no longer,
But stoop in chains upon her downward way,
Thicker to gather on her limbs and stronger,
Day after day ?

Oh, no ; methinks from all her wild, green mountains :
From valleys where her slumbering fathers lie—
From her blue rivers and her welling fountains,
And clear, cold sky ;—

From her rough coast, and isles, which hungry ocean
Gnaws with his surges—from the fisher's skiff,
With white sail swaying to the billows' motion
Round rock and cliff ;—

From the free fireside of her unbought farmer—
From her free laborer at his loom and wheel—
From the brown smith-shop, where, beneath the hammer,
Rings the red steel ;

From each and all, if God hath not forsaken
Our land, and left us to an evil choice,
Loud as the summer thunderbolt shall waken
A PEOPLE'S VOICE !'

Such a knowledge of the character of New England, and such a confidence in her virtue and moral courage, I would have all possess, who live among her hills and by her streams. I cannot have any sympathy for the feelings of those few, in our midst, who are ever prophesying that our country will fall ; that, ere long, our free institutions will be thrown down, and the republicanism of our land become extinct. It is extremely unpleasant to the ears of true patriotism, to hear the whinings of the inconsiderate and faithless among us ; but the expressions of confidence—of true and bold and fearless hearts, impart cheerfulness and courage to all, and give them the consciousness, that eternally,

' From our green mountains to the sea,
One voice shall thunder—WE ARE FREE !'

But I would not be misunderstood. I would have none imagine that I think there are no evils for the people of New England to fear. There are evils—great and threatening evils—already among us. Of one or two of these it may be well for me to speak.

And first I would speak of that spirit of selfishness, possessed by some among us, which we, of the North should not, as citizens of the United States, foster and nourish. There are some with whom we meet, whose minds are so small and weak, that they have not even respect for many parts of our common country. They were born, and have been bred on New England soil, and notwithstanding this refuse, while admiring and lauding their native land, to acknowledge that there are cords which bind their hearts to the West and South. It is a littleness and a weakness, unbecoming to New Englanders, to conceive that a wall so high as from earth to heaven, should stand between our rugged territories and the homes of our brethren. Do I love the green and white hills of the North ? so do I the Alleghany and the Ozark of the South. Do I speak with pride of the Connecticut and Merrimack ? so do I of the Mississippi, the Potomac, and Rappahannock. Do I honor the graves of Charlestown and Lexington ? so do I those of Eutaw and York Town. Do I remember the puritanic Pilgrims, who came here for freedom to worship God ? so do I those Catholics, who, under the direction of Cecil Baltimore, sought the same liberty ; and those, who, under the direction of Sir Walter Raleigh, took up their abode in the South. Do I venerate the names of Warren, Hancock, and Adams ? so do I those of Washington, Jefferson, and Munroe. And can I now speak of our own worthies—our own great and good men, yet living ? so can I of those who dwell towards the setting of the sun, and those among the orange groves of the warmer clime. These are my feelings, and I would they were the feelings of all. I am happy to believe that there is less of the spirit to which I have alluded, among the generality of the people of New England, than may be among those of other parts of our country—(the warm expressions of many, and the disposition of not a few to leave their homes of plenty and happiness, and settle in the howling and uncultivated wilds of the West, and in the cities on the Carolinian coast, near the Gulf of Mexico, and on the banks of the Ohio, Missouri, and Mississippi, are things which make me believe this ;) yet, there is enough of that spirit among us, to make us fear ; and we may well pray that it shall cease to exist, so that another spirit may predominate, which will create peace and good feeling, all through the land, bless the whole country—under that great Constitution, drawn up by the wisest and best of our fathers,—though now, the interests of all, are not well understood—though now, different views are strenuously advocated, and different plans of policy formed.

Another evil existing in New England, as well as in all other parts of our land, against which, it may be well for me to speak, is this: The disposition to adopt monarchical customs, and anti-republican fashions, which evidently cause one man to refuse to enjoy social intercourse with his brother, and build those barriers between men, which would make useless the channels wherein the goodness of benevolence and friendship flow to benefit.

It cannot be denied, that many, in our land, have been peculiarly charmed with the pomp and show of high life in Europe. We are all more or less influenced by the fashions on the outer side of the Atlantic. It would be better not to be influenced by Europeans at all, if we cannot avoid their evils. Perhaps it is not enough realized how their evils destroy republican simplicity. Perhaps it is not enough considered how the customs of those who breathe the spirit of social exclusiveness, are calculated to drive that spirit of respect and love, which should exist between and among all classes, away so far, as to be unrecoverable. Perhaps the love of doing, as a multitude do, whether their actions are right or wrong, prevails so much, that very few think of the evils which would be produced, if the American people should not preserve and maintain independence enough, to have ways of their own, and have a love of obeying the laws of the Most High, rather than a desire to please the crowned heads of the 'kingdoms of this world,' and the costly attired nobles of royalty. But so surely as republican simplicity is given up for vanity—so surely as good which exists in each for the whole, is given up for exclusive feelings, so surely will depart all that makes our land better than every other—the freest land under heaven.

Where republican simplicity, where true liberty, or the spirit of christianity is breathing, it is really pleasing to roam, and view the pictures of happiness on our every side. Where this spirit prevails, we can behold the splendid mansion and the humble cottage; we can see one pull down his barns and build greater, while another leaves a valuable situation for a less lucrative one; and notice every one of the various appearances in society, and be conscious that God approvingly smiles upon the actions of all. We feel that both the employer and the employed, are blessed. But, show us those who are influenced by what reigns where the palace and the hovel, the coach and the beggar, the lord and the serf, the gentry and liveried servants, are seen, side by side, and we may be sure that, if they live in a land of liberty and equal rights, they are tarnishing the glory of the ground on which they tread—are freezing up those warm streams which flow from soul to soul, and rearing walls which will prevent the spreading abroad of all that is social, lovely and pure.

I would have the citizens of our land—especially the 'sons and daughters of the Pilgrims'—persuaded of the truth of these things; for, should they be so persuaded, the wrong would no more endanger, and the right would reign to bless;—the hearts of all would rest with the consciousness, that, though our rugged shores are not lined with physical forces, to daunt the foe, and repel the efforts of those who would invade—though the bristling bayonets of numberless hosts, do not bid defiance to those who would cross our boundaries, there is a power of greater strength than these, which could make our land invincible to every evil—every unrighteous foe.

God grant that the millions who live under the laws of our great empire, may realize that we need the force of MIND—rightly moulded and strengthened—to protect ourselves against the usurpations of evil powers, to revolutionize the world, and give to every one, what the great, the wise and good, have termed the inalienable rights of all.

Is she Happy?

THE above query was just propounded to me by a friend concerning a mutual love. I could not answer it, but nevertheless it was not entirely vain, as it recalled a serious conversation I once held, several years since, with a relative. The individual to whom I refer was once blest with a most amiable daughter. I remember her as one of those who passed before me in childhood, claiming reverence by a sweetness mingled with a refined dignity. She was one of consumption's victims, and died surrounded with true friends, who prized her many estimable qualities. I never heard a whisper against her—her pure amiability was confessed by all, and she was worthy to bear the name of one of the Old Testament 'holy women' which she did bear. Like her name sake, it was her delight to labor for her loves and make home attractive. Her memory is blest, and now steals over me as precious as the land-breeze to the homeward bound, laden with remembered sweets.

Sometime after her death, her mother had a very life-like dream respecting her. It seemed to be a pleasant afternoon, and the air was so mild and fragrant that the window of the room sanctified the most by the daughter's presence, was thrown open. She entered where the mother sat. Their glances met—both thoughtful and silent. The spirit-form remained awhile without uttering a word, or being queried. She turned to depart, when the mother ventured to ask one question—a question embodying all the mother's anxieties,—‘Ruth, are you happy?’ The visionary form turned round, and with a look of inexpressible sadness, silently departed. ‘O, had she but said yes! what a weight would have been taken from my spirit!’ said the mother to me. This she said because there was no mental answer in her soul. She was in doubt, and oh what doubt to a mother! How many such there are in our world, and their case is a solemn teaching against the heartlessness of some forms of christian faith.

Here was one, a true devotee of amiability, taken away while all were confessing her goodness—while many testimonies were around her of her devotion to the real utilities of life. Yet all this was no ground to decide respecting the happiness of her eternal state. A pure life was nothing, because an idea had been taught the parent that some strange change must take place on earth in the mortal being, ere it can be regarded as an heir of heaven. And here is a plain exemplification of the tendencies of certain views of theology, causing the mind to regard a pure life as no commendation of a mortal to the favor of God, in comparison with an undefined change—a mysterious something—a great excitement of feeling and mental debasement on some occasion of religious effort. This mysterious exercise is exalted above the truest devotion to domestic and social duty, and is made the criterion to decide whether the epithet good shall be attached to a person's name or not. The murderer, with the deaths of many on his soul, having professed to have gone through this exercise a few hours previous to his execution, is promised a white robe, and a crown, and a throne in heaven; while he who professes it not, though his feelings have ever been coined into the gold of charity's currency, is doomed at death to despair! What a mockery of human virtue!

The Governess.

BY MISS M. A. DODD.

‘I AM not, love, what I appear.’ BYRON.

I WILL tell you a short story about a governess; not after the usual manner, of a person in high life reduced to poverty, and obliged to resort to teaching as a means of support; but ‘a round unvarnished tale’ concerning an adventure of a yankee girl of my acquaintance.

Mr. Green, a gentleman engaged in a high school at the South, and on a visit to his native village, called to see Squire Neal, an old friend, who was accounted the wealthiest person in the place; and moreover had the good fortune to be blest with four fair daughters, each of them, according to his own estimation, ‘worth their weight in gold.’

‘Miss Laura,’ said their visiter; who by the way was a married man, and therefore is not to be the “hero” of my tale; ‘Miss Laura,’ addressing the second in age, ‘do you know any young lady about here, who would like to go on with me to Virginia, to fill a situation as governess in a fine family, where there are four lovely children?’

‘Why can I not go myself? do you think I am qualified to take such a step?’

‘Ah! Miss Neal, you are quizzing me.’

‘Never was farther from it in my life, sir. I have always remained in this little country village, where nothing ever occurs to vary the dullness, and where the same humdrum customs are kept up from one year's end to another. I feel a desire to see something more of the world, and this would afford me a fine opportunity. I should like, too, of all things, to be a governess, it would be so romantic; and though it is a sudden idea, if my father and mother will give their consent, I am determined to go.’

Mr. Neal was an easy sort of a man, who thought—and he thought truly—that when sensible girls were of an age to judge for themselves they would do about right, if you let them have their own way, especially such girls as his; so Laura met no opposition from him, and as Mrs. Neal never contradicted her husband, or anybody else, in fact, it was soon settled between them that their daughter should do as she liked; and though her sisters ridiculed the idea of going off on what they called a Quixotic expedition, she was firm in her purpose, and soon left home under the protection of Mr. Green, who was to be her escort to the place of destination.

After a pleasant journey they reached Richmond, where they met the Ashton family, who were to avail themselves of Laura's services, and who had left their plantation to spend the winter months in the capital. Though a little home-sick when first left by her companion among total strangers, the novelty of her situation soon drove away all sad thoughts. Mrs. Ashton, though a very gay and fashionable woman, was blest with many good qualities, and she quickly won Laura's heart. Her husband was a fine, intelligent man, and the children were beautiful and docile. She was surrounded by every elegance, treated with politeness and attention by the parents, with affectionate confidence by her pupils, and with respect by the servants, so that she saw before her but one long holiday. The winter quickly passed away in a round of agreeable occupations, and pleasurable incidents, and when the fine spring weather returned, the whole family left the city for their summer residence.

Several weeks were occupied in this delightful journey; visiting among friends, and stopping at many interesting places, such as the tomb, and former residence of Washington, and other scenes honored by time and historical associations; so that Laura had an opportunity to experience the warmth of Virginia hospitality, and to see much of that beautiful country. The latter part of May found them domesticated at Ashton Place, and we cannot do better than to quote a description of it from one of Laura's own letters. 'It is a dark stone mansion, very large and very old, with some of the oddest, out of the way rooms, and darkest nooks and corners, and queerest little loop hole windows that you can possibly imagine. I mount up, on a chair, to the opening through which the light enters my own domicil, and gazing out upon the summer landscape, I fancy myself a lovelorn damsel imprisoned in a castle of the olden time and guarded by turret and tower, gate and barbican, drawbridge and moat. A green lawn stretches far around with the verdure kept shaven to a velvet softness, with groups of trees here and there intercepting the sunshine, and flowering shrubs dispersed between; and so nearly does it resemble my idea of an English park, I almost expect to see the deer winding among the shrubbery, or trooping from sunlight to shade. Beyond, is a dark, and slow moving stream, thickly shaded, and almost concealed from view, by the holly, the cypress, and the ivy; and then, for miles around, lie the cotton fields already white with the bursting pods, which contain the fleecy treasure.'

Visitors, ere long arrived to enliven their solitude, and among them came Henry Dayton, with his two sisters, the son and daughters of an aristocratic family residing on the nearest plantation, twelve miles distant from Ashton Place. They were expected to remain some length of time, as it is the custom with the wealthy southerners, who reside on extensive estates, far removed from neighbors, to collect a number of friends together under their hospitable roofs. Laura was confined to her room with a severe headache during the day on which they arrived, and the children, released from lessons, were amusing themselves in the parlor. Young Dayton was talking with the eldest, a bright eyed girl who counted ten summers, and as he held her hand he drew her to his side, and lifting the curls from her forehead, imprinted thereon an affectionate kiss. The little creature blushed and pouted, and releasing herself from his caresses, said she would tell Miss Neal; 'and who is Miss Neal?' inquired the offender.

'Why, don't you know? she is our governess.'

'And what would she say if you were to tell her?'

'I think she would say you were very rude.'

'Faith,' thought Dayton, 'she must be an elderly, disagreeable, prudish madam.'

The following day a young lady appeared at the dinner table, who was introduced to the guests as Miss Neal. She was not remarkably beautiful, though no one would have thought of calling her plain. Her eyes were very bright and black, her hair of the same ebon hue, her complexion was fine, with just a sufficient quantity of color, her teeth were handsome, and her whole countenance lit up with an expression of intelligence and good humor. Add to all this a graceful and dignified mien, and you have a faithful picture of Laura as she appeared among the family at Ashton; and Dayton could not help smiling at the contrast between the governess he had imagined, and the one he saw. He chanced to be seated near her at the table, and being seized with a desire to appear agreeable in her eyes, he exerted his powers of pleasing which seldom failed. He found her possessed of superior mental endowments, and the dinner hour passed away so pleasantly he regretted when it was over, and the lady obliged to retire. But he found many opportunities of renewing their intercourse, for Laura was much with the family, and treated by them as a relative or friend, and not with that neglect which some people choose to show towards those who are entrusted with the education of their children. She took many rambles in the woods and fields accompanied by her pupils, and Dayton was almost sure to join them before they had finished their walk; and as Laura was skilled in the feminine science of Botany, he would come with an offering of some leaf or flower, of which he was very anxious to learn the class, &c., as an excuse for meeting them; and said leaves and flowers were invariably preserved in the choicest manner in her neat herbarium.

For a time Laura was glad whenever he appeared, and she met and conversed with him gaily and unreservedly; but after awhile, though she did not exactly avoid him, she took shorter and less frequent excursions in the open air. She began to ask herself why she found so much happiness in his society, and though it was painful to harbor any doubt of the nobleness of his nature, she could not help thinking he might be like many other young men who would not hesitate to take advantage of her situation, and amuse an idle hour by trifling with her feelings. She knew that he possessed no small share of family pride, and if serious in his attentions he must conquer that pride before he could think of making her his wife; for though in her proper station at home she might have been his match, that station was unknown to the family who had employed her, as it was a part of her place when she took up the occupation of a governess, not to be thought above it. She almost regretted having followed a romantic impulse which she now felt might lead to after sorrow, but she was too proud to betray herself, even to Mrs. Ashton.

The Miss Daytons were pleasant, though haughty girls, and while their manner towards Laura was polite, it was also cold; and she was evidently shut out from any share of their good will or affection. She one day became an unwilling auditor to a part of their conversation, in which her name was coupled contemptuously with their brother's; and 'his infatuation,' 'her artfulness,' and other expressions of like nature reaching her ear wounded her pride most deeply. She had gone into the garden early on the following morning when Henry joined her, remarking on the seclusion in which she had of late kept herself, and offering to her acceptance a damask rose glistening with large drops of dew. She took it in silence, and he stood by her side speaking of the beauty of that early hour, of the freshness of the flowers, and of every thing but the subject nearest his heart; though his eyes, had she but looked into their depths, might have told her all, for eyes sometimes speak when the lips are silent, and they seldom deceive. While she thus listened to his eloquence, she unconsciously, or intentionally pulled the rose to pieces, and its dewy petals fell upon the ground. He was pained at the act, and exclaimed sadly, 'Ah Miss Neal! is it thus you destroy my gift?'

'Forgive me, Mr. Dayton, I was thinking of the roses which smile in the garden of my far away home.'

'Excuse the abruptness of the question, Miss Neal, but I beseech you to tell me frankly whether you are, or are not, engaged?'

'Only till the end of the year, Mr. Dayton, but if I do not go home then, I shall remain with the Ashtons; as I cannot think of leaving them for any other family: but my pupils need my attendance, and I must now leave you to your meditations.'

'Faith! she's a queer one!' said our knight to himself, as his lady love disappeared through the door of the house. 'She could not have misunderstood me, and I hope she does not doubt my honor; but I see she is made of rare metal, and is well spiced with pride. She will be wooed, ere she is won, though I am vain enough to think she likes me; but, Henry Dayton, what will the world say if you marry a governess? A fig for the world! who cares what it may say? not I? I will marry who I like, that is, if I can persuade her to have me.'

Mrs. Ashton was ill that morning, and it fell upon Laura to preside at the breakfast table, which she did with so much grace, Dayton said to himself, 'she is every inch a lady, and would adorn any station.'

The Daytons left a few days after, and as Henry could not manage to see Laura alone, he concluded it would be best to think the matter over and defer an explanation to some future period. Business soon after called him to the West, and being detained there much longer than he had intended, when he returned Laura was no longer at Ashton, for the year had expired which ended her engagement, and though much attached to her kind friends, she no longer desired to continue the occupation of teaching, and we will now follow her to her New England home.

Things looked strange at first; but all remained unchanged: her books, her flowers, her birds were there, just as she had left them; and she went back to her old employments, and after she had once told her adventures, the event of her long absence seemed to be forgotten; for she seldom referred to it except by a casual remark. There were some circumstances which she did not mention, and there was one name which had never passed her lips, though neither were forgotten; but the most acute observer could not have detected any outward appearance of an inward trouble, a heart ill at ease. She was a favorite with all the young men of her acquaintance, but she could not boast of her 'offers,' for she scorned to lead any one to make proposals which she knew she should decline.

'Laura,' said her elder sister, as they were sitting at work together, 'Mr. Clark likes you, I believe, and why do you appear so reserved and cold towards him? I thought being a governess would humble you, but you are ten times prouder than you were before.'

'Am I? Julia.'

'You talk, and look, as though you were in a dream, my dear.'

'Do I? sister.'

'Am I? and do I? Really you exhibit a rare economy of speech. Laura what are you thinking about?'

'Nothing in particular; but get your bonnet, Julia, and let us take a walk.'

A few months after Mr. Bruce, a wealthy merchant from New York, spent several days in the family, as he had some dealings with Laura's father; and he admired her, offered himself, and was refused. He had just left her and gone from the house looking rather discomposed, when Julia entered the room where her sister was sitting. 'Why Laura,' said she, 'you are as calm as though nothing had happened.'

'And what has happened, Julia?'

'Did not Mr. Bruce offer himself to you?'

'He did.'

'And you refused him?'

'Yes I refused him, you surely could not think I would become his wife, I would sooner cut off my right hand than give it to him.'

'Why, Laura! he is rich and handsome, and I feel sorry for his disappointment.'

'If he has any other recommendations beside those you mention, I have not yet discovered them. I wish he had taken a fancy to you, Julia, for you pity him so much, and pity is akin to love. His pride may be hurt, but I do not think his heart is very deeply wounded, and I dare say he will offer himself to some one else in less than a month. He is incapable of loving a woman truly; for he loves himself supremely; and he loves money, dress, and show. He would choose a wife as he would a horse, or an equipage, and marry for the sake of having some one to preside over his household: such an one, is not the man for me; I must be loved exclusively, passionately, devotedly, or I will never marry.'

'Well sister, I must say your notions are romantic; but I think you have given a good description of the gentleman's character, and I very much doubt whether I should have been willing to accept him myself; so we will let him go for what he is worth, which would be considerable, if we count the cash; but that would be the last thing I should count in making choice of a husband.'

Meanwhile, Henry Dayton had not forgotten the charming governess, or given up the idea of meeting her again; but he had formed no definite plan of proceeding, he did not even know where she might be found, and more than a year passed away in this disagreeable uncertainty. He finally concluded to take a journey to New England, and among the many letters of introduction which were given him by his friends, he found one addressed to Mr. Neal, a member of Congress, residing in an eastern city. He did not expect to hear anything of Laura from such a distinguished personage; but the name was a recommendation; and when he reached the place, the honorable John Neal was favored with an early call. He found the gentleman at home, and was received in a polite and friendly manner. A carriage stood at the door, and as he was making his bow to depart, Mr. Neal proposed that he should ride with him, as he was going a few miles into the country to call on his brother, and Henry felt no inclination to refuse.

They drew up before a handsome residence in a pleasant village, and entering without ceremony were received by a young lady, who was introduced by her uncle, to the stranger, as his niece, Miss Julia Neal. Shortly after another entered who they presented as Miss Maria, and still a third designated Flora.

Dayton now anxiously watched each opening of the door; he began to grow nervous, and his color went and came like a girl's. He could not be mistaken, they must be her sisters; for there was a marked family resemblance. Julia, though the eldest, was not so tall as Laura, she was thinner too in flesh, Maria was rather embonpoint, and Flora was slender and delicate; but they all had the same dark expressive eyes, and pleasant smile, which so reminded him of Laura; but where was she? dead? or what would be worse to him, married? He dared not ask, he feared to be relieved from that torturing suspense; but after some time, in the course of conversation he chanced to mention his native state, and Maria immediately exclaimed, 'Oh, I wish Laura was at home, for she spent a year in Virginia!'

Henry's countenance brightened as he replied, 'If Miss Laura Neal is a sister of yours, I have the happiness of being acquainted with her, as I visited Ashton Place while she was a member of the family.'

'It is strange she never mentioned you,' said Maria.

'I am unworthy of a place in her remembrance, but has she left home for any length of time? I should be pleased to meet her again.'

'She has only gone out for an afternoon visit, and will return soon after tea.'

Neither of the gentlemen seemed in any haste to depart, and Dayton was rejoiced when his companion concluded to tarry till the following morning. About dusk Laura returned, and Maria hastened to meet her at the door and apprise her of the visit of Mr. Dayton from Virginia, who said he had been acquainted with her there, but had no idea of seeing her when he came with uncle John to their house. Laura did not faint, or even blush, but she told Maria to go back and entertain him, and she would come in directly. Seeking her own room she threw off her bonnet and shawl, and sat down for a few moments to collect her wandering thoughts and gain composure to carry her through the coming interview; then descending to the parlor she met their guest with a cordial welcome, and appeared perfectly easy and unembarrassed.

When Mr. Neal returned to the city he left

Dayton behind; and as he was travelling for pleasure it will not be thought strange that he should have remained there something over a week, and that he went away at last much happier than he came, for the air of the village had evidently done him good.

There was a gay wedding at Squire Neal's the following spring, and we need not publish the names of the 'happy couple' who, when the ceremony was over, departed on a long bridal tour; but the reader will guess who they were when we say that shortly after, as the gentleman was reading the marriage of a female acquaintance in one of the southern papers, his young wife heard him use the expressions, 'foolish match,' 'thrown herself away,' &c. and she playfully put her hand on his mouth saying, 'hush husband! those who live in glass houses should not throw stones, and it will not do for you to say anything about ill assorted matches, for proud as you are, you married a governess.'

Abraham's Sacrifice.

BY IONE.

'BEHOLD the fire and the wood; but where is the lamb for a burnt offering.'

TOILSOME and steep the way
Trode by the patriarch to Moriah's mount!
The flight of years had borne his strength away,
Yet left a priceless pledge—faith's gushing fount.

His scattered, snowy locks,
Were gently lifted from his aged head;
The whispering zephyr but his anguish mocks,
And sends his thoughts again the past to tread!

'Rest thee awhile, my son,
E'en here, beneath the shadow of this tree;
And close thy dove-like eyes till set of sun;
For toils like these were erst unknown to thee!

'And I will watch thy sleep,
Child of unuttered hopes too dear for earth!
Aye, take thy rest! I could not see thee weep,
Whose life hath been but melody and mirth!

'Strange thoughts are in my heart!
Father of Israel, pity and sustain!
This yearning tenderness will not depart;
My spirit's wings are o'er him to detain!

'Yet is he wholly thine.
I yield in him my treasure unto Thee!
Take him ere sorrow leaves its deepening line
Upon a brow from stain or shadow free!

'Receive him, God and King!
Thou only know'st the value of the gift;
My heart's lone idol to thy throne I bring,
And pray that seraph wings his soul may lift!

'I send through threatening cloud
The eye of faith along the spirit shore !
Unto the very dust my head hath bowed ;
But my heart wavers in its trust no more.

' Arise my drooping flower !
Thy God hath need of beings frail as thou !
Turn thou away ! thy speaking glance hath power
To call youth's fever to my furrowed brow !'

' Father, thy troubled eye
Doth send its searching glances far and wide ;
Lean on thy son ! the holy mount is nigh,
And we will reach its summit side by side !

' I bear the hallowed wood
And flaming torch, but see no offering here !
The white, unsinning lamb, that meekly stood Beside our tent, roams not this place of fear !'

The stricken mourner bent,
With knife upraised, above the prostrate form !
Freely he offered up the blessing lent,
And strove to soothe affliction's gathering storm !

Hush ! for a solemn voice,
Sweeter than song of angels, stays the blow !
' Look up thou sorely tried, in God rejoice !
To thy deserted home in triumph go !

' Take back the hope of years !
Thy cherished Isaac, to his mother's breast !
Thy child shall be the sire of kings and seers,
Shall smooth the pillow of thy dreamless rest !'

' I bless thee, oh, my God !
For thy unmeasured mercy to my soul !
Sweet is the incense from the chastening rod,
Of thoughts, that like a flood of rapture roll !

' Come to my throbbing heart,
Thrice blessed gift of God, I clasp thee still !
Leave me no more on earth till I depart,—
Thy voice is sweeter than the laughing rill !

' Anew, great King of kings !
I give his youth and innocence to thee !
Each passing hour some new found beauty brings !
Oh keep his spirit from earth's passions free !'

His soft white hand was laid—
Within his father's, and the glistening tear
Upon the silken lash, by smiles was stayed,
And childhood's joyous laugh rang loud and clear !

Ireland and the Irish.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

THE office of religion is peculiarly to show mercy to the unfortunate. It may have other operations and other aims, but its greatest work is an active love to mankind. And surely a gentle minister of mercy need not wander far in search of misery. Even in our own blessed land the highways are marked with want. The exile is here in his poverty and squalid wretchedness ; and the son of our own soil is not always a recipient of its bounties.

Among the vast congregation of the children of sorrow, the heart can distinctly trace out the emigrants of old Ireland, as claiming, above all others, its ancient sympathies. Let us not be deceived by the merry face and the careless heart, for there is a wretchedness which is not felt, and yet which not the less for this, claims the labors of the philanthropist, and the ministries of the christian.

From immemorial time, the Irish have been an oppressed and persecuted people. Since the days of Brian the Brave, the shamrock has been withering beside their crumbling towers ; and the heart, in wandering back through the story of their wrongs, finds scarce one spot to rest amid the deluge of oppression and crime, which for nearly eight centuries has overswept their beautiful land. Oh, Erin ! what a destiny has been thine ! what a mysterious and tragic tale is the history of thy by-gone days !

Previous to the invasion of the Danes in the ninth century, nearly all the learning and piety of the eastern world was centred in Ireland. More favored than in all succeeding ages, her people were at this time guided and guarded by a virtuous priesthood. It was the apostolic era of the Irish church. The foot of popery had not yet trodden upon her altars, nor had prelacy forged her fetters for the poor. Columbanus and Columbk-kill, worthy to be named with the sainted Oberlin and the pious Felix Neff, traversed the mountains of the Vosges, preaching the gospel to the wood-cutters and hunters who inhabited those uncultivated regions, and carrying the messages of christian love and peace to the poor and afflicted. They founded no bishoprics and courted no kings, but leaving courts and camps to papal legates, spent their lives in humble labors among the needy and the unlearned. And to this day there is a spot in the Irish heart sacred to the memory of these holy men. The nurse hushes her babe to rest with their sainted names in her song, and for years after the long grass was waving upon their graves, their spirits were believed to be watching over the interests of the nation.

The beautiful customs of fostering and gossipred prevailed in the land, and knit together the hearts of the high and low, interweaving their interests, their sorrows, and their joys. The young heir of a high inheritance, became the child of a peasant mother ; learned to cling unto her bosom, and to share the sports of her children. She, in turn directed the current of her love to him, till it became as free and resistless as that bestowed upon her natural offspring. The carfinnies, or chieftains, became name-fathers to the children of their favorites and thus bound them by a new tie of filial obedience, so that for life and for death, their memories and feelings were more or less irrevocably intermingled.

There is a romance attached to many of their ancient customs which time and change cannot destroy. What is beautiful in one age is beautiful always; it is permanent, and not conventional merely. Of this character was the minstrelsy of chivalrous days—that vagrant and fragmentary literature which refined and elevated the hearts of a rude and warlike people. In the castle halls hung the ancient harp, free to every wandering minstrel of the clime; and ever was he most favored, who could most eloquently recount the valiant feats of the living chief, by which he had added new glory to an ancient and illustrious title.

This bright era in the history of Ireland shone forth amid a world of darkness. The Reformation had not yet dawned upon the papal midnight; and even after it had spread abroad like morning over the isles of the sea, its light fell upon Ireland but to blight and destroy. The shamrock around its castle moats grew pale, and the white rose¹ which flourished exotic beside the domestic shrines, faded and perished from the land. The peace which, in the reign of Brian, had rested for a brief season over beautiful Erin, was like the transient gleam of a comet, that once in many thousands of years streams along our globe, and then departs to distant and unknown space. Its surest decline may be traced back to the Anglo-Saxon invasion, and to the first establishment of English deputy-ship. Even before this period, immediately upon the death of Brian who was slain while at prayer in his tent, the kingdom had become divided against itself, and its toparchs being engaged in deadly feuds amongst themselves, left their country to become the prey of a foreign power.

It would be a melancholy task, indeed, to review the story of this sad land after it became an English conquest. It is but one long, unbroken, heart-rending tragedy, in which the worst scenes of the French revolution might find a terrible precedent, and the Spanish Inquisition a horrible counterpart. It is a page in the world's history written with blood; a record of cruel laws, of idle rapacity, of ruined innocence, of torture, famine, mutilation and death. The ancient carfinnies in their national costume of linen vests, flowing mantles, bushy beards, and long hair streaming down their shoulders, had gradually given place to English courtiers in their lace collars and golden embroidery.

The struggle was long and sanguinary. Brave hearts held out till the blood became dry in their veins; food was there none, and they feasted on the bones of the dead. Women fought hand to hand with their oppressors; it was their only hope and their noblest choice. Priests were slain at the altars, and the sanctuaries polluted with blood. Thousands were dragged to the gallows without even the imputation of guilt; and one tall trooper obtained the enviable appellation of the walking scaffold, from his readiness to submit his own stately person to the honorable office of a gallows post.

These outrages were not the dramas of a day, or a year, or even of an age. They have been continued, almost without cessation, for seven centuries! And what are the fruits of works like these? What is Ireland now as a nation?

' No more to chiefs and ladies bright,
The harp of Tara¹ swells;
The chord alone, that breaks at night,
Its tale of ruin tells.'

It is interesting to look upon the character of its people in connection with its history, for we still discover, beneath the accumulated ruins of centuries, the broken fragments of a noble structure. Had the hand of civilization and refinement been busy in embellishing this beautiful fabric, what a lofty and intellectual race would this day have walked erect among the romantic dells and picturesque mountains of Erin!

Never found bravery and patriotism a safer home than in an Irish heart. It is wrong to accuse those of inefficiency who are only unfortunate. The bold maintenance of their legitimate rights has been the cause of their long and bloody warfare. Had they yielded to bondage without a struggle, they might have spared, perhaps, rivers of blood. But who blames them that they did not? Liberty is a law of our natures, and we are bound to strive for it. It is a natural right which no power on earth can destroy; the richest, most impartial and unalienable of all the gifts of Heaven. As such, the sons of Erin fought for it; that they were unsuccessful does not stamp

Most wretched and degraded, is the condition of the poor emigrants who throng our land of freedom and abundance. It is, nevertheless, better here than at home. They are free from those heavy rents and that oppressive taxation which in their native land deprives them of the faintest hope of competence, or even of comfort. They have here no double rates imposed by ecclesiastic institutions; no fee to pay to a government church; no restraint laid upon their religious wills. They enjoy, also, citizen rights of education, and an equal representation.

It is objected to the Irish that they are almost universally slaves to papacy. The time has been, when Protestantism, had she been true to her own creed, might have established in Ireland a purer and a better faith. But what christian renovation could she expect to accomplish with racks, and dungeons, flames and swords? Many a time were this persecuted people ready to seek shelter in the bosom of the church of England; but they were repulsed with threats, denunciations, and contempt. The Romish church has been ever their truest friend, and shall they be reproached for clinging to her, stained with crimes though she be? They must be won from her now by love and gentle persuasion; by long-suffering, forbearance and mercy.

These unfortunate votaries have been charged also with reckless improvidence. This is a sin which finds its origin in one of the noblest sentiments of our nature. The soul of an Irishman is generous to a fault; and what he has he freely bestows, laying up hope, only for the morrow. His social propensities are strong, and he shares his goods with his neighbors. To the unfortunate he lends a pitying ear; and while he has one potato left, a half of it is for a needy brother.

Their happy countenances and mirthful habits deprive them of much sympathy which a woe-begone appearance might elicit; but this joyous temperament is better than sympathy. Irish wit is proverbial; fortunately, it has modifications of a softer character which endow the heart with cheerfulness and good humor. But, despite this sunny temper, there are recesses of acute suffering in many a veiled heart. Ready penitence for guilt is almost characteristic of this passionate people. A yearning of the spirit after something higher and better brings many an hour of inquietude and regret, if not of absolute despair.

Then they have to contend with, or rather to endure, negative miseries, such as ignorance, superstition, and vitiated tastes; positive enough in themselves, but unfelt, and consequently passive.

Religion has something yet to do, in reforming, elevating, and enlightening these dwellers upon our shores. They are our fellow-citizens; have become incorporated into our government; are, to a certain degree, members of our households. 'Let no man write my epitaph, till my country is free,' said the exile Emmet, one of the latest of Ireland's dauntless patriots; it is the work of christianity to make it free; for it is she, alone, who can incline the hearts of the people to do good. When she shall sit enthroned in the halls of legislation; when jurisprudence becomes her own 'divine right,' then shall all the nations of the earth sit in the shadow of the tree of liberty, and find, in its fruits, peace, and wisdom, and truth.

Charity.

BY REV. S. P. LANDERS.

AN apostle saith that charity is greater than faith or hope, but he is to be understood undoubtedly as speaking of its practical greatness and importance. Charity is but an effect, rather than a cause; it is the manifestation of faith, and therefore may be regarded as greater in this sense, than its cause. Faith must exist before charity can be exercised. Faith is an exercise of the mind, and is 'the substance (foundation) of things hoped for.' Both hope and charity or love have their foundation in faith, and therefore must partake of the nature and strength of the faith. The exercise of charity is the fulfilling of the law, which is supreme love to God, and universal good will to men. Our first and highest duty is to love God, but how can we perform this duty without faith in him? and how can we have this faith, without a knowledge of his perfections and character? We must have faith in his wisdom, in his power and goodness, in his veracity and justice, before we can love him as we ought, or as our interests require.

But it may be asked, how can we have the requisite faith, founded on knowledge and evidence? We answer, in the same way that we have faith in any thing else. Why do we believe that the sun will continue to shine in his strength from year to year? that seed-time and harvest, the changes of the seasons, and all the laws of nature will continue? Because experience and reason assure us that in the natural world the same glorious order will continue to be observed. We have a faith on these subjects, and others of the like, that amounts to a certainty in our own minds. We never distrust here, but always act as though we were perfectly certain that our efforts would be crowned with success, if there was no failure on our part. Now there is just the same evidence in favor of the love, wisdom and power of God, that there is that the unceasing laws of nature will be continued; for 'these are but parts of his ways,' and are the constant exhibitions of his goodness to man. Can we not have a faith then in God, that will enable us to love him supremely—a faith that will awaken the noblest faculties of the soul, and draw out our minds in love to him? There is a holy joy in the exercise of this love, and the stronger our faith is in him, the more pure and exalted will be our happiness. Our next highest duty is to love our fellow man. But how can we do this, we inquire again, without faith in him? It is evident that we must have confidence in him before we can love him as the gospel requires. We must have faith in his wisdom, integrity, and in the dignity of his nature, before we can be actuated by this important christian virtue. And here an incident occurs to my mind which has often been used to illustrate the subject of which we now speak. It is related of Alexander, called the great, that after he had fought one of his battles with the Persians, the battle of Tarsus, that he was so overcome by heat, so weary and exhausted by the exercise and excitement of the occasion, that he plunged into the waters of the Cydnus to bathe. As a natural consequence, he was seized with ague fits, and thus he continued till his physicians, and his whole army despaired of his life. For fear of the Macedonians in case they should not be successful, in trying experiments, the physicians did not venture upon such a course, but decided that he would die. But Philip ventured to prescribe something new for the conqueror, telling him at the same time, that the operation of his medicine would be severe, and that a cure could not be effected short of two or three days, if at all. Alexander had always confided much in the judgment and integrity of Philip, and he determined to take his medicine and abide the issue. While Philip was making his medicine, the conqueror received a letter from Parmenio, advising him 'to beware of Philip, whom Darius had prevailed upon, by presents of great value, and the promise of his daughter in marriage, to take him off by poison.' Alexander received and read this letter, and then placed it under his pillow without showing it to any of his attendants and friends. When Philip presented the cup of medicine which he had prepared, the king took it without any mark of suspicion that it contained poison, and at the same time gave the letter he had received cautioning him, into the hands of Philip.

'It was a striking situation and more interesting than the scene of a tragedy; the one reading while the other was drinking. They looked upon each other, but with a very different air. The king, with an open and unembarrassed countenance, expressed his regard for Philip, and the confidence he had in his honor and innocence; Philip's looks showed his indignation at the calumny. One, while he lifted up his eyes and hands to heaven protested his fidelity; the other, while he threw himself down by the bedside, entreated his master to be of good courage, and trust to his care.' The medicine was powerful in its operation, so much so that the patient was speechless and discovered but few signs of life, while under its influence, but it had the desired effect of restoring the commander to health again. In this incident, as well as in the case of Damon and Pythias, and others, we have an example of strong faith in man, so strong, indeed, that Alexander has often been condemned as rash in taking the preparations of Philip under the circumstances already related. But he had unbounded faith in his uprightness and integrity, and where such a faith exists between man and man, we find charity in its greatest possible perfection.

And it is impossible to possess this strong love where confidence is wanting, or where we find that it has been misplaced. And mankind universally possess this faith to that degree in the integrity and dignity of human nature, that we are willing to trust it. Why do we feel so secure when we lie down in sleep to repose our weary frames, while our dwelling might be set on fire and consumed to ashes? Why do we not fear when we walk the streets, that every person we meet is an assassin, and will watch the opportunity and steal out from his dark retreat, and take our property or our lives? Why do we feel thus secure and unconcerned, when, if men were thus disposed, as some have been, our streets would present a frightful scene of havoc and blood? Is it because there is a law to punish such offences? But where would the law be, if this was the natural disposition of man? We do not feel thus secure and unconcerned for our lives and the lives of others, because a law is written in the statute book against the murderer, but because we confide in our fellow men—because we have faith in human nature, and are willing to trust it. And here is the basis of all charity between man and man. Let this confidence be increased, and love will be increased—let it be weakened and the foundations of society will be broken up. But let this faith be mutual and strong, and the broad principles of charity will be unfolded, and poor, despised human nature will be clothed in garments radiant with beauty. Let it be done, and humanity will be redeemed from its degradation and washed from many of its dark stains. Let it be done, and peace shall be universal, and nation shall no more lift up sword against nation and man against man.

When our faith in God is gone, we are infidels. When our faith in man is gone, we are destitute of all love for him, and are prepared for the commission of the darkest deeds that have stained the historic page. Then if we would cultivate a love for God and man, let us have a deeper and more perfect knowledge of both—let us strive to be worthy of each other's confidence, and the world will say, 'See how these christians love one another.'

The Bridal Eve; or the Broken Hearted.

BY MISS L. A. PEABODY.

THE guests are all assembled now,
And hope and gladness light each brow;
And she, the brightest of that throng,
Seems glad, the very child of song!
With joyous step, and lightsome heart,
And cheek of roseate hue,
And truth in her dark, beaming eye,
Whose softness mocks the blue.

A snow white wreath is on her brow,
For she must take her marriage vow;
And gladly she that vow will take,
Nor from its bondage wish to break;
For she will wed a noble one
Of more than common grace,
With manhood's richest impress stamp'd
Upon his speaking face.

And he is proud to stand beside
That fair young girl, his cherished bride
So soon to be. He ill could brook
To see that sweet, confiding look

Turned to despair by cold neglect,
Or ill requited scorn,—
Or sorrow shade that pure, white brow,
Which joy hath ever worn.

And deem ye all in that array
Of beauty, are as glad and gay?
Oh! know ye not a wounded heart
In joyous smiles oft hides its smart?
Yes, there are those who inly feel
What never is expressed
By outward sign, yet sorrow's barb
Still rankles in their breast.

And though they seldom heave a sigh,
Perchance a tear-drop in their eye,
Though nought is said, will sometimes steal
And silently their grief reveal.
Ay, it is so:—and mark ye well
That maid of thoughtful brow;
Her eye was wont to beam with joy,
But sorrow fills it now.

She hath retired from that array
Of joyous hearts and faces gay,
To weep alone; she would not, they Should know her suffering on that day.
Her suffering!—ay, for she was once
The loved and chosen one
Of him, the noblest, brightest, best,
Amid that brilliant throng.

And fondly she returned his love,
And deemed that he would constant prove;
She poured her heart's best treasures forth
And he was proud to own their worth.
And but for those, self-styled their friends,
She might have been his bride;
They proved her foes, in that they led
Her weeping from his side.

They bade her not one thought to hold
Of him. 'His love would soon be cold,'
They said. She knew 'twas false, and sought
To move them by some gentle thought.
All would not do;—and vainly, she Strove to subdue her will,
Futile her efforts to forget,
For, Oh! she loved him still.

Yet, never she her love expressed,
But kept it buried in her breast;
For well she knew his happiness
Would be disturbed by her distress.
Far rather, she, that he would deem
Her heart of feeling rest,
Than that one thought of her should mar

* * * * *

What recks that maiden, now, of life?
Alas! another is his wife.
Silent, she droops from day to day,
Though all unmarked is her decay.
Like some sweet rose which lingers still
Upon its stalk, its mates all flown
Upon the gentle winds away,
Their fragments o'er the green turf strown;
When one by one its leaves are shed
We hardly note, till all are dead,
That the sweet rose will soon be gone,
And such is she,—that gentle one!

The scene is changed. A few, her friends,
Have gathered round her bed of death,
To watch her life-spring's ebbing tide,
And catch her faint soul's dying breath.

She speaks. Be silent all! and list
To her soft tones. Now death's thick mist
Before her eyes is stealing fast,— Perchance those words may be her last.

'My friends, beloved,—Farewell!
I leave this joyous earth, the glad, the bright,
With all its woods and streams, the moon's soft light,
Each rock and shady dell,
Where I have listened to his thrilling tone
So strangely sweet, that seemed it music's own,—
The low, wild breathing of a harp,—a spell
That bound my soul,—Farewell!

'And, Oh! 'twas joy for me
To see in his dark eye his treasured vow,
And truth to read upon his noble brow;
And then to ever be
As I had fondly hoped, his own loved bride,
To journey through this vale by his dear side:—
But, Oh such days of bliss I ne'er might see;
Death, only, waits for me!

'I would not ye should weep,
Nor e'er that he should know how sad my heart
Was made, when from him I was forced to part;
Nor, how for him, my sleep,
Through the long night, by sorrow, has been broken,—
Nor that he know my love by this sad token,
That I have wedded Death, in anguish, deep,
I bid him not to weep!

'And now, once more,—Farewell!
Yet, mother, hither bring, before we part,
His last, sad offering. Lay it on my heart.
O, I have loved it well,—
That lock of dark brown hair! There let it lay
When I am dead, that it may find its way
To where I've loved. Speak not to break the spell
That's on me now!—Farewell!

She ceased. And gently as the moon
In parting, sheds its last, soft ray,
So gently did her spirit rise,
When died her low, sweet tones away.

Now rests she where the willows wave,—
'Twas her own choice,—that lowly grave,—
Nor reck's she now of blighted love;—
No more in this sad world she'll prove
The anguish which has been her lot,
While dwelling on this sinful earth:
In the bright city of her God,
She lives,—a child of second birth.

RELIGION. The light of religion is not that of the moon, light without heat; but neither is its warmth that of a stove, warmth without light. Religion is the sun whose warmth indeed swells, and stirs, and actuates the life of nature, but who at the same time beholds all the growth of life with a master's eye, makes all objects glorious on which he looks, and by that glory visible to others.—Coleridge.

ARGUMENTS. The Thermopylæ were defended by only three hundred men; all Spartans; in advocating our own cause, we ought to trust rather to the force than to the number of our arguments, and to care not how few they be, should those few be incontrovertible. A cause that is well supported, may be compared to an arch that is well built—nothing can be taken away without endangering the whole.—Lacon.

The Fruit of the Spirit;

OR, THE CHRISTIAN GRACES.

CHAPTER VII. GOODNESS.

'MARY! meek listener at the Savior's feet!
No feverish cares to that divine retreat
Thy woman's heart of silent worship brought;
But a fresh childhood, heavenly truth to meet,
With love and wonder and submissive thought.
Oh! for the holy quiet of thy breast,
Midst the world's eager tones and footsteps flying!
Thou, whose calm soul was like a well-spring lying
So deep and still in its transparent rest,
That e'en when noontide burns upon the hills,
Some one bright solemn star all its lone mirror fills.'

I HAVE, in the farthest corner of my most secret draw, an old Album, filled with school girls' poetry, rude rhyme, and odd selections, at which I often take a stealthy peep; for it is not placed there for its worthlessness, or because I have learned to love the polished style or smoother flow of verse, and look with scorn on those simple productions. O no! If I know my own heart, those little tributes, with all their imperfections, open as sweet treasures of thought as the tome of the wisest lore; and it is because I fear the rude and unfeeling attack of critics on what is to me so precious and sacred, that I have thus secured the little volume, and am so miserly of its contents. In truth, I love not the album scorners; for to me there is little regard for feeling manifested in lightly running over the contents of one of these mementos, and curling the scornful lip, or casting the light jest at their literary faults, wounding the heart of the owner, who, perhaps, has treasured them as sweet and holy relics of by-gone days. And when I see the book thrown down, while a cold refusal is given to the request, 'Will you write in it?' the brow, though intellectual, and the voice and speech, though soft and refined, lose to me the charm of good nature, and affectionate feelings, and I involuntary say—'Give me a little of the warmth of romance, before all this cold and dignified indifference.' Perhaps the little volumes have been made too often the repositories of flattery, affectation, and deceit; but what is there sacred to young friendship and affection that is not corrupted by connection with fashion, vanity, and carelessness? Shall we cast aside our treasures when the thoughtless and ignorant tarnish their purity and beauty? Nay; rather let us watch them the more, and bless Providence that there are some real gems among the mock pearls. Though rudely set, yet feeling discerns their beauty and brilliancy, and prizes them beyond computation.

But to my Album—and its contents. It was but the other day that I took a sly peep between its bright yellow lids, and I was carried back to the scenes and associates of other days. I was again treading the path by the locust and wild rose hedge, to the little school-house by the burial ground. I could hear the monotonous sound of our voices during the long sunny noon, echoing among the granite tombs and marble slabs, as we read again and again the epitaphs from very sympathy; and a tear stole into my eye as I thought of the good and true who had gone out from our homes to their narrow resting place beneath those sods; but the butterfly bursting from its chrysalis, as carved on many a stone, causing the innocent eye to look up with pure faith and trust, gave a holy light to this sad scene; and not with a heavy heart did I leave it to visit the old wide-spreading elm, and again sit on the smooth green grass, gemmed with the delicate ‘innocence’ and bright-eyed ‘cinquefoil’, and repeat again the thrice told tale, while the curious ear was opened and the keen appetite indulging itself on the wholesome food which our little baskets contained. And then came the ramble up the green lane, shaded by the trees of the rich orchards, to the cool, clear spring, to bathe our heated brows, and look with wonder into its clear depths, to the bubbling, heaving sands at the bottom.

But in all my imaginings—bright, beautiful, and sad,—as I turned the leaves over and over, there came not a more welcome or abiding vision than where the form of a pure and innocent girl, an early associate, was pictured. Sweet, pure hearted Mary! she has penned a tribute here so like her own dear self, that I have placed it as a talisman near my heart, to protect it from sin and vanity. O her holy and stainless life! how often have I wished to make some slight record of it as an ever abiding testimony of the inward and outward joy and beauty of holiness; but I have shrank from fulfilling my desire from my incapacity to do her justice. Yet in my band of graces she is so prominent, with the light of goodness around her brow, that I must attempt a sketch.

I do not love to describe personal charms. Indeed I think I am very prone to speak of my favorites as being very lovely, without ever giving the why or wherefore. The truth is, I very seldom can tell the color of the eye, the lip, or the cheek, or the form of the forehead, or size of the teeth, when the lips speak love and the eye beams with intelligence and goodness; for they give such radiance and beauty to the whole face that I always fear that an attempt at description would be rather taking from, than adding to, their charms, for the light that softens and harmonizes all would be wanting. But Mary’s face is so distinct before me in all its youthful beauty and heavenly sweetness, that I must lay my hand on the smooth glossy hair which we school girls used, so proudly, to call auburn,—and press my lips to that fair cheek with tinge as soft and beautiful as the delicate India shell; and those dark, loving, glorious eyes! O, one glance more must fall upon me with all its tenderness and purity, to give my heart the courage, hope and trust, that it did in former days; and I must hear again the soft silvery tones, so fitly chosen, and in such perfect harmony with her every movement, to be able to portray her in all her winning charms, heightened by the grace of goodness—that grace which has been well defined as a disposition inclining us to communicate what we have and are to others, and to do all the possible good we can in our respective places and stations. It is like true sensibility, confessed in every word and act of the owner; giving to every portion of the character attractive, spiritual charms.

I used to think, when I saw her good old Uncle, who was most tenderly attached to her, that it was early sympathy with his peculiar feelings which gave her the high standard of devotion and purity to which she had attained. O, the silver-haired, good old man! I can see him now, sitting in the sunshine beneath the porch waiting for her daily noon-visit to him, as when I loved to be by her side, as I knew he would stroke my head and bless me, and lead me through the gate to the favorite apple tree, and give me leave to gather a nosegay for ‘the mistress’ of hearts-ease, pinks, and southern-wood. How I thought it was him that the poet Willis had in his mind when he sketched the old man enjoying the school-children’s sports on ‘Saturday Afternoon,’ when he makes the old man say,—

‘I love to look on a scene like this,
Of wild and careless play,
And persuade myself I am not old,
And my hair it is not gray.’

Those were my earliest proofs of his kindness. I have seen him when my thoughts and feelings were more matured, opening his hand and sending relief to every child of penury within his reach. I have seen him following the example of his Master and showing kindness to the evil and unthankful, and in one particular instance have I witnessed its blessed effects. Lucy Wilds, with her precipitate and incautious temperament, had been led into the path of error, after she had connected herself with the little band of believers. The eye of the stern glanced upon her with indignation, as though they themselves were immaculate, and the poor culprit, with her usual excitableness, stood trembling and in tears before the assembly that had been gathered to disclaim fellowship with such a sinner. Many a word of reproach and bitterness was cast upon her from the mistaken zeal of well-meaning members, each one causing a flood of tears, as when the wind parts a rain-cloud—when the venerable man arose, and said; ‘Let him that is without sin cast the first stone. Let us pray that she may return to the fold again, and not cast her into the wide world, where she may stray farther from the kingdom.’ He placed himself in the attitude of prayer, and as the old man lifted up his pleading voice, every feeling of anger was hushed, and poor Lucy felt she had obtained pardon, and went her way and sinned no more. But a life like his, deserved a better than an earthly immortality, and with his holy heart the old man passed away ‘like as a shock of corn cometh in his season.’

The young delicate plant that sprung up by his side unfolded the same virtues in her slight form, and in her own little sphere she made as many feel the sweet effects of it; for in our childhood she was the gentle monitor, in girlhood the ready and kind assistant, and in riper years the constant friend. Who but Mary would have been willing to leave her companions in their sports to read and amuse the little pensive blind girl, who came a stranger amongst us? Who but she could have persuaded us that the tattered, neglected looking Bridget was as worthy a member in our ring as the rich and gaily dressed Amelia? Who but she would have taught us to pity, instead of ridiculing, the little culprit, when wilfulness had brought upon him such severe reproof as to send him downcast and sobbing to his home? And who but she would have made us extend the hand of reconciliation to an offending brother or sister? How many lessons would have been left unlearned without her encouragement and assistance! and how many duties left undone if she had not so often assured us of the joy we should feel in performing them. Many a ballad and ditty would have passed from ear to ear only for simple amusement, if she had not learned us to find a moral; and when the tales were going round, how hushed was every voice, and brilliant every eye, when her turn came, and she chose, as was often her wont, the beautiful history of Ruth, or some other holy woman of olden time, and taught us early to love the holy book.

When, on leaving our girlish days and the discipline of school, and verging into womanhood, the gay world with all its vanities and show would sometimes tempt our weak hearts to deceit and affectation, one glance from her pure eye would bring back the memory of youthful virtue and restrain us. She often made us feel the truth that it is better to give than receive; for though she loved the social circle, and found much joy there, yet I have often known her to relinquish its joys, to sit within the darkened room of one who had been an invalid from childhood, and whose chief delight was now to hear the voice and press the hand of some early associate; and for all our neglects, which now my heart often bitterly regrets, she was fully compensated by the more vigilant attentions of Mary. Goodness was not followed by her for the sake of greatness, for ‘the smiles and blessings of the domestic circle, and applause of her own heart were sufficient for her happiness.’ I often look back with grateful and happy feelings on the hours that I passed with her in her own home circle; and I thank heaven that my young heart was so ready to receive the holy impressions which her sweet converse was so calculated to impart, and that they have never been erased through time and changes.

But O she was too good and pure a being for this vain world, and so long it seems since she passed away that the memory of her is to me like dreams of a spotless angel. What a gloom rested on our little community when the sad tale went abroad that Mary was dangerously ill. Old people shook their heads, exclaiming—‘It is as we feared, the best and fairest children are soonest called from us.’ Her companions spoke of her in a softened tone and made frequent anxious inquiries; and the little children stole by the door, casting wishful glances and wondering when they should see her in her garden again.

But never again on earth was she to glad our vision. The disease proved fatal, and after a few short days of severe suffering, she—our village pride—was laid before us in her white robe, that we might bestow one farewell glance upon her marble brow, ere she was carried to her narrow home. O, that was the first bitter trial my young heart ever experienced! I remember as though it were but yesterday, opening the lid of her coffin, when I saw that poor invalid maiden she had so often tended, feebly making her way toward it, to glance once again on the features that had so often lighted her lonely weary hours. And as I watched the hot tears coursing down her pale cheeks, through her thin, delicate fingers, I could not help asking myself, Why is Mary, in the morning of her days and the vigor of life, taken from the home of her devoted parents, and the warm embraces of affectionate brothers and sisters, and this poor worn and weary invalid, whose days and nights are long and burdensome, left to weep over her! I ask not now. Our merciful Father knew in how many minds the germ of a livelier faith would be implanted, and in how many hearts a purer devotion would be awakened, by taking to himself this spotless lamb. And now I feel that heaven has been brought nearer to the hearts of her parents since their bereavement, while her brothers and sisters have gladly sought the embrace of their elder brother, Jesus. And many a heart has learned patience and resignation, and been awakened to tenderness and kindness, by the meekness of the poor invalid girl. Why did not these thoughts still the throbbing of my heart! O may I never suffer it again to forget that the Lord knoweth what is right and best for us.

I do not think my thoughts of Mary's burial, on that soft, quiet autumn afternoon, have ever partaken of gloom or melancholy; for there was so much in the outward world of peace and beauty, that I always felt as if it was the fittest time to part with her. Not a bird warbled a note, not a breeze stirred the leaves, as we went in slowly, one by one, to hear the low breathed prayer; and when the soft rays of sunlight stole into the room and rested on the coffin, it seemed as if the angels were lighting her pure spirit to their heavenly home. And when the coffin was borne from the house, and we followed it, silently, with no sound but the rustling of the leaves that were covering the faded and withered children of summer, I felt with the poet that

Yet not unmeet it was, that one,
Like that young friend of ours,

So gentle and so beautiful,
Should perish with the flowers.'

She needed but a little change to be made an angel, and an angel surely she is in the holy courts of the blest. Kindred are her employments there to the ministry of her memory on earth, extending the sweet triumphs of spiritual goodness. May the victory be complete in my own heart!

O Spirit of Purenness.

O SPIRIT of Purenness,
I worship thee now,
As here by the rose tree,
Thine altar, I bow!
The violets, bending,
Lift up the meek eye,
The pansies, all blooming,
A priesthood, are nigh.

I would, as the violet,
My heart were but pure,
The pleas of that priesthood
I then should ensure;
I feel that their pleading
Would reach to the skies,
My heart soon be feeling
The blessing-replies.

O spirit of Purenness!
My spirit would learn!
Its wandering vision
To flower-book turn.
The rose is my psalter,
My beads are its dew,
And while they are shining
My vows I'll renew.

The Tea Party.

ONLY A SKETCH.

'How stupid the country is—I am literally expiring of ennui,' murmured, or rather lisped, the sentimental Miss Smith to Madeline Courtland, who was sitting beside her at a tea-party, given in honor of the city bleu, by Mrs. Anderson, one of the leaders of our village ton.

'I have never found it other than delightful and full of interest,' replied Madeline.

'But there is so little society congenial to a cultivated taste—so little good for the intellect—in fine, such a literary vacuum pervading country society, I wonder how a person of your refinement can tolerate it,' murmured the petite bleu again, softly drooping the long lashes over her soft eyes, and sighing so very delicately that Madeline was involuntarily reminded of a zephyr breathing itself away among rose-leaves.

'I do not,' replied Madeline, 'find a great degree of literary acquirement among the common people in the country, neither have I been so fortunate as to find more of it in the city.' But my neighbors are good hearted, most of them, and passably well informed. They are also free from many of the foolish vanities of city life.'

'But such persons as Mrs. Bunker and Miss Hapgood—dear me! The very sight of them destroys the harmony of my nerves. And only see—that odious creature is actually approaching us! Where shall I flee, or how escape?'

While the little bleu was shuddering at the thought of the plebeian contact to which she was exposed, Mrs. Bunker was steadily moving onward, like some ponderous vehicle, toward the sofa where Miss Smith was gracefully reclining. The dainty lady drew herself with great dignity to the farthest corner, and Mrs. Bunker sat down in the centre.

'Well, Miss Smith,' said she, with good-natured familiarity, 'have you got acquainted with any of our country girls yet? Here's Madeline here—she's educated, and can talk book-talk with you I s'pose—though many on us aint much learnt. I read, when I's a young woman, a sweet putty story called the "Noble Wanderers;" and I read the "Mysteries of Udolpho;" and I read Cotton Mather against the Quakers; and—Oh! I don't know how many more—but since I have been married, I have had other matters to see to, as I s'pose you'll have some day. They say you're a poetress, Miss Smith. I never had much of a fancy for poetry. I used to know a few songs when I was a young woman—"Chivy Chase" was one—did you ever hear it? 'twas about Duggles, and Percy, and Withrinton—I've forgot it all but one verse, and I remember that because my father, in the time of the Revolution war, was sarved very much so. It's a terrible affectin' thing—like this:—

"Of Withrinton I make my moan
Like one in doleful dumps;
When both his feet were smitten off,
He fought upon his stumps."

'Oh horrid!' shrieked the petite bleu in the softest imaginable tone; 'What odious doggrel! I pray you, Mrs. Bunker, spare any farther infliction of this literary torture, or I shall certainly expire!'

'In spite of modern refinements, and the fastidiousness of the new school poets,' said Madeline, 'I have much affection for old ballads of this "Chevy Chase" class. But I will not enter into a defence of them, lest I shock you even more than Mrs. Bunker has by her quotation.'

'I hear you conversing upon literary subjects,' said Mrs. Anderson, approaching them from the opposite side of the room. 'It reminds me, Madeline, that I have not yet shown you my new library. Perhaps, Miss Smith, you will like to accompany us; and as many of the other ladies as choose, will be so kind as to follow.'

Miss Hapgood offered her arm to Miss Smith. The little lady, four feet, one inch and a half, in height, was barely able to hook her delicate little fingers upon the tall lady's elbow, and thus linked they proceeded to the library.

'Oh! I shall feel quite at home here, Mrs. Anderson,' softly exclaimed Miss Smith, with a musical lengthening of each emphatic word. 'What so perfectly fascinating as books and flowers! Beautiful interpreters of the heart!' she added, apostrophizing a vase of brilliant exotics which stood upon the table; 'how much you can reveal that the lips may never utter; how much you have revealed to me in hours that fled too quickly away!' It was a very low, but very audible sigh which succeeded; and Mrs. Bunker who had arrived in season to hear this beautiful episode of sentiment, inquired of Miss Hapgood, in a whisper, if she did not suppose the poor little girl had been disappointed.

'My dear Miss Courtland,' continued la petite bleu, 'have not you a passion for flowers?'

'I love them,' replied Madeline, quietly, turning over the leaves of an old black-letter volume.

'Pray what fragment of antiquity have you there?'

'A church book, printed in the time of Wickliffe. It has a great "odor of sanctity" coming to us from that bright day-break of Christianity.'

Not being versed in subjects of this kind, the little lady turned to the book-shelves, and after a fastidious search, drew forth a small volume of French plays. 'Ah! Racine, my favorite; do you not love him? so tender, such beautiful language!'

'I have read but few French works, and Racine is not of the number,' replied Madeline, 'but from Blair's criticisms I had imbibed the opinion of him that you express.'

Truth to tell, la petite bleu had read less of the plays than Miss Courtland, but she remembered what she had learned of them when she studied rhetoric at school, and what little real knowledge she did possess was of that caoutchouc na- ture that can so easily be made to display a large surface.

'What a queer dress that woman wears—quite too masculine, I declare!' exclaimed Miss Hapgood, who prided herself greatly upon the strict ideas of feminine propriety, pointing, as she spoke, to a painting which hung in a corner of the room.

'A woman! Ah, no!' said la petite, 'it is one of those gallant knights of chivalry, who fought for honor and for the ladies. What a beautiful countenance he has! Alas for romance! the days of knighthood are past, and chivalry is but a name!'

'Pardon me,' said Madeline, 'but I believe you have misinterpreted the picture. Do you not observe the title written underneath?'

'O yes!' cried Mrs. Bunker, 'Jane Dark, and a lot more of German, or Greek, or some other outlandish stuff. Jane Dark! It should be Jane White, I think, don't you, Madeline?'

'Permit me to read it to you, ladies,' said Miss Smith, for it is written in sweet françois, a language I read with great facility;' and with great facility, but with a very bad accent she read; 'Jeanne d'Arc recoissant son pere au Cathédrale a Rheims.'

The ladies bowed in token of the favor she had conferred on them; and Mrs. Anderson politely explained, to such as did not understand, the historical scope of the picture. Tea being announced, the party left the library, and la petite bleu was this time so fortunate as to secure Madeline's arm, and to be seated beside her at table. But she had no opportunity to luxuriate in sentiment, for Miss Hapgood secured Miss Courtland's attention to a fresh chapter of village news.

'Mr. Southey and Miss Newland walked together, last evening, and it is a fact that they are engaged.'

'Persons sometimes walk together who are not engaged,' replied Madeline.

'I think it improper to do so—highly; especially where the lady is so much below the gentleman, as Miss Newland is below Mr. Southey.'

'Below him? How so?'

'Why, in rank, and intellectual attainments.'

'Republicans admit of no rank but the rank of mind. So far as moral excellence is concerned, Miss Newland is not unworthy a place beside Mr. Southey. Her intellectual attainments may not be as great, but she has an intelligent mind, and a refined taste. I think her a very sweet girl.'

'She has a way of appearing sweet, I know. But she has a great deal of art as well as nature. If Mr. Southey does marry her, he will lose much of his reputation.'

'It will be a kind of reputation, then, not worth preserving,' said Madeline. 'But I am not of those who believe that any matrimonial engagement is existing between them. There is a strong friendship—intimacy, if you please, but it is warranted by past circumstances, and it is hallowed by the most perfect congeniality of feeling and taste.'

'You will find it hallowed by marriage soon, or I am greatly mistaken; and my word for it, it is her pretty face and artful manners which have misled him. He will rue the day he takes her to his home, or I am no true prophet.'

'God forbid that you should be, if such be the consequence of the event you foretell,' replied Madeline in a low voice, but with a deep emphasis.

'Oh! Miss Smith, I've got an arrant to you from my daughter Angeline,' suddenly exclaimed Mrs. Bunker; 'she has a thing they call an Album—a kind of a book full of love-verses, you know—and she told me to ask you if you would write her a piece. She said she had heard that you could make beautiful verses, and she thought it would be a great honor to get a piece of your composition. Madeline here has written something—I believe hers, though, is but one or two lines from Scripser. But Angeline wants some verses from you all of your own make.'

'I am obliged to Miss Bunker,' replied la petite faintly, 'but I never write except in the Albums of particular friends. I esteem it a mockery for an indifferent heart to pour forth songs of affection save to its chosen spirit-loves.'

'Oh well, let it be a little good advice then, or anything that's common and free to all. Angeline only wants a scrap of your own manufacture, and won't be pertickeler about the quality.'

'Indeed, you talk as though the expression of the soul in verbal melody were akin to mechanical labor. It is an impalpable impulse of the soul creating a march of language fitted to its own music; it cannot be made mechanical.'

'Your stilts are too tall, Miss Smith; I can't understand you.'

'I do not expect to be understood except by spirits of my own element,' sighed the bleu, quite overcome by Mrs. Bunker's want of elegance.

Tea being through, Mrs. Anderson was glad of an opportunity to give her guests greater freedom to mingle with 'spirits of their own element,' and they returned to the parlor, la petite bleu and Madeline arm in arm.

'How delightful to escape the contact of such minds,' whispered the little lady, pressing Madeline's hand. 'My dear friend, how much I love you. I find a world of sympathy in your cultivated mind. How can you endure living in the midst of such a herd of creatures?'

'I am one of the herd myself,' replied Madeline, laughing. 'I am little troubled with fastidiousness of taste, and really enjoy the conversation of a good-hearted "creature" like Mrs. Bunker. I wonder that you should be pleased with a being of such homespun tastes and matter-of-fact qualities as myself.'

'Oh my dear Madeline, how can you say so! You are quite one of the angelic order, and I know we should soon form an undying friendship.'

The party being once more assembled in the parlor, with exhilarated spirits, (tea is an excellent stimulant,) the evening passed in rapid conversation, in which gossip, literature, and colloquies upon domestic matters, were agreeably interspersed; and at the hour of candle-light the party interchanged the usual compliments, and withdrew to their homes. So ended the tea-party.

N. B. Just a month after this la petite bleu returned to the city, very much shocked that Miss Newland was preferred to herself as bridesmaid at the marriage of Mr. Southey with her 'dear friend' Madeline Courtland.

The Moonbeam.

QUIETLY to the still earth it fell,
Lingered awhile in the mossy dell,
Kissed the lips of the blue harebell,
Then merrily danced away,—
Over the meadow and over the hill,
Silvered the foam of the dashing rill,—
But soon 'twas tired of play.

So it stole to where the sick one lay,
And cheered her heart by its pure mild ray,
As if waiting to bear her soul away,
To a realm where pain is not;
But the spirit was slow to leave the frame,
And soar to its God from whom it came,

And the Moonbeam left the spot.
It went to the sleeping infant's bed,
And played awhile round his curly head,
Then through his dreams a brightness shed,
Till his face was lit with joy;

It seemed to fear it should wake the child,
By making his dreams so glad and wild;
And it left the happy boy.

It hied away to the man of crime,
As he turned his ear to the convent chime,
Whose brow was wrinkled before its time,
By much, and by sinful care;
And as it fell on his forehead high,
His eyes turned up to the deep blue sky,
And earnestly rested there.

Then thoughts of the God who reigns above,
Who e'en on him had showered his love,
And waited to send the mystic dove,
Though he long to good had slept,—
Rushed on his mind, brought back the past
With its cruel deeds, from first to last,
And long the repentant wept.

The silvery ray left the blessed sight,
And sped to the lofty mountain-height,
Where it met a beam of morning light,
And its brightness fled away;
But its hours had been all fraught with good;
It would not stay if awhile it could,
And it yielded unto Day.

Our Duty—in view of the Future.

BY REV. JOHN G. ADAMS.

'ONE Kingdom only, still enduring stands;
One Kingdom, founded not on human power:
It spreads its holy conquests through all lands,
And ministers to all its glorious dower:
Its sway will reach wherever man hath trod,—
The universal kingdom of our God!'

FROM a faithful survey of the past, we learn that in the progression of the human mind, the Gospel of Impartial Grace has gone onward beyond the most ardent expectations of its friends. From our knowledge in relation to the present, we are led to give thanks that this gospel, though 'every where spoken against,' is yet finding its way into many hearts,—that daily accessions to its ranks are witnessed, and that it stands as it ever stood, in the power of God, and not in the wisdom of man. We are thus directed into THE FUTURE, with abundant hope that gospel truth will increase until it shall every where prevail, and ignorance, darkness, sorrow and sighing shall flee away. The contemplation of such an event should lead us to seek, to learn, and to DO OUR DUTY.

Although we have before us and with us continually the promise of Almighty God, that his word shall be triumphant, that it shall go on from conquering to conquer, until the mountain of his holiness and truth 'shall be established in the top of the mountains, and exalted above the hills, and all nations shall flow unto it,'—yet we are not to lose sight of the great duties devolving on us who believe this word.

Because we are assured of the providential care of our Father above, we should not deem it consistent to make no exertion to obtain the blessings and comforts of life. So if God has providentially given us his assurance that 'all the earth shall remember and turn unto him, and all the kindreds of the nations come up before him to glorify his name,' we are not to be indifferent to the great cause of his truth;—we are not to fold our arms and say, 'Let the work go on, if God hath said it,'—and then go to sleep! God works by means. Human ability—human power are in his hands. He works by means of human hearts sanctified by the truth. In this way, he has accomplished wonders in time past,—and thus will he triumph in the future. He calls on us who have received the Lord Jesus Christ as the Sent of God—the Brightness of his Father's glory—the Mediator between God and men, who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time;—he calls on us as professed lovers of his gospel, that we let our light shine,—that we hold it up, that the world may see it, and glorify the name of our God;—that we give our example not only of steadfastness, but of zeal,—active, discreet, ever-operative zeal in the prosecution of the Christian reformation.

When we have gazed with delight on the 'exceeding great and precious promises' of the Scriptures,—when we have heard these promises till our hearts rejoice in the sound thereof, and we feel within us the strength of faith, and hope, and love which causes 'full assurance' that 'all shall know the Lord from the least even unto the greatest,'—we are not to imagine that this will justify the least delinquency on our part in the great work of evangelizing the world.

No,—that same zeal which prompts us to erect temples of Christian worship, support the gospel ministry, and keep in sacred observance the Christian ordinances;—that same spirit which impels us to go up to the house of the Lord from Sabbath to Sabbath to listen to the instructions of Christianity,—must work with increased and unabating energy upon the human mind, until its darkness is removed, its errors are effaced, the work of divine grace is fully wrought within it, and our race universally shall find their highest glory in doing the will of the Everlasting Parent and God of all.

How then shall we best perform our share of this holy work of turning men 'from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God?' Let us understand that we should

1. Acquaint ourselves with the doctrines of the Gospel, so that we be able to define and defend them. If we would understand any science, we must study it. Christianity is a divine science; and we are called upon to make ourselves acquainted with it through the medium of the word of God. Although this word is so simple that the way-faring man need not err therein, yet it must be understood—if we would profit by it, and make it effectual in the great work of moral progress and improvement.

Every one who sincerely desires to witness the promotion of gospel truth, so that the name and the praise of Jehovah shall be one from the rising to the going down of the sun, has so much of active duty to perform. Let this be remembered. We owe it to ourselves—to our fellow men—to the age in which we live—to the future—to our God. And if we would work well, we must know what to work with. We must have at hand the weapons of truth;—and we must know how to use them. It is our duty to make ourselves familiar with the Scriptures,—to study them carefully, attentively, frequently. There are too many in our congregations, unacquainted with the true light herein revealed; too many who, however strong they may be in faith, have not accustomed themselves to the use of those strong and reasonable arguments which when well understood, do such good and efficient work for the truth, when this truth is assailed by the wisdom or 'cunning craftiness' of this world.

There is an error known to us all, which I pray God we may strive to overcome every where throughout our denomination;—an error which should be unknown in the holy temple of Christian Light. It is the error of intellectual inaction, in reference to gospel truth. There are those among us who have no lack of intellectual vigor and action on other topics, who seem not to lay hold on their religious faith as though it were dearest of all their possessions. They would not dishonor the truth; but they do not seek to make others understand it. If they are attacked on theological ground, they are either not able to define their own doctrine, not having attentively studied it; or else defend themselves in as brief and effectual a manner as possible, and then, instead of taking up patient and enduring labor with their opponent—seeking to instruct him in the true doctrine of spiritual salvation—are silent and inactive until another attack shall be made.

Now we need a new order of things in relation to this subject. We need well instructed gospel servants in every rank of our Christian army,—those who study the word of God, and who love to study it,—and who have enough of the missionary spirit in them to seek, not mere jarring, captious controversy,—but religious doctrinal and practical conversation with their neighbors, friends and associates of the various sects and names; so that they may always be doing something, be it ever so little, for ‘the truth as it is in Jesus.’ Such preparation of the mind, and such faithful employment of our talents for the advancement and prosperity of the gospel, will serve to increase the numbers of those who love the truth; it will swell that mighty tide of overflowing grace which is yet to fill the whole earth ‘as the waters cover the sea.’

2. We should also strive for the Christian graces, that our lives speak in favor of the truth.

The admonition of Paul to a young brother, to live so ‘that those of the contrary part should have no evil thing to say’ of him, speaks to all who have named Christ as their great spiritual instructor. It was the confession of Pilate after his examination of Jesus with intent to impeach his character, that he found in him ‘no fault at all.’ Those who have espoused that cause in which the Apostles labored, and for which Jesus suffered and died, should strive to ‘walk honestly towards those who are without.’ The conduct will speak where other arguments may not reach.

Our doctrine points to the perfection of the human character. It says, ‘Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.’ It urges us onward in every good work. And every one who has avowed this doctrine, is morally and sacredly bound to lay aside every unlawful weight, and every besetting sin, and adorn the cause of his Master with a well ordered life. No matter in what society he moves, or how others around him may indulge in their aberrations from the path of duty,—he is to have the true standard before him,—he is to aim at the discipleship of a true Christian ‘Israelite in whom there is no guile.’ If he stands alone, he must not shrink from duty on this account. One true soldier of the cross will accomplish much for the cause of the great Captain of his salvation. And besides;—the knowledge of the Lord implies PERSONAL HOLINESS. This knowledge can only truly advance as men become baptized soul and spirit into the wisdom, power, and love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. When therefore we read of the universal prevalence of divine truth, we are to understand that it signifies the universal reign of holiness unto God,—the sanctification of the human mind by the truth, and that every heart thus moulded, thus sanctified, adds to the influence by which all shall know the Lord from the least unto the greatest.

3. We should patiently endure opposition. It is not to be expected that we can seek to disseminate our religious opinions in the world without opposition. There ever has been opposition to the truth,—and there ever will be, while a single heart remains unreconciled to God. The sensual mind, the bigot, the lover of the praise of man, the spiritually proud and self-righteous,—all rise up against it;—and those who go out in the name of the Lord, are called upon to arm themselves with the same weapons used by Christ and his apostles. They were willing to labor and suffer reproach, because they trusted in the living God—the Savior of all men, especially of them that believe.’ They rejoiced that they were accounted worthy even to suffer persecution for Christ’s sake. Although comparatively feeble in numbers, they were strong in the Lord and in the power of his might; knowing that tribulation worked patience, and patience experience, and experience hope, and that hope maketh not ashamed, because of the love of God shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Spirit.

Here then are our examples. May we not, by means in our possession, by the word of God, by the armor of righteousness on the right hand and on the left, by pureness, by knowledge, by long-suffering, by kindness, by the Holy Spirit, by love unfeigned,—turn aside the weapons directed against us, cause even the wrath of opposition to redound to the glory of God and his truth, and thus go on from triumph to triumph in the great moral revolution now at work on the earth?

Let us, then, in all the opposition we meet, give back no ‘railing for railing, but contravise blessing.’ Remember this, that we have, all, the imperfections of human nature upon us: also, that many who oppose us, know nothing of our sentiments, and therefore know not what manner of spirit they are of, when they utter denunciations against the only doctrine that can save them, and all their fellow sinners of the great family of man.

In view of the opposition now waged against us, we must keep the true ground of patience and love. The gospel advances—and its enemies cry out in rage—gnash their teeth—or wag their heads in opposition to it. But who shall heed this? We must look beyond this mist of bigotry, and see the clear light of truth shining on, and be ourselves led of this light. Then no weapon formed against us shall prosper, and every tongue that rises against us shall be condemned. The human mind cannot go back. It will go on for the truth! God has promised that his word shall triumph; that his knowledge shall fill the earth as the waters cover the sea. Let us rejoice, and serve him with gladness all our days. 'O give thanks unto the Lord!—For he is good, his mercy is everlasting, and his TRUTH endureth to all generations.'

Shall we know each other in Heaven?

BY REV. GEORGE ROGERS.

LET no one suppose this an idle or trifling question, for it is not such—no question is to be lightly passed which so deeply interests the human affections as does this. The stoical, I know, will be apt impatiently to ask, 'Why push curiosity into the dim territories of conjecture, when it might be employed about things which can be known with certainty?—Why tantalize the mind with inquiries into subjects, which, from their very nature, must ever continue in the same obscurity to us while we remain on this side the grave?' Begging his pardon, I must take leave to say, that although curiosity cannot be fully, and authoritatively satisfied in regard to points of this nature, yet a high degree of moral assurance is attainable in respect to them, and this—considering how very, very deeply they concern the heart—is surely an attainment of no trifling value.

On what ground, I pray, are doubts entertained as to our being able to recognize each other in heaven? I have heard some quote to this point, Christ's discourse with the Sadducees touching the resurrection. I confess my perception is very much at fault if this has any thing to do with the matter; to me nothing more seems implied in Christ's language, than that, in the spirit world, we shall not be parcelled out into families, and separate social compacts, as in this more gross and selfish state, but that the relations and interests among us will be common—there being neither Barbarian nor Scythian, Gentile nor Jew, male nor female, bond nor free, but all being one in Christ.

The notion that we shall not know each other in heaven, is kindred to the one which supposes, that we shall have no remembrance of this existence, or of any thing pertaining to the past. A most unphilosophical fancy, as I judge. What conceivable use, then, can be assigned to the present existence? What purpose is answered by our present joys, sorrows, hopes, disappointments, experience of virtue and its attendant happiness—of vice and its accompanying misery? Are the lessons we thus learn—I may add thus dearly learn—to be lost to us forever? Surely, in this case, our present life is a blank, and our being will not in reality have commenced until it begins in heaven! We graduate in a school of affliction, and are to be none the wiser for the degrees we take in mental and moral suffering! Does any wisdom—any benevolence appear in this, on the part of our Heavenly Father? To me it seems not—most decidedly not. Our present suffering might well have been spared us, since, according to this fantasy, it takes place not as a means to an end, but for its own sake solely! Paul certainly was not of this opinion, he taught that, 'our light afflictions which are but for a moment, work out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory,' and I find it hard to believe that in our enjoyment of the end we shall have forgotten all about the means by which it was effected.

Some, however imagine, that it must necessarily militate against the felicity of heaven to retain a remembrance of the previous existence. 'We cannot reflect but with pain,' say they, 'on the sinful acts we committed—the wrongs we did to each other—the instances of ingratitude toward God, &c., which characterized our lives while in the flesh.' In this opinion, however, the fact is lost sight of, that we shall see all these things to have been most triumphantly overruled by the Divine Being to ends of infinite benevolence—that, in fact, they were parts and parcels of the great scheme of means by which Jehovah was working out his ultimate purposes of goodness. And will it lessen our enjoyment of God's love, think you, or our estimate of the adorable ness of his grace, to remember the depths of darkness and guilt from which he condescended to save us? And how, I pray, are we to duly appreciate the divine goodness as displayed in the scheme of redemption, if we shall have forgotten the life, and death, and sufferings, of the Son of God, by whom our redemption was wrought out? It must be seen that, in every view of the case, the notion I am combatting is opposed to the deductions of reason, and the most clearly warranted inferences from revelation.

Moreover, there is a sacredness in the human affections, which renders the notion a very improbable one that they shall be obliterated when this life terminates. How holy, for instance, is a mother's love! In constituting thus strong the ties which thus link heart to heart, are we to suppose that the Creator designed them for this existence only? Why, then, do we so yearn over the graves of those we loved? And why does the eye look hopefully forward through its tears to a prospective re-union? Oh! do not these hopes imply a purpose on the part of him who constituted these holy affections, that, though subject to the shocks arising from the changes of this brief and probationary existence, they shall be renewed in a world, in which the ligaments of union between soul and soul, shall be as lasting, as the bond betwixt his own infinite love and every sentient creature in the universe? To me they seem to imply this beyond a doubt, and I hence most confidently adopt the conclusion, that, in heaven we shall recognize all those with whom we had an acquaintance upon earth, for otherwise when we lost a friend by death, or other severing circumstances, that friend would be virtually lost to us for ever more.

Thank God! there is no necessity for our sorrowing when those we love are taken from our embraces, 'as those who have no hope' that they shall be again and forever restored to us. Oh, how effectually the stricken heart can solace itself with this blessed assurance! We can look confidently forward to that blissful abode of spirits, when bowed down by bereavement, and feel a heaven of consolation in the thought, that, though our friends cannot return to us, we shall ere long go to them, and be with them for ever.

WHEN thou seest a fellow mortal pining under the scorching rays of a deadly fever, alone in an obscure chamber, quietly put for his pillow thy affections, gently bearing him to his last resting place, leaving sweet smiles upon him.

Song of the Summer Wind.

I BLOW not in wrath, as the wintry winds blow,
When they stir the dry leaves or whirl the white snow;
I moan not in sadness o'er dead forest trees,
But I sing and I dance—I'm a light summer breeze.

I come from the South, and from thence do I bring
The sweets that I scatter, the songs that I sing;
I dip on the sea, and laugh at the spray,
When I see how it shines on a bright sunny day.

I skip o'er the mountains, from thence to the plain,
And then to the mountains I tower again;
And, cooled with the dews which I steal from their heads,
I dance gaily on through the sweet flower beds.

O'er meadows and cornfields I leap in my glee,
And they bend to and fro like the waves of the sea;
Through the dark woods I glide, and the trees—how they swing
Their tall branches round, and the leaves—how they sing!

And then, where the streamlets are hieing along,
I readily join in their lullaby song,
And curl them in ripples, then leap with them o'er
The flowers which bend from the emerald shore.

The streets of the city—its steeples and towers,
Its proud habitations, its lowliest flowers,
All welcome me to them—but here I am chilled
With the north-eastern blast, and soon shall be killed.

The Minister's Widow.

BY MRS. L. B. J. CASE.

COME with me, gentle reader, not where pomp has built her halls, or fashion spread her decorations, not even where the woodbine and the clematis—those draperies of rural taste, curtain the windows of some sweet, poetical, cottage, but to an old fashioned mansion, venerable, and moss-garnished by time, and speaking to us most solemnly of the past.

There it stands, separated from the village road by a large enclosure, with an old elm keeping watch by the gate. It has sheltered the pastimes of childhood, and waved over the bier, when it waited there for its burthen, and its long branches drooped from their home, far up in the glad sunshine, as if they held sympathy with the tears of earth. That house bears not the marks of neglect. The careful hand has been busier than time, and the appendages of comfort are more visible there, than in many a more imposing mansion. This is the home of the Minister's Widow, not the home of her early life, nor yet of her wedded happiness, but of her widowed loneliness, of the years, when sorrow, and bereavement, were weighing down upon her. There are rose-trees under the window, and weeping willows, also. The green grass-plot is as neat as possible, but younger, and stronger hands than hers have kept it thus, and trimmed the luxuriant shrubbery, that was planted by those who have long laid in the mould. There she has wept, and prayed, as one after another, the voices she loved, died away in silence. Here, she has received comfort from above, as the whispers of the ascending spirit grew faint on her ear, and turned, with renewed strength, to the duties yet left for her hand. It is now to her almost a lonely home. We will enter.

She is sitting there, by that open window. Her failing limbs have refused to bear her out into the soft spring air, but it comes in, through the casement, on her furrowed cheek, as mild as the gentle spirit that is there, waiting the hour of its release. She will not wait long. The messenger has summoned her, and she is ready. She has been ready, many long years, not impatient, but willing to go. The Lord's time is her time. She has no dread of death. Why should she have? He has been her guest many a time, and he was not fearful. She has looked upon his skeleton face, till it became as the face of a familiar friend, and her heart has followed his long, bony finger, as it pointed to the skies. He has guided thither, those who were dear, and she is now looking for him to pilot her there also. And he is at hand, close at hand, and will soon be here again.

Thou art young, gentle reader, and perchance, a worshipper of beauty, an idolater at the shrine of fair brows, and rosy lips, and sunny tresses. Look at that face. The lips yet wear a tinge of red, and the dark, hazel eyes are scarcely less lustrous than before time had cast such sadness on them. Thou thinkest their brightness is of earth, the lingering gleam of the radiant, morning sunshine, reflected through these faded hours—but look again. It is Faith, and heavenly Trust, that have replaced the fires of youth. It is the light of immortal life that has shed on them, this its witness on that furrowed face. Not one earthly beautiful beam. Not one unholy thought has left passion has wrought deformity on that sunken cheek. It may well be doubted if she was ever angry, even at sin. How could she be? It was a dead letter to her. She could no more understand its morbid cravings, than the infant of a day. There was no chord in her heart that responded to its unhealthy fancies, but, though she might not appreciate the force of temptation, or the virtue of resistance, she wept for the sinner, as the victim of impulses she could not comprehend, and prayed for him, and left him with his God. This was all, save, perchance, a mild remonstrance, that her meek, and placid spirit could do towards the offender.

Those lines are not the pencillings of remorse, of unthankfulness, or of murmuring. These stamp far different characters on the face; but Raphael, himself, could not more palpably embody the refined mind, and Christian temper, or more faithfully delineate the loveliness of a pure soul, than has the unflattering artist, Time. That countenance, wrapped as it is in the habiliments of decay, is yet luminous with beauty that shall outshine the stars, the beauty of those eternal principles that smile at change and death. Look at her now. She is speaking of the dead. Is not heaven written on her face? Dost thou not see Faith, Hope, and Resignation, as plainly as thou seest that mortal clay, and dost thou now doubt the reality of those angel influences? Nay, is not thine own faith in the things that belong to a future life, deepened, and strengthened, by the sight? Thou seest not now, a feeble child of the dust, just dropping into an open grave, but a spirit, made perfect through suffering, about to ascend to its congenial skies. Thou seest a soul, that has passed the ordeal of affliction, such as seldom falls to the human lot, meekly enduring, for the love of God, all His appointments, now, about to cast aside its earthly vestments, and go to His more immediate presence. It has put on its spiritual adornments, and waits for its immortal change. Thou lookest to see the clay fall off, and the angel stand unveiled before us. But it may not be. It has not yet fulfilled its earthly mission. It has an enduring lesson to engrave upon our hearts, and perchance, the hearts of others, and then—it will go home.

She is speaking of the dead. There lie her heaviest sorrows. For more than half her life, her house has been the abode of sickness and mourning. Her friends have died, one after another, by slow, and wearing disease, and, through the long watches she has tended them as none other than the devoted christian, wife, and mother, can tend the dying. She has been sustained as none but those who live for immortality, can be sustained. No sooner was the head of one laid on its last pillow, and her heart in some measure accustomed to the vacant place, than another sickened, and the same anxiety came, the same watching, and the same parting. Thus has passed the larger portion of the years allotted to her, and with all this, a feeble constitution was super-added, and often illness. Yet she went on, suffering in meekness, taking her cross patiently, and blessing God—doing deeds of charity, and comforting those who were passing through lighter trials, than were laid on her own spirit. And now the last glimmer of life must go out in an almost lonely home. Those for whom she has waked, and wept, and prayed; those to whom, in the natural course of events, she might have looked to soothe her last hours, have gone before her, and she is alone.

Askest thou what is her reward, or of what avail is it to live in integrity of heart? Look again at that face, listen to the calm, hopeful manner with which she speaks of the departed, and thou wilt be answered. Note the placid smile, the peace, that dwells on every furrowed feature. The repose of the immortal life has already begun in her soul. Thou wouldest say, she had been tended from youth until now, by a most loving hand. Are not our Father's dealings loving, though stern? Thou wouldest say she had but passed down a gentle declivity, and not trodden a rugged path. And so indeed she has done. A soul that is at peace with itself, and with heaven, is not sorely wounded by the things of earth. No passion-storms have uprooted the early graces of her spirit, but all things holy, and kind, and trusting, have flourished there more luxuriantly, than when that spirit put forth gladness beneath the sunshine of human love. Along her way, she has listened only to the voice from on high, and that is ever singing 'Peace!' 'Peace!' though sorrow, and pain, raise the cry of lamentation, and, not unfrequently, of rebellion, also. God has been the polar-star of her life and conscience, a smiling friend. Memory has been a well-spring of delights. The days of her youth, and of her wedded happiness, come back to her with pleasant associations. As voice after voice died away in her home, she listened for them in faith, and heard them rejoicing in the skies. As her friends vanished from her view, she wept their loss, but through her tears, she saw more vividly, the face of her Father in heaven, and were they not gone to Him? Thus do the smiles of the dead visit her with soothing, and not with the sadness that gathers around doubt and despair. The death-bed was not a thought to be shunned, for her religious eye saw all things through the colorings of faith; and what beauty has this world to one, thus educated for another? Now, thou wilt not deem she has been unhappy, though bowed almost to the dust, with her manifold burthens, nor wilt thou ask again where an humble, and trusting, and pious spirit, meets its reward.

But thy mind is pondering another question. Thou askest, Why are these things thus? Thou askest why one so meek, and so full of all spiritual excellence, should thus linger to weep over silent graves? The physiologist will coldly tell thee of hereditary debility of constitution, and talk of neglected physical laws, that bring on a premature death, but this will not satisfy thee. The question only recedes. For what purpose were all the circumstances of these different individuals, so ordered, or permitted, as to bear, in this peculiar manner, on the destiny of the person now before us? Here, reason and physiology, learned as they are, must confess themselves both at fault. Eternity alone must solve the mystery. The Holy word teaches, that the 'ways of God are not as our ways, nor His thoughts, as our thoughts.' Even with our limited vision, we may see blessings accruing from this allotment of His Providence, nor are we capable of judging how far-extended may be its healthy influence, in the wide-spread, and indefinite ramifications of His spiritual economy. Thou and I, have learned a moral lesson. We have drawn nearer to the future life. We have looked upon the loveliness of a spirit, arrayed for the land of spirits; and is it not beautiful, most beautiful? We have seen Faith, Holiness, and Trust, palpably as we see one another, and we doubt no longer the immortality of their nature. We have looked upon the soul, and feel that it exists, the materialist, to the contrary, notwithstanding, and that it is eternal also, for God, himself, has stamped it with an indestructible charm. We have had a glimpse of heaven. We have seen how it can be brought down into the human spirit, by a conformity to the will of God. We have learned a juster appreciation of what we once prized too highly, of those qualities, that however fair and fascinating, must be stripped from the spirit, as it goes forth to its future home. And even the sweet ties of affection have lost somewhat of their value, love, the holiest, and purest, that makes life glorious with its coloring; for all these must be laid down at the threshold of the grave, and God be 'all in all' to the soul.

We are stronger, also, not in our own strength, but in that from above, for we have seen that our Father never forsakes, though he afflicts, the heart that gives itself to him, and meekly leans upon him, and strives to obey his laws, and that, even in the darkest hours, he visits it, with heavenly communion. And the bliss of that communion! Well has it been promised as the blessing of the 'pure in heart!' Life, in the fullness of its realized ideals, in the complete success of its dearest hopes, has not one moment to compare with it, though it be granted among poverty, disease, in the presence of worldly disappointment, and in the chamber of death! We have learned, also, the necessity of cultivating that which will be perpetual, and the folly of wasting immortal love on things of perishing value. And now, canst thou see no good resulting from the example of her holiness amid suffering, her patience, her beautiful trust? Even if no other souls have been touched by a sanctifying influence, can we say that all this has come upon her in vain? But we know not how much, in her spiritual advancement, these solemn and mournful lessons, have been the powerful agents. That belongs to God. But have we not learned a teaching, still more important to us, instead of questioning the designs of God, to trust him, meekly and prayerfully, and therein to find our own reward?

We must now leave the Minister's Widow, but she will never depart from our memories. We shall see her no more on earth—but, in that world, where all the children of God meet in purity and blessedness, we shall recognize that lovely spirit, not as now, making beautiful its falling temple, with its own inherent radiance, but glorious in its freedom from all that is kindred with decay.

Our lives may be long, or brief—as our Father pleases;—but we will pray, that in seasons of lonely gloom, in hours of temptation and trial, he will bless, to our immortal good, the recollection of our visit to the Minister's Widow.

A little patience, reader, and we part. Shouldst thou tell the tale of what we have seen, it may be considered by some as a well-wrought fiction, but do thou say, it is no dream of the fancy, but a faithful, though feeble transcript of the emotions raised, by looking on one, who embodies, as near as may be, the thought of a spirit made perfect. Do thou say that it is an affectionate testimonial of the worth of one, who has now but a slight hold on earth, but whose memory should never pass away. And if any should recognize the original, in this faint, and imperfect portraiture, tell them, that the heart that dictated it, sensibly feels its want of power to delineate that likeness, in its beautiful exactness, but, among the causes of its gratitude to God, would place, as one of the highest, the intimate knowledge of one, whose walk has ever been with Him.

Song of the Wild Bird.

'COME! come! here I be!'

Sang a wild bird from the tree
To his mate, who all the day
Had been seeking where to lay.
'Here's a nook so snug and warm,
'Twill shield us from the ruthless storm;
Here we'll build our cosy nest,
Here our weary wings we'll rest.

'Summer's sun again will bring
Her mantle green, and o'er us fling
Its living folds; and music clear,
Our spirits sad at eve will cheer;
And when o'er the waters bright
Aurora flings her golden light,
Glad we'll join the choral throng,
And raise to God our matin song.'

Pure-souled bird! thou didst not dream
Deceit lurked those folds between,— Stirred by every breeze they'd part,
Expose thee to the fowler's dart!
Oft has earth's unfeeling group
Caused the spirit's wing to droop,—
Oft deceit and wily art
Chilled the warm and trusting heart.

The danger of tampering with Vice. No. 1.

BY REV. E. H. CHAPIN.

WE propose in this essay to treat of the peril of the least tampering with vice—the danger of small temptations. It is well for us to apply our remedies to a disease in its commencement—to go back to the fountain of dark and bitter waters, and stay them there. Our age is distinguished for the manner in which we are treating public evils. We are beginning to look at their sources. We are beginning to feel that one effectual action upon the causes of crime and vice, is far more beneficial than a week's declamation and a whole pamphlet of statistics devoted to the consideration of the vice or crime itself. It is, probably, full as well for the practical good of society as if we had resolved the mystery of evil or squared the circle, that we now perceive that a judicious alleviation of poverty, oppression and distress, prevents a vast amount of those evils that mar the human soul and destroy property and life and honor. We have discovered that school-houses for ignorant boys, are much better than prisons for crime-hardened men—that associations for the prevention of drunkenness and the reformation of the inebriate, are far preferable to retreats for the pauper or the insane. If we go on thus, binding with strong chains the causes of misery and guilt, we bid fair to do more in one half century to remove sin and sorrow from the earth, than all the philosophers and all the schools of uninspired wisdom, through the long succession of the ages. It is not our chief triumph that we have left other generations far below us in the scale of science—that we have almost annihilated distance and time; but that we are laying the hands of an ardent and honest philanthropy upon the springs of moral evil, and stanching the tears and blood of humanity at their sources.

This principle of aiming at the causes of evil, which the age has so extensively adopted—a principle as effectual in practice as it is true in theory; we, in our narrower sphere, propose to employ at this time, hoping that it may have its efficacy where our influence may extend, in causing the tempted to set themselves with a face of flint against the first snare, and the hand that is put forth for an evil act, to draw back with horror—resolved to ‘touch not, taste not, handle not.’

I. We remark, then, in the first place, upon the peril of tampering in the least degree with vice, that it subtracts from the amount of happiness which we otherwise might enjoy, and which the consistently virtuous man actually possesses.

There are two kinds of virtue—negative and positive virtue. The first, if it be proper to consider it as any virtue at all, consists in mere abstinence from evil, for the commission of which evil the person has no temptation—has never had an opportunity or an inducement. With this trait we have now nothing to do. The second kind of virtue—positive virtue—consists either in repentance and reformation from an evil course in which we have been engaged—or in the successful resistance of all temptations to engage in that course. The question arises—which of these is productive of the most happiness? which of these is the most to be desired, and gives the most untroubled peace to the soul? We answer, the latter. The soul that has successfully resisted temptation has won a true victory, while he who has indulged in sin, although he has escaped from it, bears the mark of its yoke, and the scars of its iron bondage. We cannot handle sin with impunity. We cannot go thus far, and if we go no farther escape scot-free. ‘Can a man take fire in his bosom, and his clothes not be burnt? Can one go upon hot coals, and his feet not be burnt?’

We may indulge but a little while in vice. We may but sip of its sparkling waters—tread briefly to its measures. And we may repent of our conduct. We may turn from our course with firm step, and a brave heart, and ever after pursue a different path. And it will be happy for us that we do so. Happy, that we grow not grey in iniquity—that of our youthful vigor and our manly intellect, we spare much for the great labors of duty. But, upright as our after-course may be—calm and serene as our days of virtue may glide; in the depths of the truly repentant heart there will, at times, issue grief for hours mis-spent, and golden opportunities lost—for wrong words spoken, for sinful thoughts cherished, for evil deeds done; that will color memory with hues of regret, and ‘mingle our cup of thanksgiving with penitent tears.’ Let not him who would return from his guilty wanderings be discouraged by this. Far, far different is the sorrow of the repentant son from the misery of the hardened prodigal. While the one is sinking deep and yet deeper in depravity, and plucking with every guilty pleasure a keener sting, the other is progressing still further into that communion of virtue and atmosphere of eternal life, where the memory of the past is lost in the bliss of the present and the bright hope of the future. While, then, we are far from discouraging repentance at any stage, even the deepest, of vice, we cannot withhold the truth that presses itself upon us, that he who commits evil, in that act, subtracts from the amount of happiness he might have enjoyed, and is not so well off as he who successfully resists that evil, and treads firmly on in the path of duty. He comes out of the conflict alive, but he comes out with his armor dented and shorn. ‘He that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption.’ The wider he sows, the more the corruption, to be sure—but still, I see no warrant, no promise in the sentence, that if he sows only a little to the flesh, he shall reap no corruption—much more shall reap good. It is a solemn truth, that needs to be held up prominently and dwelt upon—that we cannot sin in the least, with impunity—we cannot indulge in vice in the smallest degree, and it be, in all respects, as well for us as if we had rejected its temptings.

Our Book Table.

OUR BOOK TABLE will hereafter not only present the volumes we are bound by courtesy to notice, but notices of some of those which attract our attention and in reference to which we may think our readers will be interested. We hope in this way to afford assistance to some of our distant friends, who reside at a far remove from cities and large towns, in selecting valuable and interesting books for the private library. The name of a book is but little—the character must be given otherwise, and we trust that our effort to set forth the claims of good books will not be unacceptable.

POWHATAN; A Metrical Romance, in Seven Cantos. By Seba Smith. We are indebted to Mr. Mussey, of 29 Cornhill for a copy of this beautiful book. Though charmed with its outward appearance we were not prepared for so rich a pleasure as accrued to us from its perusal. 'The author of Powhatan does not presume to claim for his production the merit of good and genuine poetry,' yet we are sure every reader voluntarily accords to it this merit, as well as that of being an interesting romance and a faithful embodiment of the spirit of history. The descriptions are truth-like and beautiful, the narrative animated and straight-forward, the characters exceedingly well delineated, and the language and rhythm appropriate and harmonious. The young people of the United States, to whom our author has dedicated his work, have reason to thank him heartily for contributing to American literature a volume that is destined to enduring popularity, and one, too, which is fabricated entirely of home-produce.

THE LIFE OF COMMODORE PERRY. By Alex. Slidell Mackenzie, U. S. N. in two vols. Family Library, Nos. 126, 127. Among the many excellent biographies of this excellent Library, we have read none which has interested us more than this Life of our own Perry. Indeed, in the whole range of fiction, we remember no hero who equals him in every amiable and chivalrous attribute, or who has more of personal graces and accomplishments by which to captivate, than had the gallant conqueror of Erie. The description of the battle of Erie, and of Perry's noble and magnanimous conduct throughout that trying day, is among the most intensely interesting portions, not only of American, but of the world's history.

STORIES FOR YOUNG PEOPLE By Miss Sedgwick. The author of the 'Love-Token,' whose larger volumes have so long been the delight of maturer minds, has also become a necessary contributor to the libraries of the young. No one can write sweeter stories, or throw into them so many of the fascinations of the 'preached word,' as Caroline Maria Sedgwick. No one can fill them so full of pure and beautiful charity, nor betray in every line so much of the spirit of that love which 'thinketh no evil,' which 'suffereth long and is kind.' The little volume before us, contains twelve stories, beautiful as dreams; some fanciful, some real; some a mingling of each, but all full of the richest and purest morality. Many thanks to our friend of 29 Cornhill, for a copy of this, and the preceding works.

THE MERCHANT'S WIDOW, and other Tales. By Mrs. C. M. Sawyer. Truly, we are in favor with the book-spirit, for never before, at one time, have so many new and really valuable favors come to us from his costly treasure-house. After the many richly deserved commendations which this little volume of Mrs. Sawyer's has received, there is little need for us to particularize its beauties. Good, and interesting, and beautiful, it certainly is, throughout; and written in her usual style of simplicity and elegance. We have observed in every instance where it has been our good fortune to observe at all, that the style of an author's writing, invariably accords with his or her style of acting—that the mind and the manners are in harmony. Will Mrs. Sawyer pardon us for saying that her book is just like herself? We are in the same case with many others who have read the volume; we know not which of the tales to call our favorite. 'The Merchant's Widow' has most in it to awaken tears—not for its sadness, but for the hearty and affectionate kindness of that 'good old Mr. Temple.' Heaven bless all of his class, bond or free! 'The Unequal Marriage' has much in it of solemn import, and of too common experience. It is better, far better, my dear young lady readers, to be ever than dreaded personage—an old-maid—than the wife of one whose principles, pursuits and sympathies, are not in harmony with your own. 'The Lonely Burial' is a sweet, bright-spirited little story, full of pure and gentle teachings.

Br. Price will please accept our best thanks for the beautiful gilt edged copy, which we received from him. It does credit to the publisher's taste, and forms a bright little ornament for our parlor-table.

'A VOICE TO THE MARRIED: being a Compendium of social, moral, and religious Duties, addressed to Husbands and Wives. By John Mather Austin. New-York, J. & H. J. Langley; Utica, O. Hutchinson. 1841.' This work is by the author of 'A Voice to Youth,' commended in this magazine as a work of interest and excellence, the extensive circulation of which supersedes the necessity of attempting any description of the style in which the present volume is written. Clearness is certainly a prominent and valuable quality, and good common sense pervades all the counsels and admonitions. The author has not written for an ideal world, and consequently has not indulged in dreams—the romance of preaching; but in pleasantness and soberness he treats of the essentials of a happy married life, and his voice should be patiently and thoughtfully listened to. The volume is divided into three parts—1. to Husbands, 2. to Wives, and 3. to both, and in these hints are given in relation to most of the matters which affect the order, comfort and happiness of home. We trust that a wide circulation may be given to the work. It is neatly bound, and contains 391 close printed, large 12mo pages. Can be had of Abel Tompkins.

'TALES FROM LIFE, designed to illustrate certain religious Doctrines and Practices which prevail at the present day. By George Rogers. Boston: A. Tompkins and B. B. Mussey. 1841.' Thus runneth the title of another new work by one who seldom fails to interest his readers, and who possesses a very happy talent of communicating the incidents of travel. But this volume must be read in order to form any judgment of it, and we should rather have it examined than give any opinion respecting it. We have no great love of booking the gloomy fancies of the Calvinist, or putting in print the severe language and gross metaphors used by the unrefined bigoted adherent to that form of christianity. In addition to the 'Tales,' will be found two articles taken from the 'Repository'—'The Old Man's Experience,' by Br. Mandell, and 'The Mother's Joy,' by Br. Austin. The whole is published in a very neat and handsome style. pp. 180.

CHRISTIAN FREEMAN. Since our last No. was out of press, this weekly religious and literary paper, edited by Br. S. Cobb, has entered upon a new volume—the third. It has been a very well conducted periodical, has treated subjects of exciting nature in a dignified and sober manner. While it is devoted in part to the Temperance and Abolition movements of the age, the reason of the reader is never insulted by the wild and foolish declamation that fills so large a space in many kindred publications. It is an excellent family paper—well suited to breathe a good spirit into the soul of the careful reader, and assist in the cultivation of the socialities and humanities of christian life. Published in Boston, 50 Cornhill, at $2 per year, in advance.

PORTLAND TRANSCRIPT. We were really made glad by greeting once more the presence of such a favorite as the Portland Transcript, as we began to think it had changed its name and let itself out at half price. It has come at length to successfully renew its claims to our esteem, and with a brighter face than it was wont to wear. 'The Tribune' is not 'The Transcript,' and Charles P. Hsley is still the editor of the latter. He always succeeds in presenting an excellent variety, and making the reader feel that it is worth while to keep this paper, while he throws away No.

after No. of the mammoth sheets. We wish the 'Transcript' great success. It is published in Portland, Me. at $2 per year, in advance. We regret that our first No. of the T. is the 5th. Can it be otherwise?

SAUGUS FEMALE SEMINARY. We take great pleasure in stating that Miss H. A. Hoyt has opened a seminary in the Academy formerly occupied by Rev. L. Emerson in Saugus,—a pleasant town near Lynn. As preceptress in the 'Murray Institute' in Gloucester, she gave universal and full satisfaction, and we wish no better proof than the deep affection manifested towards her by her pupils there and their improvement. We commend her school to the attention of our friends, assuring them that the most careful and thorough inquiries will but confirm what we say when we declare her to be a most excellent and accomplished teacher. The Seminary was opened May 4th. Instruction is given 'in the various branches usually taught in Academies, and no effort will be spared to render it a school worthy of patronage. Tuition, $4 per term for English studies, with a reasonable addition for Latin, French, Drawing, &c.' Board can be had at a fair price by application to Mr. Edward Hitchings, or Miss Hoyt.

NEW MUSIC BOOK—Boston Musical Institute, edited by T. Comer. This new volume of music has received the highest commendations from those learned in the science; and where it has been adopted by choirs, it has given great satisfaction. Its editor is a professor of unquestioned talent, and his name with many will be enough to stamp the work as excellent. We commend it to the attention of our friends and to all desirous of obtaining one of the most excellent collections of music now published. pp. 353. [See advertisement on cover of this No.]

Br. A. R. G. is informed that we have given him credit in full for Expositor up to Jan. 1841—although it was not our intention to send him a free copy but one year. His letter was duly received; he will please accept our thanks for his kindness. A. T.

Our Monthly Talk.

OUR FEMALE CORRESPONDENTS. We have a word to say of our faithful and generous friends, who kindly assist us in preparing a monthly offering for our readers. Of these, the chiefest at present is our sweet and gentle 'Ellinora' of 'Home Vale.' The interest of our pages has been greatly enhanced by her excellent contributions, as we might testify from our private letters, no less than from the frequent comments of those around us. And proud are we to assure our readers that the 'Christian Graces' so beautifully portrayed in these articles, shine forth in even stronger light from the daily life of her who is so happy in their delineation.

To Mrs. Munroe and Miss Dodd, we owe abundant thanks for the past, and are in hope that the future will not find them forgetful of our wants. Calista is always welcome, and her presence oftener desired. We may say the same of our friend 'Julia,' and of 'L. of Concord,' also of Miss Peabody, who is preparing a series of short prose articles for our new volume. Will not sister S. E. S.—the sweet 'Starr'—let her light shine on us occasionally?

Our last volume has some beautiful leaves from 'L. J. B. C.' They are precious to our readers, and thrice precious to ourself. The graces eluster around her thoughts and her pen whenever she attempts to write; and who can marvel that, where the mind is holy, the language should be surpassingly beautiful?—And the other, our afflicted friend, 'J. H. S.'—words are poor to express our sense of the obligations she has conferred on us and on our readers. Shall the sweet voice of the gospel, ever so imploringly uttered from her fervent spirit, be hushed thus early upon her lips? Has the music-moan of the shell died away to be no longer heard upon our earthly shore? We fear, and yet we hope—but God knoweth what is best for us,—May his will be done.

We dare not ask the assistance of Mrs. Sawyer, for we know that her own editorial occupations demand all her leisure hours. But of Miss Barker we will venture to solicit occasional aid, trusting confidently that circumstances will permit her to follow her kind inclinations. Last on our list, but not least, is 'Ione,' whose poetry and prose have added much to the interest of the 'Repository.' We feel greatly indebted to her generous kindness, and hope it will be long continued. To all other of our female contributors, whose names are not here specified, we return sincere thanks for our own sake and in behalf of our readers whom they assist to interest and improve. S. C. E.

TO OUR CORRESPONDENTS. In the sentiments expressed by our co-worker, S. C. E. as above, we heartily concur, and add to them in reference to our male contributors our grateful acknowledgments for the favors we have received and especially for those we this month present our readers. We venture to say that we present a very rich No. to commence our new volume with—rich in thought, in beautiful language, and in intellectual interest. We have good promise of sustaining this interest throughout the volume, and trust in the generous support and exertions of our friends.

Will Miss Dodd, Mrs. Case, Mrs. Munroe, Ione, Ellinora, and Mrs. C. W. H. and Miss Peabody, accept our very grateful acknowledgments for their acceptable favors, and permit us to indulge the hope of hearing from them severally soon? 'The Governess' is exquisite sketching and full of interest; 'Goodness has been made one of the most attractive of the 'Graces,' and the mournful and heart-improving beauty and sweetness of the 'Minister's Widow,' will long live in the memory of our readers. The plea for the better sympathies for 'Ireland and the Irish,' and the sketch of the 'Tea Party,' will be regarded as beautiful parts of the present No. 'Abraham's Sacrifice,' must be regarded as a superior poem, and we are proud to place it in our pages. So with 'Death,' 'The Bridal Eve,' 'The Song of the Wild Bird,' and the 'Song of the Summer Wind.' 'The Moonbeam' is almost the first production of poetry by a young lady who has, as we think, considerable poetical talent and an excellent mind. We were in hopes of receiving an article from 'L. of Concord,' for this No. We still hope, as she has ever been welcome.

FOR OUR NEXT. We have an excellent story entitled, 'The Elder Sister,' from Mrs. Munroe, which, from its length, we were obliged to defer till our next. It is full of interest, in being full of that strong thought and deep feeling which characterize all the author's productions.

'The Reefer,' a fine descriptive poem from a lady in Duxbury, Mrs. C. W. H.

'Activity a Christian Duty,' an excellent religiously moral article by Br. S. Goff.

'The Victim of Envy,' by Miss Sarah E. Starr, whose article on Ridicule was so well received.

'The Removal of Napoleon,' by Miss E. M. Whittemore, a young lady 14 years of age, who certainly possesses talents which should be cultivated, and we respectfully and kindly invite her attention to home scenes as affording rich themes for her muse.

A poetical article 'On seeing a Minister grasp a Whip and a case of Sermons,' by a 'Dreamer on Realities.'

These will make a part of a series of interesting productions, to be given in our next.

[We are in expectation of receiving some communications from Mrs. J. H. Scott, who has been very ill, but we learn is recovering. We do earnestly hope she may yet be able to do much by her ever eloquent productions.]

CHAPTER I.—JESUS ON THE MOUNTAIN.

'AND seeing the multitudes, he went up into a mountain; and when he was set, his disciples came unto him.'

JESUS on the mountain is an object of intense interest, however he may be viewed—as a part of a great picture, or as a reformer and prophet. He had by his preaching and wonderful miracles of mercy, arrested the attention of large numbers. They saw in his manner of discourse an authority that was not common to their religious teachers; in his address, majesty the most commanding; and they discerned, in his teachings, an amiability attributed to the Deity, which appealed to their best feelings and affections. His works were in sympathy with his doctrine; and in the silent language of thought they owned him a man of God, and were almost ready to answer affirmatively their own question—Is he not the true Messiah?

As the Savior went from city to city, declaring the good tidings of the kingdom of God, the crowds increased, till at last they became like a mighty host moving onward after their leader to a great work. As he rose upon an eminence and turned a moment, he caught a glimpse of the vast concourse peopling the winding paths, and his spirit was moved at the sight. He paused as he came near a mountain in the neighborhood of Capernaum, and near the northern shore of the beautiful lake of Gennesareth. During the pause of a moment, what thoughts rushed through the Savior's mind! His mental powers were ever active, searching the depths of human nature, examining the springs of action, and scrutinizing the motives and feelings of the inner man. He knew that vast multitude. He knew what reigned supreme in their breasts. He knew that national glory, restoration to power and dominion, conquest of the Gentile, and love of outer glory, were pre-eminent among the desires and hopes they ardently cherished. He knew the persuasives in their minds to favor him; to receive him as the Promised, and to regard his miracles upon the weak and depressed as types of the deliverance he would effect for Israel; and he knew, also, that they were ready to cry, 'Hail Immanuel!' whenever he should raise the standard of Israel's Deliverer. There was Youth with its rash purposes and irrational hopes; Manhood with the bold brow, eye of daring, strong arm, and eager zeal; and trembling Age, pleading, in the secrecy and silence of mental prayer, to be spared a little while to see restored to Judah her ancient sceptre; David's offspring once more upon the throne, and the wings of the desolating Roman eagle no more stretched out over the Holy Land. What burning hopes glowed within them all! Shall he permit them to cherish these flattering hopes? Shall he not correct their impressions in reference to his character? Shall he leave them to their own thoughts, beguiling them into indulging expectations which to their imaginations were beautiful as summer clouds, but in truth less substantial? An impostor would have done so. A man of God, swayed by allegiance to truth and duty, would not. And he did not. The time had now come to show that Israel's gross mind has misinterpreted the prophecies, and given materiality to spiritual things, and dwelt too much on earth, too little in heaven. The Messiah they expected and were ready to greet, was to come forth with the spear and the shield to the battle and to the victory; while the Lord's Anointed, when he should come, should 'not judge after the sight of his eyes, neither reprove after the hearing of his ears; but with righteousness judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth; and should smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips slay the wicked.' The spirit of prophecy had used the paraphernalia of the warrior's art, and the glowing 'pomp and circumstance of war,' to set forth the conquests of the Messiah; but though spiritually used, the symbols and imagery were literally understood, and the expectant heart of Judah panted for the restoration of the glory of the outward kingdom.

Such was the Jewish hope, flattered and nourished by their religious teachers, who had the law and the prophets indeed before them, but more of the glosses of sensual wisdom and traditions in their hearts, which unspiritualized the truth. Thus error reigned from the throng of priests in the temple to the cot of the lowliest peasant! What a work was it to attempt to correct such a vast range of mind, and send to the benumbed spiritual affections the electricity of truth!

The great object of hope—he in whom was concentrated the thoughts of that grand assemblage—ascends a mountain. How still is that crowd! How fixed is each eye! He sits, and they know by the act that he is about to teach them of important things, as authoritative teachers always sat while addressing their disciples, and a hushed stillness pervades the crowd.

In querying, Why Jesus chose to address the disciples and multitude from a mountain? some have been satisfied with the most natural answer, that it was for conveniency to himself and advantage to his auditors; but for others this is too simple, and they opine that because the moral law was delivered from a mountain, so it was to be, by the true Interpreter, explained, according to the spiritual character belonging unto it, on a like eminence—at once an emblem of its sublimity and stability. Such delight to contrast the two mountains and their situations, and the different characteristics of the delivery of the Law and the Interpretation.

'I have stood,' says an accurate traveller, 'upon the summit of the giant Etna, and looked over the clouds floating beneath it, upon the bold scenery of Sicily, and the distant mountains of Calabria; upon the top of Vesuvius, and looked down upon the waves of lava, and the ruined and half recovered cities at its foot; but they are nothing compared with the terrific solitudes and bleak majesty of Sinai. An observing traveller has called it "a perfect sea of desolation." Not a tree, or shrub, or blade of grass is to be seen upon the bare and rugged sides of innumerable mountains, heaving their naked summits to the skies, while the crumbling masses of granite around, and the distant view of the Syrian desert, with its boundless waste of sands, form the wildest and most dreary, the most terrific and desolate picture that imagination can conceive.' On that mountain the prophet of God received the law, and the character of the scene may be easily gathered from the Apostle's language;—'Ye are not come unto the mount that might be touched, and that burned with fire; nor unto blackness and darkness, and tempest, and the sound of a trumpet, and the voice of words; which voice they that heard entreated that the word should not be spoken to them any more; and so terrible was the sight, that Moses said, "I exceedingly fear and quake."'

What a contrast with the mount of the Beatitudes, the scene of the Interpretation, and the calm majesty of the great Teacher! This mountain was completely surrounded with life and beauty. Its sides were covered with the richest verdure and gemmed with flowers, and diversified by various kinds of trees, beautiful groves, and fertile spots. From its summit a singularly interesting landscape was spread out, having all the variety of the grand and the bold, the picturesque, the solitude and the crowded town and the hamlet. Not land alone, but the flowing and lovely lake of Gennesareth was seen, winding its beautiful course in the distance, giving a charm to the prospect it would otherwise sadly want. The mountain was in the vicinity of scenes of ancient deeds and national honor, and the eye, as it gazed around, directed by patriotism, saw many and sacred mementos of endeared events. How different from mount Sinai! How different, also, the sight presented to the multitude that was anciently around the one, from the sight presented to the multitude that are now gathered at the Teacher's feet! No blackness, darkness, or tempest, is seen! No alarming and awful sounds, and no contagious fear or trembling is manifested by the all-viewed One; but there he sits, serene as the evening star in her azure home. All was calm, beautifully majestic and solemn. A glorious scene for the painter—at the moment when the pause was made, ere the Teacher opened his lips to teach.

What a power has one mind! Were ambition the reigning impulse in the breast of Jesus—were he desirous to sway the sceptre of Judah and rejoice in the glory of an outward dominion—what time was that for his purpose! Had he but unfurled the banner of Israel—made one spear to glitter in the sunlight, and woke one shout—The Messiah and Israel! then from lip to lip would pass the sound, till the echo floated over the hills, and the thrilling cry swept through the rock openings, down through the vallies, giving life to every heart; and soon, from a gathered host, would go up a shout to heaven, as grand as that which rose from the shore of the Red Sea after the ancient deliverance! One word would have given a direction to the concentrated energies of that multitude that would soon have been felt in the very heart of the Roman Empire; and what a page would have been given to history that it has not now! But spear and banner had no charms to tempt Jesus from devotion to the higher purposes of his being and mission.

Great indeed is the responsibility of those who address congregated masses, and give direction to feeling and passion. Base are the characters of those who abuse their power of speech and language, and before their fellows are like Absalom crying—‘Oh! that I were made judge in the land, that every man which hath any suit or cause might come unto me, and I would do him justice!’ while in the soul there is but one passion and that for self-exaltation! Jesus, to this passion gave no dominion, for all his desires were comprehended in one—God’s glory in human good. Accordingly, his purpose was fixed,—to correct the ideas of the people concerning him—to show he was not the Messiah they expected—that his miracles were not types of what he would do for outward Israel—that he should not lead them on to battle and conquest—and that he had no sympathy with the time serving, gross, and corrupt doctrines of their teachers. He opposed the sensual opinions of the religious leaders of the age, and was the great Apostle of moral and spiritual right, of heart-purity, benevolence, resistance of evil, and soul felt devotion to good and God. He addressed his disciples as Jews by education, custom and association, as influenced by the common opinions of their countrymen and the times, and with but little sympathy for the true character of his mission. He wished them to understand duty—what they might expect—what they must prepare for—what they must be willing to sacrifice, release, suffer, and bear; and this he did that those who followed him from wrong motives and expectations might do so no longer, and those who were resolved to be for him, might realize the stand they were taking. He spoke, they listened and were astonished at his doctrine; for he taught them as one having authority, and not as did the Scribes—the learned teachers of the age.

Here let us pause, and contemplate the character of Jesus as thus presented. And first we may remark, that Jesus knew, and acted upon the knowledge, that according to the conceptions formed of him by the people, would be the character of their conduct towards him and his doctrine. It is so now. According to our impressions of his real character, will be our reverence for his truth; and it seems impossible to consider his character with any degree of seriousness and attention, without being strongly persuaded of its divinity. The evidences of that divinity are to be felt rising up in ‘the chamber of imagery’ in the human soul, and by their loveliness, dignity, and harmony, winning our admiration and homage, rather than to be described with philosophical accuracy. It is ever so with our ideal of the great and good of history. There is a conviction in the heart of their worth and goodness which cannot be adequately described, and according to the degree of our admiration is our dissatisfaction with the best description we are able to give. How often when we have described a splendid scene, a beautiful phenomenon in nature, or a friend whom we enthusiastically admire and love, do we add to our description—Ah, after all you must see and know for yourself, before you can conceive a right idea of what I have described! It is so with the christian and his conception of Jesus. He rises from the contemplation of his Lord with convictions, feelings, and emotions, for which there is no adequate language.

Much must still lie unuttered, after he has said all that he can say. No words can make visible the ideal in his soul, or bring out legibly to the eyes of others what is inscribed on the tablet of his heart, read by the mental eye as fondly as the lover reads the affection of his mistress’s looks and smiles. As those looks and smiles of affection quicken the ardor of the suitor’s love and attachment, so does a contemplation of Jesus in the Gospels increase the christian’s conviction that he was truly the Son of God, and enlivens his devotion to his truth. There is, in short, so much in the portrait of Jesus to win our love,—the admiration of the human soul, that his doctrine must be honored by all who see aright that character, for Christ and Christianity have a perfect unity.

But to return to the consideration of the peculiar traits of character presented in bold relief by the circumstances alluded to. And first we are impressed with his Originality. How opposite was his character, in its mental conformation especially, to that of his countrymen! Where did the peasant of Nazareth, surrounded by the humbler classes, occupied in the labors of a mechanic, and with all the customs, habits, and opinions of the Jews of the age thrust upon his attention—where did he gain aid to form such original conceptions of human duty and such grand designs for social progress? Where, and from whom, learned he to go forth to a reform, every feature of which was opposite to the general feeling, and its aims striking at the very root of some of the most cherished hopes of the Jew? And when he ascended the mountain to teach, from whence came the inspiration by which he taught a doctrine pure, sublime, benevolent, perfect, and dealing death to what were regarded as sanctified hopes for Israel? This aid and wisdom were not of earth, but—to use the sublime language of Milton in reference to the true poet—from ‘that Eternal Spirit who can enrich with all utterance and knowledge, and sends out his seraphim with the hallowed fire of his altar, to touch and purify the lips of whom he pleases.’ He was the Christ of God—the consecrated Word of Jehovah—the Light whose brightness came from the fountain that pours its radiance upon the glories of the eternal paradise. Jesus Christ an impostor! Absurdity! Foolishness, only exceeded by that presumption, that knowing the order and immensity of the universe, and that nothing of earth or time can satisfy the aspirations of the soul, yet looks upon the stars and proclaims—There is no God—no life beyond this!

The originality of the character of Jesus, so opposite to what the expectation, habits and customs of the times would have formed—so opposite to what religious deception would have suggested—and so opposite to enthusiasm or fanaticism,—calm, consistent, dignified, majestic—could only have come from the inspiration of the true God.

Consider his Honesty as a Reformer. He entered the field of social action an avowed Reformer. He saw the contrast between his principles and all that swayed the public and the common mind—what he must expect to meet in his progress—what the fate of his followers would be. He goes onward with fixed and settled purpose. Followers increase as he advances, till they are swollen to crowds—enough, if true to his principles, to reform the world. He pauses—and hushed is that multitude. He teaches—and gives utterance to rules of feeling, thought, and action, the most pure and strict; and in the plainest manner he declares the dangers that lie in the path of the disciples, assuring them that they require the most devoted self-denial and sacrifice, and that he offers none other than spiritual rewards, that have no charms to the lover of outward glory, wealth, or power, so that it is evident that to be his disciple requires a pure purpose and strong heart. Here was honesty that forbids the thought that he was allied to any thing but devotedness to God. He saw what he was to oppose. He fixed his principles of life and action. He resolved to labor in the cause he loved, and to leave his work to be blessed in God’s own time. He knew he could not reform the world in a day, but that to every work there is a seed time and harvest; and not eager to hasten Providence, he was always consistent, prudent, just, and generous. A wise and good example for all reformers, but too much neglected.

Consider, also, the justice of his Judgment. He knew the human mind had one Author and the human heart one Father, and that truth was unchangeable. Therefore, to the rich and the poor, the exalted and the lowly, the learned and the simple, he gave the same principles to control and guide their moral being. He had one tone in which to declare and enforce the moral law; and the faults of the proud pharisee received no more favor than those of the despised publican, and both were treated in a manner which commanded their attention from its authoritativeness and contrast with the manner of the Scribes.

He did not permit the pomp and show of wealth and state to bias his judgment of men; and ‘the little folly’ of him who had ‘a reputation for wisdom,’ was not so gilded by the ‘blaze of fame’ as to lose all its darkness and repulsiveness. He did not recognize any privileged classes in morals. When he addressed the gathered masses, he did not turn with a patronage-craving smile to where the Separatists stood, and speak with softened tone to them, gathering strength to utter forth to the ‘lower classes’ severe denunciations. He looked on society with a just eye, and no dazzling glory could contract his vision as he gazed upward to the chair of state, or throne of power. His glance penetrated to the depths of being; and he knew what were the struggles endured by the poor which the wealthy knew not. He read minds and judged hearts, regarding not the robes of pride or the tattered garment of poverty. He despised not the poor—he flattered not the rich;—he talked not of classes—he judged not by clans; he individualized men, and was never betrayed by circumstances into the practise of false courtesies. Simon, the pharisee, in the crowd, was no less the proud separatist when presiding at the festival board in his house, and no less did he hear rebuking truth.

For us Jesus taught on the mountain, and for all to whom come the record of his wisdom. We should hear his voice. It is the voice of one who teaches with divine authority, and whose truth has the deepest and truest sympathy with our moral and spiritual nature. He teaches us to be happy; and instructs how to obtain true blessedness, in a few comprehensive sentences, which reveal the essential virtues and graces which are needed to enable us the best to enjoy life and bear its trials and afflictions. These aphorisms, called the Beatitudes, I propose, in a series of articles, to reverently consider, regarding them as setting forth the elements of true christian happiness. I shall aim to consider each of them carefully, in order that we may be prepared to rightly combine them and admire the beauty of the character formed by their indwelling harmony. And when I shall have ended, I hope in the heart of the reader, and in my own, the conviction will be deepened, that ‘ If solid happiness we prize,

Within our breast the jewel lies,
Nor need we roam abroad;
The world has little to bestow;
From pious hearts our joys must flow—
Hearts that delight in God.’

The Reefer.

BY MRS. C. W. HUNT.

[SUGGESTED by a beautiful and graphic engraving of a young Reefer, leaning on a mast, with a fixed gaze.]

ON what art thou gazing, beautiful boy!
With thine eye of light and thy brow of joy!
Thine eyes are upturned to the far off sky,
And thou’dst pierce the bright worlds, that hidden lie
In the boundless expanse of ether blue,
And find if what is supposed be true,—

That each of the gems that brightly deck
The brow of night, and appears but a speck,
Is a world such as ours; that creatures as fair
As e’er graced our earth, in beauty are there.
And thou think’st, perhaps, when we quit this world,
When the spirit is poised and the wing unfurled,
Its flight will be upward to some bright star,
Which is gleaming thro’ azure space afar;—
That the magnitude, greater or less will be,
As we go debased or in purity;—
That the price required for our wanderings here
Will be separation from friends most dear,—
That to some lesser sphere we must wing our flight,
If guilty and frail, from the loved ones sight.
And thou weep’st to think how dark would be E’en those bright worlds, without thine, to thee.
Sweet youth! may no bitterer tears e’er flow
From thine eyes, than now, for ideal woe.

On what dost thou gaze? Is the uplifted eye
Marking the feathery clouds as they fly?
Now wreathing in forms fantastic and fair,
Now rent in pieces by a breath of air.
Did the false things deceive thee, as near the sea,
In the distance they hung,—did they seem to be
Of itself a part? then assume the form
Of a stately ship, o’er the proud waves borne?
Did thy young heart leap at the tho’t that the strand,
To which it was bound, was thy own native land;
That now the letter, which for many a week
Has lain in thy trunk, till thou should’st speak
Some wandering sail, could be sent to one
Who is thine—all thine, when the voyage is done!
And thou slid’st to the deck, for the glass to bring Nearer and sooner, that beautiful thing.

Alas! ’twas but vapor, and vanished from sight
E’er thou gained once more the mast’s dizzy height.
Phantom illusive! may it teach thee youth!
In thy search for joys and eternal truth,
To direct thy gaze thro’ vapor and shade,
To the world of the real where joys never fade.

Art watching the flashing meteors course
As they dart thro’ the air from their secret source!
With thy far-searching gaze, hast thou yet found
From whence they came, or whither they’re bound?
And are they indeed, as Mahometans say,
Firebrands of wrath, which good angels sway,
When they chase from the verge of Heaven the bad,
Who approach too near, in dark robes clad?
It seems, as it shoots from its hiding place,
Like an uncaged bird, unused to trace
Its course thro’ the air; its flight cannot stop
Till down to the earth in darkness it drop.

’Tis an emblem, youth! of thy own restless kind
When they quit the sphere which Heaven assigned,
And seek in the erratic path of fame
The meed of fools—a sounding name.

Art watching the Moon, as it sails o’er the sky,
In glory and beauty, so lonely and high!
’Tis lovely and fair! surpassingly bright!
But alas! it shines with borrowed light:
And vague and dim are the shadows it throws,
As a soul just awaking from sin’s repose.
And darker than ocean when storms are out,
Would be night’s pale silvery queen, without
The sun’s clear rays were reflected there;
And cold she is, as lovely and fair.

It is thus proud man, could he reach the goal
Of Ambition, and there in splendor roll,
Cares not how cold is the heart beneath,
Can he but grasp the glittering wreath;
Not how many brighter suns shall set
For him; nor the burning tears that wet
The pallid cheek, for the withering blight
He has shed on the hopes once glad and bright.

As the radiant moon shall fade away
Before the sun's pure, morning ray,
So fame and hopes, built on tears and sighs,
Must fade when the sun of truth shall rise;
And the heart not warmed by affection's light,
Congeal and expire in darkness and night.

Speak and tell me, beautiful One!
As thou lean'st on that spar, so high and lone,
The wild winds playing among thy dark hair,
Speak! and O tell me what seest thou there!
Thou seem'st, with thy face of joyous youth,
The embodied spirit of love and truth,
Sent down from celestial courts above,
On an errand of mercy, like the dove
From the ark, to find if there's yet one breast
On which to repose and securely rest.

I've been gazing, Lady, on the land
Receding from view, on whose loved strand,
I left, but a few brief hours ago,
Mother and friends, in deepest wo,
That I must launch on the treach'rous deep,
Where storms are nursed, and tempests sleep;
And tho' they've long been out of sight,
The pictures stamped so clear—so bright,
Upon my heart, I see them now—
And my mother's hand is on my brow,
As when she blessed me, and solemnly said,
'To Him who numbers the hairs of the head,
'To Him who has ever and ever will keep
'In his merciful hand the mighty deep,
'I commend thee, boy! God bless thee! go,
'And prayers for thy weal shall hourly flow.'

'Tis well! and when from thy fading view,
This world is receding, and friends so true
Are weeping in anguish around thy bed
Such tears as the stricken heart must shed
Or break! lift the glass of faith to thy sight
And bring near a home of unfading light;
Where tears flow not, where, in one bright train,
All the pure in heart shall meet again.

The Elder Sister.

BY MRS. N. T. MUNROE.

It was a bright and beautiful day of summer. Balmy and soft, the west wind was abroad over the earth, and it came wafted to the hall of the rich, and fanned the cheek of health and beauty. And it came, too, into the lowly abode of poverty, even to the bedside of the dying, and touched the pale cheek of the sufferer, and lifted the hair from the sad brows and tear-bedewed cheeks of the children who gathered around that humble couch. While all is beautiful abroad, stop for one moment in this humble tenement. The rays of a summer's sun shine here upon a sad, sad scene. A woman, and a mother,—pale, emaciated and dying—is there; and beside her, are three children. Yet it is not a scene of squalid poverty, wretchedness and vice. The inmates of this dwelling are poor, but there is an air of neatness around, which disarms poverty of its sharpest sting. The floor is destitute of carpet or other covering, yet careful hands have kept it white; the articles of furniture are few, but each is clean, and stands in its proper place; and the three children, though clad in plain, simple garments, are perfectly neat. The eldest is a girl of about fourteen years of age—sweet, gentle Mary Somers! She has tasted early of the bitterness of earth's cup, and it has cast a shade of thought upon her youthful brow, and clear, dark eye; and as she stands by the side of her mother, bathing her fevered brow, you forget that she is but a child; for early sorrow and affliction have caused her to pass, too soon from playful childhood, to thoughtful womanhood. And there is Alice too—little, lovely, playful Alice! the life, and joy of that humble dwelling; whose young voice is ever glad and joyous, and her laugh clear and ringing, and her heart free and childlike in its warm and gushing affections. Bright Alice Somers! too young to share the depths of thine elder sister's sorrow, but old enough to feel that the present is a moment of gloom; and the tears are gushing from thine eyes, and thy bosom heaves, as if thine heart were breaking with its excess of grief. The other of the group is a boy of about eight years of age, with the soft, thoughtful eye of his elder sister. He is too young to realize his affliction, yet he weeps, as childhood will, from very sympathy.

Another form now enters the door, and comes to the bedside of the dying. He is a man of about forty years old, of the middle stature, and his thick set, muscular frame betokens a person used to severe and active labor. His countenance is dark and swarthy, for he has evidently followed a seafaring life; and exposure to many climes and burning suns has rendered his brow dark, though not forbidding in its aspect, for there is kindness of soul beaming from his dark blue eye, and his voice, though used to giving forth its orders amid the confusion and fury of the elements, is gentle and low as he addresses the sick one before him. He is the brother of Mrs. Somers, and a kind hearted and generous sailor. He has come, like a messenger from heaven, to cheer her last moments, to take away some of the bitterness of death; for well she knows he will provide for the poor orphans who stand around her bedside. She welcomes him with a sweet smile, and the heartfelt prayer and blessings of his dying sister, fall sweet upon the sailor's ear, as he promises to be a father to those she must leave behind her. 'It is but a mournful task,' says she, as she looks up into his sun burnt face, down which the warm tears are flowing,—'and one which will be of much trouble and trial to you, in your situation; but you are the only friend I have on earth, and I know you will be kind to them; and when you are away on the wide waters, the prayers of the poor orphans will rise to heaven for your safety, and there will too, be those around the throne of grace, who will pray for your welfare.' The brother's heart is too full for words. He presses her cold hand, and bows his head in silence; yet she knows he has vowed faithfulness.

The bright summer day has passed, and the sick woman lingered, as if to witness its close; for ere the shades of night had gathered over the city, her spirit had sought its God. And through that clear, calm summer night, young Mary Somers sat and watched by the side of her dead parent. It was a sad vigil for one so young! Her cheek was pale, her eyes swollen with weeping. She knelt down by the side of the bed, and prayed fervently, from the very depths of a young, sincere and deeply tried spirit. That prayer arose to Heaven, and was it not answered! Was not the strength given her from above, which enabled her in after life to perform her duty so well, though oftentimes the task was painful? That young girl rose from her devotions with a firm heart and a trust in the care and protection of the God she had been taught from early childhood to revere, and to regard as a Father. And she went through the other duties which devolved upon her, ere her mother's remains were consigned to the grave, with a firm step and a trusting heart, for her hope was in God.

Mrs. Somers had been married at an early age, and her prospects appeared promising. Her parents died a short time after her marriage. They were not rich, and all they had given their daughter was a good education and a mind well stored with useful knowledge. But George Somers and his wife were young, and what had they to fear! They hired a small house in their native city, and set out upon their new life. Mrs. Somers made her home a happy one. Some said she had education and talents far above her station, and wondered how she could content herself in the dull round of domestic duty. But her parents when they educated their daughter did wisely. While her mind was being enriched with useful knowledge, and what the schools could bestow, the heart had not been neglected; but that had kept pace with the intellect, in all good and pure things. She had rich stores of happiness within her own mind which the world knew not of, and which one with an undisciplined mind and heart could not possess. Mr. Somers was a kind husband and a good man. He toiled unremittingly and cheerfully, but his health gradually declined; he met with disappointment in business, and all his exertions seemed to be of no avail. He bore up against trouble and trial as well as he could, and he ever found a ready counsellor in his wife. Her quick eye saw that his cheek grew pale, his eye more bright and his step more feeble and slow. She saw all this before he confessed that he was ill, as she lay at night listening to his labored breathing, murmuring words, while she pressed her hand upon his brow, which felt hot and fevered beneath her touch.

A few years passed on and George Somers still lived, but looked like one just ready for the tomb. His wife toiled on in her humble home, and well did her heart bear up under her trials; and she now felt her talents had not been given her in vain, as she was able to instruct her children in all lessons suitable for their different ages. And when their eyes were closed in sleep and her husband had sunk into his broken slumbers, she would sit at her unfinished task with an unmurmuring heart and placid countenance. Or if at times she tired and her heart grew faint with weariness, she would go and kneel down and offer up a prayer to God, and gaze upon her children's sweet, still slumbers, and then upon her husband's pale and almost celestial countenance, and go again cheerfully to her task. But at length after years of suffering, the husband and father died, leaving her with three helpless children. It was about this time that Henry Barton having returned from sea, visited his sister, and his presence was cheering to the mourner. He had amassed considerable property in his different voyages, and with the characteristic generosity of a sailor, he offered it to her. She blessed him for his kindness; and when he again departed, it was not without many prayers for his welfare, breathed more fervent than ever for his protection. From that time till a few days before her death, she had not seen him, and his return was fortunate to cheer her heart with the assurance, that her children would not be left friendless in the wide world.

He kept his promise to his dying sister faithfully, loving the orphans for her sake, who had been to him a fair, gentle creature, regarded with a brother's most ardent affection; and though, in later years, they had been much apart, still the memory of the bright sunny days of his childhood would come across the mariner's heart, like gleams of sunshine from a brighter land. The generous brother boarded the three orphans with his aunt, a poor, but industrious woman, who was very glad to receive them to her house, for a small recompense. They were sent to suitable schools, for in our favored cities, such schools are open for all, high and low, rich and poor. When he saw that they were thus provided for, he embarked again on board the ship Albion of which he was captain, to be absent on a voyage of four years.

Those four years have passed away, and we will look in again upon the orphans. They are in a neat little room with an elderly lady, Mrs. Jackson, the aunt of whom I have spoken. A cheerful fire blazes in the fire-place, as the weather is cold and disagreeable, for it is the month of March. Mary and her little brother, are busy with a book before them, while Alice is sitting by the window and gazing out into the street. At length she speaks, 'Do you think that Uncle Henry will be here to-night?' They all raise their heads at the question. 'I wish that he would come,' little Herbert exclaimed, 'so that I could show him how I get along with my studies, for I know he will smile and call me his good little scholar.' Mary rises and walks to the window and looks out. Dark, heavy clouds are driving fast over the heavens—the wind is high and tempestuous, and every thing seems to tell of a stormy and dangerous night. The countenance of the young girl grows sad as she turns away from the window, half uttering hopes and prayers.

It was as Mary Somers had feared. The night grew more dark and gloomy, the wind rose higher and higher, and now and then was heard the distant pealing of thunder, and the rain and sleet fell thick and fast upon the earth. About midnight, the storm was appalling. Mary arose and lighted a candle—she could not sleep, for he who had been a father to her and her sister and brother, was exposed to the fury of the elements on that dreadful night, and if he should die, she would be alone again on the wide world! She thought of the night her mother died. It was a clear, still summer night when she had watched by her,—dead! and she recollected how calm was her mind after she had prayed, as she sat and gazed upon her pale, still features. She had prayed many times since then, prayed daily, for direction and guidance. And now she knelt to God for the friend he had given her, and when she arose, she felt calmer, and listened to the roaring wind and the driving sleet with a more resigned mind.

Towards morning the storm abated, and the sun arose in unclouded splendor. But it had been a night of fearful danger, and the morning presented a sad scene! The ravages of the storm had not been so great in the dense part of the city, though here and there a chimney had been blown down, or a loose shutter or blind carried away by the fury of the wind. But along the wharves the scene was appalling. Masts of dismantled vessels were drifting on the waves; and casks, and boards and numerous other articles were floating on the water. Large ships had parted their moorings, and presented a sad sight, with their torn sails flapping loosely on their broken masts, while they lay as they had been tossed by the winds and waves,—some nearly high and dry on the wharves, others careened over on one side. And worse than this! many a noble soul, the hope and stay of many hearts, in their pride and strength had found a watery grave, that fearful night, and no friend had heard their last cry! It was a sad morning for the three orphans, for it brought the tidings that the ship Albion had gone to the bottom, and all her crew had perished.

Poor Mary Somers now needed all her strength and fortitude to enable her to bear up under this new affliction. She had felt lone and sad when her mother died; but their uncle had provided them a good home, and his generous heart had given herself and sister and brother ample means of support. And though she had missed her mother much, and her young heart had lost all the playfulness of its girlhood by early affliction, still she had been contented; the cold, stern hand of poverty had not pressed heavily upon them, and she had not felt obliged till now to look forward to the future, doubting how they were to be provided with sustenance for the morrow.

She had improved much in mind, during those four years, having assisted her brother and sister in their studies, and carefully employed all leisure hours, as for a trifling sum she had been able to obtain books from a library in the neighborhood, the knowledge derived from which, aided by a naturally strong and thoughtful mind, had made Mary Somers one who would have been an ornament to any circle in life. But she now felt that much depended upon herself, and she knew not where to turn for direction. Mrs. Jackson was kind and good to the orphans, and pitied them in their lone state; but she was not one who could give much real good advice to Mary, for her mind was not naturally strong, and old age and trouble had impaired and blunted her faculties. Mary thought, at first, of taking a school; this she would have preferred, but how could she procure one? she had no influential friends to speak in her behalf, and she thought it not probable that her application at any time would not prevail while many others of higher rank and who possessing friends to speak for them, were desiring similar employment. She felt that it was useless to think of this course, and what other remained? None, but to go and endeavor to procure some of the needle-work which constitutes the support of thousands in our cities. Hard and laborious as it is, and scanty as is the reward, many seek for it daily, and bend till midnight over their hard task, to procure but a subsistence. And this was all the resource that was open to her. And the next day after that frightful storm, saw Mary Somers out upon her errand. And in this she was successful; and the prospect of an honest livelihood, frail as it was, cheered her, and she set about her task with a determined heart.

It was a late hour in the night, and the hum of business had long since ceased in the busy city. All was still; save now and then the noisy burst of wild glee of some nightly reveller, or the hollow tread of the watchman, as his steps fell upon the sidewalk. A light still burned in the humble tenement where dwelt the three orphans. Mary and Alice were busy with their work. The countenance of the elder was placid and serene, but the lip of the young Alice trembled, and a tear was in her eye, and every now and then she would drop her work as if unmindful, and stop and press her hand to her forehead. Young Herbert too was there, but he was busy with his book. He was deep in thought and happy, and the world was nothing then, to his young, dreaming mind. The group had long been silent. At length Mary looked up, and her eye fell upon Alice. The young girl hastily brushed away a tear, and resumed her work. 'Alice,' said Mary kindly, 'you had better go to bed, you are tired and wearied, and complained this afternoon of the headache.' 'But the work must be finished to-night, Mary,' said Alice, despondingly. 'I can do it alone in a very little while; you had better go,' answered Mary, drawing her sister to her side and kissing her flushed cheek. Alice sobbed for awhile upon her sister's bosom, but spoke not a word. 'Why,' said Mary, taking her hand, 'why were you looking so earnestly upon this little ring, your schoolfellow gave you? have you heard bad news from Grenville Eaton?' 'I have heard nothing,' said Alice. 'Is that then the reason you are sad? but you are tired and unwell, go to bed, and in the morning you will feel better and happier.'

Alice rose in silence, and Herbert looked wonderingly up in her face, as she kissed his cheek, and bade him good night. But he turned again to his book, and Mary to her work, and the brother and sister were silent for a while. But soon the boy grew weary, and it was with difficulty that even his book could chase away the influence of sleep. His sister looked up and smiled, as she saw that his head had sunk upon his breast, and that his eyes were closed. 'There, Herbert,' said she, putting her hand upon his forehead, 'you had better put by your book for to-night; you are too drowsy to do justice to its author; in the morning you will feel fresher and brighter.' Herbert roused himself, and closed the book. 'Are you never sleepy, Mary,' said he, 'that you can sit up so much longer than any of us? you must be tired—why don't you go to rest?' 'I must finish my work first; nor am I at all sleepy.' 'You are a kind sister,' said the young lad, 'and you have to work hard for us, but I shall soon be a man, and then I will work for you and Alice, and you will not be obliged to sew so much.' 'But you had better go to bed now, or you will never grow to be a man. So good night.'

They were both gone, and Mary was alone. It was long past midnight, when the work was finished, and she prepared to retire to rest. She took down the Bible from the shelf and read a chapter; she then knelt down by the side of her sleeping sister, and addressed a prayer to Heaven. She then gazed for a moment upon the face of Alice. There were traces of tears upon her cheeks, but a smile was on the lips;—she was dreaming of Grenville Eaton. And Mary softly kissed her, and lay down by her side, and was soon as unconscious of the world, as her sister. So tranquil are the slumbers of innocence.

And thus for some years did the orphans live. The elder sister was indeed young to have so much of care, yet did her spirit rise as woman's will, with every emergency. Cheerfully did she go about her daily task, a smile upon her lips to cheer the hearts of her young sister and brother, and a kind word of encouragement ever ready, when their spirits drooped. Yet had she hours of sadness. Hours when had it not been for her strong and unwavering trust in God, her spirit would have sunk. For there were times when all her scanty earnings were exhausted, and she could have nothing for the morrow till her hands had earned a little more of that money which seems sometimes to be the one thing needful. Yet she ever seemed to those who looked up to her for direction, cheerful and kind; they knew not of all her exertions for their support. Yet Alice was ever ready to assist her sister, and well had her joyous laugh and sunny smile cheered their humble dwelling. She had a voice clear and musical, and she would sing her simple songs and artless lays with a heart as free from care, as the bird's in the greenwood tree. She knew they were poor, but had they not ever been? she knew that they must toil for a living, but they were strong, hearty and willing. But gradually her young heart had changed. Her voice grew more soft and melancholy, her smile more sad, and her laugh less heartfelt. There was one whom she had known from childhood; they had been to the same school, and an affection, it may have been a mere childish one, had sprung up between them. They had parted; their school-days were finished, and young Grenville Eaton had given to Alice, as a token of his boyish love, a small gold ring. Well had that token been cherished by the young girl; she had gazed upon the magic circlet, and thought of the giver, and her love had gradually increased towards him till she felt almost as if her heart were pledged to the giver of that ring, although he was rich and far away, and she had not seen him, since the hour when he had placed it on her small and slender finger. But of this no more. A few words of the young Herbert, and we will proceed. We have said that he had the soft, dark eyes of his elder sister, he had also her kind and loving heart. His intellect was rich in power, and his mind great in capacity. Had he been placed in higher life, he would have been early marked out as a genius; but he was poor, and had no one to put him forward. None, did I say? Yes, there was one; yet she was young, poor as himself, and what could she do? But she was a woman, and my simple story will tell what her heart and hands could achieve. Mary saw his strength of mind and his love for study, and she determined that all his rich powers should not lie hidden and pressed down by the hand of penury.

Two years passed on, and Mary's hopes seemed near their completion. Even her fondest desires could ask no more for Herbert. Truly God had raised her up a friend in the time of need. The minister whose meeting she attended, was a kind, benevolent man, and to him she applied in behalf of Herbert. Mr. Saunders had noticed the orphans in their lone condition, and was glad to do all in his power for their assistance. He kindly offered to take Herbert under his charge, and educate him for the ministry, should he be inclined to that profession. To this Herbert gratefully acceded; it was indeed his most ardent wish, and now a fair prospect of future usefulness, and emolument seemed open before him, and he determined to apply himself assiduously to his studies.

It was just at the close of a summer's day that Mary sat alone at the window. She had just had a visit from Herbert, and she was watching to catch the last glimpse of his figure, as he passed down the street. Her heart was full of sweet, pleasant thoughts, for he was well provided for, and Alice and herself could surely get along in the world, young and healthy as they both were. But where was Alice? It was surely time for her to return. She had gone out with some work, and a considerable time had elapsed since she had left her home. Mary gazed anxiously down the street in the hope of seeing her. But it was nearly dark, ere she returned; and Mary saw by her flushed cheek, that something had happened to agitate her. 'You are late, Alice,' said Mary, 'could not you procure any work?' 'Yes, there it is,' said she, laying a bundle upon the table. 'But what is the matter, Alice? has any thing unusual happened.' Alice took off her bonnet, and put it in its accustomed place in silence; she then drew a chair by the side of her sister, and looked up into her face, with a strange, sad smile, 'We are to have a visitor to-morrow,' said she at last, 'an old school-fellow.' 'Who, Grenville Eaton?' said Mary, looking into her sister's face, 'have you seen him.' 'Yes, I met him as I was going down the street,' said Alice, and her cheek glowed as she hastily proceeded. 'He asked me if we lived where we used to, and said that he would call to-morrow evening.' 'I should like very well to see him, and what does my little Alice say to the expected visitor?' Alice looked round with a sad and almost discontented air, upon the plain, simply furnished room in which they were seated, and then up into Mary's face, and her soft eyes filled with tears. 'I see how it is, Alice,' said Mary, in a low voice, 'you wish to see Grenville Eaton, but you are ashamed of your poverty. But has he not known you from childhood? does he not know that we have always been poor? and if he chooses, though he be rich, to visit us, poor and orphans as we are, I know not why we should be ashamed to receive him. Indeed, Alice, you did not used to be afraid of his visits.' 'But we were younger then, and I did not know the value the world puts upon outward appearances,' said she, despondently. 'But if the world values them too much, my little Alice must not. I doubt not but Grenville will be as glad to see us, as though we received him in a more splendid style, and our hearts would be no better, nor our welcome more true, if we dwelt in a costlier habitation. Do you think they would, Alice?' The sister did not immediately reply, for she was thinking of the expected visitor, partly with pain, and partly with pleasure.

The following evening came, and with it came Grenville Eaton to the home of the orphans. Months passed on, and there seemed to be something strangely attractive in that humble dwelling to the young man. Many an evening found him beneath their roof, and Alice would raise her sweet face at his entrance and bid him welcome, while the blush would mantle to her cheek, and the smile come to her lip. The small, gold ring was still cherished, and round her white, slender throat glittered a chain, and to it was suspended the miniature of one whose lineaments were deeply engraven upon the heart that beat beneath. And Alice felt happy and blessed in her lot. The love of a manly, generous heart was hers. The one whom she had loved from childhood, and though their paths, to the world's eye, seemed far apart, yet to them they were as one. And to Grenville's heart none were dearer than the fair and gentle Alice. He brought her books, and they read together; and together they gazed upon the sunset, upon the clear, silvery moon, or into the starry heavens, and were all the world to each other.

And so time passed on, till business called

Grenville to a neighboring city, and he must be gone for a year. He sat alone with Alice the evening before his departure. Tears were glistening in her eyes, and her brow was pale, and her lips compressed. Grenville also, seemed sad. He took her hand within his,—'It is but a year,' said he, 'and I will be with you again.' The hand he held trembled violently. 'A year!' she murmured, in a low, broken voice, 'and other forms will surround you, and other scenes will claim your attention, and business will engross your mind, and can I hope that Alice will be remembered?' As she spoke the last words, she raised her eyes to his. The soft, brown curls were clustering around her forehead, her eyes were filled with tears, and her lip quivered. Grenville gazed earnestly and fondly upon her; he parted back the clustering hair, and imprinted a kiss upon her fair brow, as he murmured,—'Alice, you will never be forgotten. Have I not kept your image in my memory even from very boyhood? and shall I forget you now? no, never! In twelve months I will return, and Alice, will you then be mine forever?' The soft eyes of Alice fell beneath his ardent gaze, her head sunk upon his bosom, and the tears came faster than before, but they were tears of joy; and ere Grenville left that dwelling, the orphan was his affianced bride.

Time passed slowly on after Grenville's departure; but it often brought kind and affectionate letters to cheer the heart of Alice. Yet sorrow came to the two orphans—Mary, the gentle and enduring Mary, was taken ill! Perhaps her constitution had been overtasked, but however that may have been, the cheek grew flushed, the breathing quick, and the pulse unsteady, and she was obliged to take to her bed, with fever raging in every vein, and pain in every limb. Alice tended her with true devotedness, and Herbert would leave his studies and come and sit by her bedside, and the good and kind Mr. Saunders visited her as a true spiritual comforter. Her sickness was long continued; and there were times when her mind wandered, and she fancied herself by her mother's side and the days of childhood come back, and again she spoke of that fearful, stormy night, when her kind friend and uncle met his sad fate. Sometimes bright, glowing visions were before the sick one's eye, and then came sights of terror and alarm. Her friends began to despond and feared for her life, and many a tear was shed, and many a prayer breathed for her, as she lay unmindful of them all.

At last the fever reached its crisis. Mary sunk into a calm, sweet sleep, and the kind minister, brother and sister, watched with anxious hearts for her waking. As she slept, her breathing grew more regular, and even like childhood seemed that soft, sweet slumber, to the watchers around her couch. It was just at the close of the summer afternoon, and the sun was shining brightly, when Mary awoke. There was no flush of fever upon the very pale cheek, as she languidly opened her eyes, and looked around. Alice bent over and spoke to her in a low whisper. 'Alice,' said she, in a faint voice, 'why is it so dark? I must have slept a long time, for it to be night now.— You must be tired with watching, I feel better now, and you must go to rest.' 'No, no Mary,' said Alice, with a frightened voice, 'it is not dark. Do you not see the sun is just setting, you are not awake, you must be dreaming.' And Alice looked round in wonder and amazement upon her brother and Mr. Saunders, who approached the bed. 'Here, Mary, are Mr. Saunders and Herbert, come to see you, and they have been waiting for you to wake, as the doctor said you would be better then.' Mary's dark eyes wandered about the room, but on nothing did they seem to fix their gaze. 'Alas, alas, Alice,' said she, 'I do not see! indeed I fear that I am blind;' and the poor girl covered her face with her pale, thin hands. 'O Mary don't for pity's sake, say so,' said the wretched sister. 'Don't you see Alice, your own Alice, who loves you so dearly.' 'I hear your voice,' said she, in a mild, subdued tone, and she stretched out her arms, and put them round her sister's neck; 'I feel your soft cheek now, and the waving of your silky hair, but indeed, sister, I cannot see; nay, sister do not weep! I feel your hot tears upon my cheek, it is the will of God, that it should be so!' And the tears fell fast from the eyes of both the sisters, and Herbert flung himself upon a chair and covered his face with his hands, and the kind Mr. Saunders looked round with a sad, pitying eye upon the mournful group.

Alice had flung herself by her sister's side and was weeping as if her heart would break. Her fair, glowing cheek lay close to the pale one of the invalid, and the bright curls fell upon Mary's brow. The arms of the sufferer were flung around her neck, and her soft, mournful eyes filled with tears, wandered restlessly about the room. And the sun was shining brightly, his last pure beams were on the earth, and yet she saw them not! It was the hour that Mary had ever loved, and yet it was to her like the darkest night. Kind friends were round her; they had watched her waking with hopeful hearts, and she woke, but she saw them not, as they stood in mute anguish around her bed! The fever had left her, but, impenetrable darkness seemed to shut out all the world from her eager eyes! Mary was the first to break the sad silence. 'It is the will of God,' said she, in a resigned voice. 'Nay, Alice, sweet sister, weep not thus, and Herbert come near to me, and let me hear the sound of your voice, and Mr. Saunders will pray for us, that we may be resigned to this affliction.' Herbert came and took his sister's hand, and Mr. Saunders knelt down by the bed and prayed, and a holy calm seemed to enter into their hearts as he prayed to God for resignation under this great affliction.

Gentle readers, my story groweth long, and I must hasten to its close. Let us enter this place of worship. It is in a crowded part of the city, and many are entering there, yet perchance we may obtain a seat. Yes, we will seat ourselves here, it is close to the pulpit, and look, there is the minister, good Mr. Saunders, and it is his student, young Herbert Somers, who is to preach to day. He is young, yet fame is already his, and his name stands high among his brother ministers. He is entering. There is genius written on his broad, high forehead, and there is kindness of heart breaking forth in his sweet smile. There is a lady leaning upon his arm, a light, frail figure, and see how he bends his head to listen to her whisper. Look into her face, ah yes, you see they are brother and sister; true, her countenance is pale, but there is the same high forehead, the same sweet smile, and the same soft, dark eyes. But there is something peculiar about those dark orbs. Alas, alas, sweet Mary Somers is blind! There is a spiritual and holy expression upon her countenance, as she turns to her brother, and whispers a few words to him, ere he follows Mr. Saunders into the pulpit. Close behind the brother and sister, and now seated in that pew, are another couple. Ah yes, this is a bridal couple. A white silk bonnet shades the lady's blushing cheek, and the curls fall over her pure white forehead, her form is slight and fairy-like, and the rich satin dress falls gracefully around it. A small gold chain is round her slender throat, and through the white silken glove, glitters a gold ring. Surely we have seen that chain and ring before. Yes, and that is the poor orphan, Alice Somers, now Mrs. Eaton, for that tall, handsome man beside her, with the raven hair and black eyes is Grenville Eaton now her husband.

But the services commence, and all is silent; and through all the exercises the attention of the audience remains firmly fixed upon their young preacher. And even that holy man, Mr. Saunders, even he, feels a thrill of pride as he listens to the words of that young teacher, and thinks that it was through him, he has become what he now is. Truly, are not the righteous rewarded in the earth? And Alice too, feels proud of her young brother, as she looks upon his speaking features, and Grenville is all attention to the brother of his Alice. And Mary—how does she feel?—the kind elder sister,—she who supported him when a young boy—when fatherless, and motherless he was left upon the wide world—who toiled through midnight hours for his support—and murmured not, and faltered not in her task? How does she feel, as she listens to his eloquent words and thinks that he is her own cherished brother, who thus stands and addresses the people as a teacher of holy things? O, this is a happy day for Mary Somers! she listens to his words, and her soft eyes are directed to his face. But alas, she does not see the glowing countenance of the speaker, yet she hears his voice—his words of truth and holiness, and feels as she listens, that she is well repaid for all her toil and trouble, and that it would be wicked to murmur because one blessing was taken away, when so many others were showered around her pathway. And she feels with the poet, that

'With but one sense, the heart may overflow.'

On seeing a Minister

Grasp a Whip and Case of Sermons together.

BY A DREAMER ON REALITIES.

THE Gospel of the loving Christ
Beside a braided whip!
O what strange contrasts in this life
Do oft together slip!
The summer cloud of balmy rain,
The electric sable mass;
The green, deceptive, poisonous weed,
Entwined with tender grass;
A golden point in purple set,
On stem of treacherous sap;

The serpent of the charming eye,
In trusting childhood's lap;
The hand whose blood is black with guilt,
In holy palm reposed;
The flowers all blooming on his grave,
Whose worth was ne'er disclosed.

But braided whip on sermons laid,
Is strangest contrast sure!
Mine eyes—so busy are my thoughts—
The sight cannot endure,
But oft such contrasts do we meet
In this low, misty world;—
The text is 'Love'—but hark! what bolts
Are at 'the sinners' hurled!
Infinite Love—a Savior's tears—
Eternal flames are lit!
White robes, green palms, and glittering crowns—
See yonder yawning pit!
Heaven's table's spread—enough for all—
Dives is a crumb refused!
A mother sings, the angels list—
Hell by her child's confused!
God's glory and our good are one—
Eternally they'll sin!
Our love should spread to all the world—
Christ will then cease to win!

The Gospel of the blessed God
With ill made whip of man,
Are held together, and are used
By many a creed-leagued clan!
The first makes tender as babe's flesh,
Then comes the brutal lash!
As waters sparkle on the fount,
Then comes the stony crash!
And, buried 'neath the rolling rocks,
The soul looks up aghast!
The waters glitter, cool and bright,
But fierce the lightnings flash!
Lo! forth he comes, alive and whole,
And he is called 'the saved'!
Remembering more where lightnings shone,
Than where the waters laved.

Unbraid the whip—throw it away!
Lancet and balm the Gospel be;
Open the sores and pour the balm
With tend'rest sympathy;—
E'en as did He who raised her up,
The faithless to her lord;
He loved the soul, and sought its good,
The plague-spot robe abhorred!

The danger of tampering with Vice. No. 2.

BY REV. E. H. CHAPIN.

I WOULD say, then, to him who is at all disposed to tamper with any vice—you are in danger of subtracting from your own welfare. However slightly you propose to indulge in that sin, it will be better for you not to indulge in it at all. Indulge in it, and you will find that this is the case—resist it, and you will find my words prove true; in the one instance, they will be demonstrated in the anguish of a bitter experience—in the other, by the joys of an approving conscience, and the rewards of well employed gifts and opportunities.

For, consider—the hours you spend in dissipation—in gaming, drunkenness, licentiousness; are not only so many hours mis-spent, but so many hours mis-improved. If we are placed here for pupilage—if earth and life are our school; then every moment is burdened with a precious lesson for us which we may, according as we employ that moment, learn or neglect. The hour that you spend in drinking, or in gaming, you might spend in acquiring knowledge—and you know whether will the most conduce to your welfare that knowledge, or the fleeting pleasure that goes not beyond the convivial circle, or lives only in the excitement of the game of chance. The hour that you employ in yielding to small temptations, you might employ in doing a benevolent act—and you know whether you will be happier in remembering that act, or in revelling in that momentary indulgence. Thus, he who indulges in vice, though only in a small degree, not only becomes worse, but neglects an opportunity of becoming better—not only does evil, but loses some means of doing good.

Is there one who reads this, that is in the practice of any vicious course—who is strengthening himself with the idea that there is no great wrong in that course, and means to desist before he has done much, if any harm? Is there one who is thus disposed to tamper in the slightest degree with vice through its first and small temptations? I ask him seriously to consider the point. By that vicious indulgence you inflict a double injury. Not only are you doing evil, but you are neglecting good—you are neglecting the improvement of your mind and your heart. The hours which you select for these practices are, probably, those which you call leisure-hours—hours when you are free from the pressing requirements of business. These are the very seasons for improvement—the golden sands in the glass of Time, rich and inestimably precious. If you neglect these, you neglect your best opportunities for intellectual and moral culture—if you mis-employ but a portion of them, still, so much of your time is worse than wasted.

This, then, is one truth in the case;—he who tampers in the least degree with vice, subtracts from the amount of happiness which he might otherwise enjoy, and which the consistently virtuous man actually possesses. We have shown that this is so, from the fact that he who commits evil and repents, has not so much happiness as he who resists that evil and conquers it—for he, in committing that evil, mis-spends and mis-employs glorious opportunities, which the consistently virtuous man uses for his welfare and progress. But the victim of vice not only incurs an actual loss during the commission of that vice, but also leaves a waste in his life over which, even in distant years, he will weep, even with keen remorse and anguish. Had he resisted that vice through all its temptations—had he refused to hold any parley with it; he would have been spared so much pain—he would have been, at least, so much the happier.

This then, we must admit, taking the mildest view of the dangers of vice. We have gone upon the supposition that a man only indulges in it a little—that he repents of it, and reforms; and still we see that it is the source of evil and unhappiness. We have enough, then, in this fact, to warrant us in lifting our voice against the yielding in the least degree to temptation—against taking even one step in the path of wrong-doing. Let him who has played but one stake—who has indulged in but one intemperate draught—who has been polluted but by one vicious act, beware. It is a dangerous matter, and its evil results, in almost every case, are vast and various.

II. I would, in the second place, warn against the danger of tampering in the least degree with vice, from the fact that its small temptations are illusive and deceitful. They lead us astray before we are aware. They often come to us in an innocent garb—they lure us with a pleasant smile; but let us not be deluded into any fellowship with iniquity.

‘Vice is a monster of such hideous mien;
It, to be hated, needs but to be seen,’

is the well known maxim; but the danger is that we do not always see it in its naked deformity. It comes to us, perhaps, when we are in the hey-day of youth and excitement, and spreads before us its glittering allurements, with the familiar catch-words—‘There is no harm in this’—‘There is no harm in that’;—‘We will take but this one glass’—‘We will play but this one game.’ and, dreaming under this idea, it shears us of our strength and twines its green withes around us. Mokanna-like, it dazzles and cheats us and leads us on, until, in a fatal moment, it lifts the veil and we see its ‘hideous mien’—to ‘hate’ it when it is too late to prevent our ruin. Think you the gamester, at his first venture, sees the ruined hopes, the bloody horrors, the depths of crime and guilt that shall cluster around him when he puts down his last stake? Think you the drunkard beholds the haggard face of his broken-hearted wife, or hears the piteous cries of his starving little ones, or sees his desolate hearth-stone, when he first puts the fatal glass to his lips? Ah! no. This is reserved for that hour when his brain is on fire, and he is a crushed and writhing victim of intemperance. Had not vice such Proteus shapes—did it present in its first overtures the ghastly features with which it looks upon us when we become its chained and doomed victims, then would its power be lost, and its temptations be of no effect. But the pleasant associations with which it first comes to us—the deceptions, yet soothing words with which it tempts us to yield but once, ‘only once,’ to its allurements—these, these are the snares of destruction—the too often fatal means of our overthrow.

We say, then, tamper not in the least degree with vice, under the specious idea that there is no danger in participating slightly in its pleasures. You know not how deceitful it is—how it leads you on, almost imperceptibly, to ruin. This delusive promise that it whispers in your ears, that you shall not be drawn beyond the bounds of innocent recreation and lawful action, it has whispered in the ears of hundreds, who pass you with haggard faces, who totter along the streets in the last stages of intemperance, who slumber in dungeons and lazaret-houses, who moulder, forgetful and forgotten, in neglected graves, to which their burning passions, their wild excesses, and their guilty deeds hurried them.

The way in which such as these were led along, is simple. It is the old story. The young man started in life with fair prospects. He became acquainted, and his associations soon ripened into intimacy. Something was sought for that would cause the intervals of business and repose to pass pleasantly. A game at cards, or billiards, was proposed. Soon, it became apparent that a new excitement was needed to give zest to the game. ‘Why not,’ it was argued, ‘Why not make up a small stake?—it shall be but a trifling sum, and there is no harm in it.’ Mark the deceitfulness of this temptation. That was a small sum, to be sure, and it might, comparatively, be said that there was no harm in it. But did not that which began for amusement, become a game for interest, and then the deep hazard of desperation, until it ended in the gamester’s ruin, and the gamester’s shame? So was that victim led along; so have hundreds been dazzled, mocked, crushed! They have not resisted the fatal first attack of vice. They have not, as they should, hated it when it appeared the most fascinating. They have forgotten that it can never tempt them in its naked deformity, but assumes the air of innocent pleasure, or deludes them to resolve that they will yield to temptation ‘only once.’ ‘Only once!’—how many have said that as they commenced the downward career! ‘Only once,’ said the young man, as he put the glass to his lips. Look now at his blood-shot eyes—listen to his delirious ravings; his is the death-bed of the drunkard! ‘Only once,’ said another, tempted by glittering wealth, that was in his reach, but not his own. Open yon prison-doors—look into that dim-lighted cell; that is the man, with the brand of infamy upon him, his prospects blasted, and his character lost! Oh! the sophistry of vice—beware of it. Listen not to it when it whispers smooth things. You have one guiding rule in this matter, that points your course of action as the needle points to the north. You have but to ask—‘Is the matter proposed contrary to duty, to the fixed, firm path of rectitude;’ and if the answer is ‘yea,’ let no siren-song delude you into Charybdis on the one hand, or Scylla on the other. Let not the truth, that others have been tempted just as you are, and as they have yielded to that temptation or overcome it, so have they been miserable or prosperous, escape your notice. Beware of one, of the least deviation from the right.

III. Once more;—we would warn against tampering in the least degree with vice—against yielding to the smallest temptation—from the fact that great vices are generally reached through the door of small ones. If you indulge the least in vice, you have no more security against ruin than thousands who have entered upon the same path, in exactly the same way that you have. They began by committing small evils—by tampering with vice. We may surely say that no man ever deliberately rushed into crime or guilty excess, the first time. No man ever sat down and said—‘In so many years I will become a confirmed drunkard, or a reckless libertine, or a desperate vagabond.’ And yet hundreds have become so. How was it? They began by tampering with vice. They partook of the evil at first, not by copious draughts, but by gentle sippings. The passion that led them to theft, robbery, murder, was kindled first by one burning excitement, and then by another, until the mad flame ran riot through their veins, and their hands were stained with crime. The idea of becoming gamesters, libertines, sots, criminals!—it would have frozen the blood at their very hearts! Oh! no—they were safe enough from such fate—they were only engaged in a little innocent amusement—a pleasant, convivial party.' There was lighted the spark of their destruction.

So did they reason—so, I say, do you reason, if you are indulging, in the least degree, in vicious courses. Their reasoning has proved fallacious—let us say, if you continue in your vicious course, so will yours. We lift a solemn warning against these small temptations. Go to that lone, deserted wife. Hear her sad story. She will tell you that that husband, who, she expects, will come home steeped in drunkenness, and strong in brutality, was, a few years ago, an honest, industrious, sober man. He began, however, to take a glass—say, once a week. He soon thought there was no harm in taking two a week. It was soon two a day. Anon, it was the insatiable thirst of burning intemperance. The peaceful home became the abode of abject poverty. The relics of her younger and happier days, were sold to gratify that evil appetite. Her children are famishing. Her weak hands cannot keep back from the desperate grasp of their father enough of her hard-bought earnings to buy them bread. Forsaken, desolate, crushed at the heart, there is but one rest for her—the grave! See the effects of one wrong indulgence!

But we need not take up time in illustrations. We trust that we have succeeded in impressing the danger of tampering with vice, from the fact that it leads to immensely evil results. Those results are not easily exaggerated. They are written on blood-dimmed and tear-stained pages of the great book of human life. They are recorded on peaceful tomb-stones, that guard the slumbers of broken hearts. They are traced upon haggard faces that scowl through dungeon-grates, or crouch in kennels and nooks of the streets. They speak in low moans from the homes of destitution and pining misery. They rise in fearful oaths from the haunts of vice and crime. They glow like a fever spot on the pale cheek of ruined innocence. They are seen on every withered hope, on every broken promise that strews the pathway of humanity. Where the coin glitters upon the eventful board, where the wine 'moveth itself aright' in the cup, where the haunts of licentiousness open their gates—away along, stretching over a frightful mass of misery and shame, we read in letters of undying light, 'Behold, how great a matter a little fire kindleth!' Behold how a simple and single vice—how one evil deed, one victory of temptation over virtue—causes deep sorrow, abject wretchedness, burning guilt, cankering remorse, depraved appetite, disease, death, infamy!

We have said it is not easy to exaggerate the results of tampering with vice. Reality would far exceed our pictures. Living portraits might be exhibited, that would cause the cup to fall from the trembling hand, and the heart to melt with gratitude that it yet was saved from such an end. Still there are those, respected, honored, loved, who will tamper with vice—who will heed its allurements, under the idea that what they do is no harm, is very trifling, and they shall never fall. It is hard to dispel this illusion. It is difficult to open these charmed eyes. They look upon their neighbors and acquaintances—or think of some whom they have heard of—to whom they believe that those remarks are applicable because, really, they are indulging in vice; but as for themselves, they are pursuing a course that is quite harmless. It is time that such should awake from their delusion. It is time that they had learned that not the least tampering with vice, to the amount of a penny, or a drop, or a word, is safe. The principle that is capable of communicating evil, is capable of setting in motion a train of incalculably evil results. Through a thousand men, through fifty generations, it may prevail!

Thus we have endeavored to treat the subject of the danger of tampering with vice. It is an important and a needed topic. As we said in the commencement, it is well to labor upon the sources of moral evil. This tampering with vice—this yielding to small temptations—is we believe, one great source. Who is guilty in this respect? Let him abandon his present course! He is treading on the first steps of a dark and downward way. Let him withdraw his foot hastily, and be grateful that he may yet walk in the sunshine and the air of the pure upper heaven.

THERE is great professions among mankind. Some profess to take a deep interest in the welfare of their friends—others profess a profound regard for the well-being of the afflicted; while others profess great alarm at the treatment many receive at the hands of their professed friends. Such are professions. Let us act in justice.

Country Life.

'O HAPPY if ye knew your happy state,
Ye rangers of the fields! whom nature's boon
Cheers with her smiles, and every element
Conspires to bless.'

THE ideas entertained of society are various, according with the different habits, feelings and dispositions of individuals. Those who have become accustomed to the bustle, the frivolities, and the dissipation of gay life, are generally discontented excepting when they are in the midst of the pleasures attendant upon such scenes. Yet it is not always so. There are some aching hearts in the smiling crowd which long for retirement and communion with Nature. But those aching hearts belong not to such individuals as have received all their ideas of society from the halls of pleasure, and who have been regularly trained for the enjoyment of superficial conversation and heartless mirth. These would be out of their element when removed from the scenes of festivity, and, if left to their own silent reflections, would derive but little pleasure from a communion with their own hearts—having nothing solid within wherewith to entertain themselves.

But we judge too hastily when we suppose that every person in fashionable life—every person who is fond of dress, and show, and parade, is necessarily possessed of a weak and insipid intellect. There are many wise men and women who succumb to prevailing customs, and while despising the empty forms of fashionable life, are so situated in society that they cannot dispense with them conveniently. It is to be feared, however, that the votaries of fashion are generally wanting in those stable and substantial qualities without which no rational being can enjoy inward peace and satisfaction. Yet they are the subjects of envy to those unsophisticated persons who have had no means of knowing the hollowness of worldly pleasures. From this cause arise many miscalculations. The happy swain, while surrounded with all that is innocent, pleasant, and lovely, repines as he looks upon the gay tinsel of the world, and fancies that he should be much happier if he could mingle in the giddy dance and assume the livery of the sons of fortune. The milkmaid—the farmer's rosy daughter—pants for the gilded halls of the metropolis, and longs to assume the butterfly wings of pleasure and flit away to those flowery joys that look so pleasant to the eye, but so quickly pall upon the sense when more nearly approached.

Of all grand mistakes this is one of the greatest which our young men and women are prone to make. It is true that variety is pleasing, and we are all fond of change; but it is always better to endure a little monotony than to rush upon changes which are likely to make our situation still more unendurable. Again—much of the restlessness which we feel is owing to a want of consideration on our part—an unthankful heart—and a remissness in making the most of our situation. How often does the man look back upon the days of his childhood and sigh that they are past. Yet in the days of his childhood he panted to be a man. Now that he is a man he will not enjoy the happiness which is within his grasp, and when he was a lad, he refused to be comforted until he should become a man. Thus do we afflict ourselves with love of change, and disgust at blessings which ought to afford us rational enjoyment. To no other cause can we attribute the strange desire which the happy inhabitants of the country evince to rush into the crowd of cities, and exchange an honest independence for those servile and menial stations, to which their narrow means or deficient knowledge of the world condemn them. One case of this kind, with which I became acquainted, will answer for an illustration of this subject; and will prevent much didactic argumentation.

We once knew a young country girl of considerable personal beauty, and most engaging manners, who had been brought up and educated in the interior of one of the New England States. The free air of heaven, and the healthful pursuits to which she had been trained gave to her complexion that exquisite union of the rose with the lily which has so long been the theme of the poet's song. The peace of heaven dwelt upon her polished brow, and no tears but those of joy ever she stained her virgin cheek. She lived at home with her parents. When the morning blushed in the East, she might be observed among the flowers, looking like the daughter of Flora herself as she tended and nursed the opening buds and expanding petals. When the sun had reached his greatest altitude and poured down his sheets of flame upon the scorched earth, she hid herself in the wooded recesses of the surrounding hills, and plied her needle amid the fragrance of the wild grape, the clambering flowers, and the nameless perfumes of green things which always remind us of early youth. She was happy and contented—the pride of her father's dwelling, and the ornament of the Valley. Her father was not wealthy, but he had enough for the supply of all the real comforts of life. His blooming daughter could attire herself as well as any damsel in the neighborhood, and there were none to look down upon her. When she walked over to the village church—the spire of which just shot up above the cluster of hemlocks that grew on the distant corner of her father's land—there was no lordly carriage to intercept her on her journey and cover her light airy bonnet with the dust of its wheels. When she walked up the aisle no purse-proud fop surveyed her with open and insulting admiration, like an animal in the market for sale. When service was over, she received the hearty greetings of a score of blithesome acquaintances as free from sorrow and as innocent as herself. She knew not her own happiness, nor how different was her lot from that of thousands who revelled in the blaze of worldly prosperity. The calm, the quiet of her native skies, and the peacefulness of the rural vale she knew not how to compare with scenes of a contrary character, for she had lived at home from her infancy.

As she began to put on the ripe charms of young womanhood, her company was sought by several of the neighboring youths; and one was accepted as a lover. He was as unaffected, as simple, and as innocent as herself. They seemed to be perfectly happy in each other's society. They would have been happy had they been united. He was a thriving young farmer, and his father's golden peach orchard adjoined her father's meadow lands. When I left the valley, I supposed that they would be united in a few weeks. Several years afterward business led me in that direction. I went a few miles out of my way to visit the valley. The well-remembered farmhouse was there, with its white garden gate, still shaded by the tall chestnuts, which had so often been the traveller's beacon to the house of hospitality. But the life and the beauty of that interesting spot were missing. At that I was not surprised, but I was astonished when her mother informed me that she had not married the young swain to whom her heart had appeared indissolubly wedded. 'Girls will be girls,' said the smiling old lady—'Margaret liked Thomas well enough—but she had a chance to make as she thought a better bargain. She is now a Boston lady. A young gentleman from the city paid us a visit and he was taken mightily with Margaret. He told her so many fine things about the city, that she must needs be a fine lady, and so she has run off from her poor old father and mother. But I don't know as we ought to find fault, since she is doing well.' After extracting a promise from me that I would call upon her daughter when I returned to town, she gave me the direction, 'Mrs. Anderson, No. 14 * * * * street.'

In a month afterward I was picking my way through the mud to the dwelling of 'Mrs. Anderson.' The appearance of the house was not prepossessing. It was situated in a dark, narrow street, in the dirtiest part of the town, surrounded on all sides by wretched old tenements, black and smoky. The house occupied by Margaret was little better than they, and as I knocked at the rickety door, it reeled as if it would have fallen from its hinges. A squalid child stood in the entry endeavoring to knock down a large spider web with a pair of broken bellows. The insalubrious and smoky atmosphere of this dwelling would have deterred me from entering, had not a pale, hollow-cheeked, and poorly dressed woman presented herself in the passage.

'Good woman,' said I, 'does a Mrs. Anderson live hereabout?' She smiled and called me by name—but that smile and that voice! I turned away my head to conceal the rising tear, and it was a moment before I was sufficiently composed to return her greeting. This was Margaret. She had been indeed married to a citizen. Her husband was barely able to procure the necessaries of life, and she lived in the midst of discomfort and anxiety. In return for all this, she had the happiness of knowing that she was a 'Boston lady!' Thus was the fair flower of * * * * Valley condemned by a false ambition to wither and die in the atmosphere of poverty and gloom.

On the Removal of Napoleon

From St. Helena.

THEY have borne him from that island tomb,
Where he in peace was sleeping,
Unmoved by the dash of ocean's foam,
And wild waves, madly leaping.

Ah meet was that high and rocky bed,
For one so brave and daring—
Who had ruled with might on a stormy throne,
His blood stained laurels wearing.

From the snow crowned peaks of the mighty Alps
The roar of his cannon thundered,

And Europe's kingdoms shook in dread,
While the world looked on—and wondered.

And Egypt owned his conquering power,
And trembling bowed before him;
And to the banks of the ancient Nile,
The tide of victory bore him.

Through Russia's realms to mark his path,
Moscow's fair towers were lighted!
And the Autocrat of the gloomy north,
Shrunk back from the blaze affrighted.

As to a brilliant meteor's flash,
The eye of the world was turning,
As brightly he beamed along the sky,
And dazzled with his burning.

But his guiding star went down in gloom—
O'er Waterloo's field it faded!
And dark and gloomy was his night,
And few his retreat invaded.

On Helena's lone and sea-girt isle,
The waters the rude rocks lashing,
With naught to disturb the silence there,
But the sound of the billows dashing,—

That mighty spirit passed away
From the chains of earth that bound him,
And he slept alone, on the silent rock,
With none to weep around him.

But they've borne him where the verdant vines
Above his grave are wreathing,—
Where the gentle winds around his tomb
A sweet perfume are breathing.

But a grave more meet was Helena's isle,
Enshrined in the rolling ocean,
For him who paid at ambition's shrine,
So dread, so deep a devotion.

Good Manners.

'Show no part of study but the grace.'

ALL persons who are good natured and well disposed do not possess good manners. On the other hand, there are many ill-disposed and ill-natured individuals who would pass in the world for persons of good breeding. Many of the worst deceivers in society cultivate good manners in order to carry on their nefarious transactions with more ease and success.—For 'what fairer cloak than courtesy for fraud.' Shakspeare says that 'A man may smile and smile and be a villain.' Some of the most consummate villains in existence will pass very well for men of good breeding. A close scrutiny may detect no breach of etiquette—no awkward movement—nothing that would not be tolerable in polite society. That blot upon the human character termed 'A man of the world,' may be celebrated far and wide for his politeness, his affability, and tact. Yet some philosophers have defined good manners as the desire to bestow and receive happiness. This desire may exist where good manners are wanting; and good manners may be rigidly adhered to where there is no desire but to inflict misery—to benefit one's self at the expense of others. It will be understood that I here speak of good manners, according to the general acceptance of the words.

A person of kind and honorable feelings may not possess good manners. With all his desire to confer happiness, he may be endowed with no refinement of feeling. He may be deficient in education, in knowledge of mankind, and may be decidedly coarse and vulgar in his conceptions. He cannot, therefore, possess good manners which require a tact, an easy address, and a mode of performing the most trivial kindness, which will prevent the danger of wounding any of those fine sensibilities common in the advanced stages of society. The simplicity of such an individual will, however, plead for him; and a smile may mingle with the glow of resentment that has risen to our cheek. But the selfish and designing man, when thoroughly known and understood will give real offence, and his polished manners will only increase our resentment, as men entertain more horror of the smooth and poisonous serpent, than of the shaggy bear, the gaunt wolf, or the roaring tempest.

The well-disposed man, who is naturally rude and vulgar, will not give offence where he is thoroughly known; but the evil man will please only where he is not thoroughly known, and the society to which he may win his way by a polite address, would eject him from its bosom if he were stripped of his disguise. Still ill manners are a fault. They are regarded as such by every one who possesses delicacy of feeling. So conscious are the generality of mankind of this, that those who possess no refinement of feeling find it necessary to learn the mechanical routine of etiquette in order to secure a place in polite society. It would be extremely difficult to mimic refinement and to pass off the spurious for the genuine material were it not unhappily the case that a great proportion of this polite society is made up of people who, themselves, have little natural delicacy and who understand nothing but the art of politeness.—Individuals fall into a great error when they affect delicacy and refinement, and suppose themselves to be polite on the strength of this kind of mimicry. In the first place, it is so extremely difficult for persons of this description to obtain the necessary skill in the art, that they sometimes betray themselves. As they do not act according to nature, it is not to be expected that they will at all times enact their part in the most approved style; and they affect the judicious observer in much the same manner as does the sight of a laced coat out at the elbows and soiled with grease, or a piece of carved work from which the gilding has, in several places, been rubbed off, betraying a very cheap kind of wood, not worth the labor and expense which have been bestowed upon it. Such persons would have done better if they had never assumed a garb not fitted to their persons. The natural, honest, though rude manners of an unpretending backwoodsman are far more tolerable than the unsuccessful affectation of delicacy. What is contrary to nature must always be in bad taste. Yet some individuals have, in a good degree, succeeded in covering up the natural rudeness of their nature or true character by the observance of a multiplicity of rules and regulations, as burthensome and as imperfect as were the ceremonies and formal observances of the old Jewish law. But alas! how vain have they proved in the hour of trial. Like all forms destitute of the spirit, their utter futility is every day exposed. Like an automaton the votaries of ceremony play their part in those peculiar situations for which they have qualified themselves; but when thrown out of the peculiar sphere for which they are designed can no more move forward with credit to themselves than a rail-road car could make progress when thrown off the track. But persons possessed of a good heart combined with delicacy of feeling will never appear to be regardless of the feelings and the comfort of others.

I make no doubt that the friends of Job appeared sufficiently regardful of his feelings when he was rich and happy; I do not doubt that they treated him with the most punctilious ceremony. But when the gale of adversity swept over his prospects and levelled him to the dust, their want of natural refinement was exposed. A man of delicacy would, at such a time, have avoided any insinuation that could have been construed into reproach; and, above all, he would have avoided the most distant hint that the woes of the sufferer were the result of his own misconduct. It is not sufficient to say that Job's friends were cruel—they were also coarse and vulgar. The Savior particularly alludes to this kind of indelicacy. 'Think not that those upon whom the tower of Siloam fell were sinners above all; for unless ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.'

I would not be understood as teaching that instruction is useless—but it must be instruction of the head. No rules of politeness can give birth to a refined taste; but knowledge is often requisite to direct and control that taste where it really exists. For instance—a man possessed of the most refined feelings might send his servant with a piece of good bacon to a gentleman who resided in his neighborhood. The gentleman's feelings are deeply wounded, and he turns the messenger out of doors. The donor is astonished; but when he makes inquiry, he discovers that his neighbor is a Jew, and that he very naturally supposed the bacon was sent for the express purpose of insulting him. Now had the former individual been instructed that the latter was a Jew, and that Jews detested pork, he would not have been guilty of this breach of politeness for the world. To commence a discourse respecting convicts or prisons when an individual within hearing has suffered by incarceration for some disgraceful crime would also be a great breach of propriety; yet a man ignorant of facts might be guilty of it. A person with the most delicate taste may err for the want of knowing the peculiar customs, prejudices, partialities, and antipathies of the people among whom he may be thrown. Instruction on these points will therefore be necessary.

Persons whose good manners have been the result of artificial breeding, and not of natural refinement, are very likely to suppose that a certain mechanical routine is to be observed every where and on all occasions. They appear to suppose that the rules of good breeding constitute one mould in which the manners of all persons must be cast. But it is not necessary that individuals should lose their personal identity in order to be polite. It is not requisite that a profound jurist should chatter like a gay lad of nineteen, or that the facetious man should measure out his humor by drachms. Diversity in character is pleasing; and a monotonous uniformity of manner is irksome and unprofitable. A man who is naturally open and candid may give way to considerable bluntness without violating the rules of good breeding; but he must give evidence that this sincerity is perfectly natural to him—for affected bluntness is far more disgusting than artificial gentleness. When we see a man particularly smooth and courteous, to persons from whom he is desirous of obtaining a favor, and very abrupt when conversing with those who are incapable of forwarding his interests, we are obliged to form a very unfavorable opinion of his head and heart. An honest, straightforward man may sometimes appear abrupt, but he seldom wounds the feelings of those with whom he converses. A broad allusion to any natural defect or deformity is always much better than a clumsy insinuation, when such defects are alluded to in a careless common-place manner, the sufferer naturally supposes that the speaker thinks his peculiar misfortune a mere every day affair and nothing of which he should be ashamed; but when a delicate insinuation—very carefully worded—is used, he concludes that his deformity is regarded as a mighty matter that could not be named without creating quite a sensation. After such insinuation has been made, however, there is no remedy but to quit the subject as soon as possible. In these cases politeness should not be strained. The following illustration may serve. I was once in company with several young men, when a stranger was introduced who had the misfortune to be born without a nose. After we were all seated, one of the company handed round cigars. As the evening was very cold, he thought proper to say—‘these cigars will warm your noses.’ One of the company immediately jogged the speaker and covertly nodded toward the stranger. The unfortunate individual did not appear to have observed the remark; but the young man who had uttered the questionable words thought it incumbent on him to make an apology. He accordingly rose, with great formality, and, advancing directly in front of the young man without a nose, assured him in a labored speech of some length that in the observation which he had just made respecting noses, there was not the most distant intention of hurting his feelings—that so far from that, he considered him as peculiarly unfortunate, and that he pitied him from his very soul; and many other things he said which were intended to have a very soothing effect. Every other individual in the company thought the apologist extremely rude, and the sufferer himself was probably never so much mortified in his life. No apology could have expiated such an apology.

As I Think.

It is a man's proper business to seek happiness and avoid misery. Happiness consists in what delights and contents the mind; misery in what disturbs, discomposes, or torments it.

I will therefore make it my business to seek satisfaction and delight, and avoid uneasiness and disquiet; to have as much of the one and as little of the other as may be.

But here I must have a care I mistake not; for if I prefer a short pleasure to a lasting one, it is plain I cross my own happiness.

Let me then see wherein consists the most lasting pleasure of this life, and that as far as I can observe, is in these things:

1st. Health,—without which no sensual pleasure can have any relish.

2d. Reputation,—for that I find every body is pleased with, and the want of it is a constant torment.

3d. Knowledge,—for the little knowledge I have I find I would not sell at any rate, nor part with for any other pleasure.

4th. Doing good,—for I find the well-cooked meat I eat to-day does now no more delight me, nay, I am diseased after a full meal; the perfumes I smelt yesterday now no more affect me with any pleasure: but the good turn I did yesterday, a year, seven years since, continues still to please and delight me as often as I reflect on it.

5th. The expectation of eternal and incomprehensible happiness in another world is that also which carries a constant pleasure with it.

If, then, I will faithfully pursue that happiness I propose to myself, whatever pleasure offers itself to me, I must carefully look that it cross not any of those five great and constant pleasures above mentioned. For example, the fruit I see tempts me with the taste of it that I love; but if it endanger my health, I part with a constant and lasting for a very short and transient pleasure, and so foolishly make myself unhappy, and am not true to my own interest.

Innocent diversions delight me; if I make use of them to refresh myself after study and business, restore the vigor of my mind, and increase my pleasure, but if I spend all or the greater part of my time in them, they hinder my improvement in knowledge and useful arts, they blast my credit, and give me up to the uneasy state of shame, ignorance and contempt, in which I cannot but be very unhappy. Drinking, gaming, and vicious delights will do me this mischief, not only by wasting my time, but by a positive injury endanger my health, impair my parts, imprint my habits, lessen my esteem, and leave a constant lasting torment on my conscience; therefore all vicious and unlawful pleasures I will always avoid, because such a mastery of my passions will afford me a constant pleasure, greater than any such enjoyments, and also deliver me from the certain evil of several kinds, that by indulging myself in a present temptation I shall certainly afterwards suffer.

All innocent diversions, and delights as far as they will contribute to my health, and consist with my improvement, condition, and my other more solid pleasures of knowledge and reputation, I will enjoy, but no farther; and this I will carefully watch and examine, that I may not be deceived by the flattery of a present pleasure to lose a greater.

Worth of Hope.

BY REV. W. S. BALLOU.

'AUSPICIOUS Hope! in thy green garden grow
Wreaths for each toil, a charm for every woe.'

CAMPBELL.

THE paths of life are interspersed with light and shade; and dark indeed would they be were they not illuminated with the rays of hope. When life is overshadowed in darkness, and the heart in its loneliness sickens at the prospect around, hope lights up its star in the mind, and dissipates the gloom.

Man sets out in life full of expectation; he looks forth with an ardent eye for happiness; and often bright visions of unreal bliss dazzle his visions as he gazes on. How light is his step, and how buoyant his heart, as he goes forth in the spring time of life to enjoy the visions of bliss and beauty that glow in his imagination and fill his mind with fond anticipations of delight. How sweet is the dream that comes over him! How bright the vision of the future! These are the sunny days of childhood and youth. The selfishness and coldness of the world have not chilled the ardor of his earthly hopes, nor suppressed the warm and free flow of his feelings, which are like the mountain cascade, ever leaping forth, and reflecting the golden hues of the sunbeam. But a change comes. The early flower that lifts its head with joy, and loads the passing breeze with its sweetness, is destined to wither and fade in the coming frost at eventide. So with man. When the vision that dazzled in the distance is reached—when the heart is schooled by the possession of the realities of earth, the brightness of the vision has fled, and the soul finds not that fullness of bliss and satisfaction for which it long-ed, and of which it had dreamed. And when about to descend the declivity of life, with an eye turned towards the vale through which we have passed, the brightest spot that delights and gladdens is the green oasis where we once sported in the halcyon days of youth.

'My youthful home! my youthful home! O would I were with thee,
Again to wander through thy vale, where the bright streams leap free.'

But the companions of those bright hours! where are they? Their footsteps are not heard in the pathway which we travel. And when we go once more and stand upon the spot of our youthful home, and stroll again over the scenes of early life, a mighty change, sad and drear, has past over it, and all that once lit up rapture and joy in our hearts has passed away. The companions who once mingled their voices with ours, and sported with us over these scenes have fled; the requiem of early joys seems to toll upon the ear; and the heart in its desolation feels that it is a stranger on earth. When light after light has thus faded away, how dear is the hope of a final home in the skies, where friendship and joy shall no more die away from our hearts! How poorly are we qualified for the journey of existence, without the hope of immortality which the gospel confers. Under its refuge the way-worn, and homeless pilgrim of time finds rest. Into its bowers, the weary and grief-laden come, and find a balm for their woes. Happy indeed is he, whose days are lighted by that hope which lifts his eyes from the transitory scene of earth to a world of changeless glory; and who, when wrapt in a mantle of grief while the sky is dark over him, can look forward to a final home, where his pilgrimage shall be ended in the enjoyment of the beloved, whose voices have died away from his path here, where we shall be 'children of God, being children of the resurrection'?

Moonlight.

'MY thoughts are with the absent—
The beloved—the far-away.'

I SIT and muse the hours away
Till night seems changed to noon,
So brilliant smiles the scene around
Beneath the moon of June.

The leaves hang silent on the trees,
There is no voice or sound,
For every bird that breathed a note,
Its sheltered nest has found.

The pearly dew with sparkling wreaths
 Bedecks each leaf and flower,
 And forms of light seem bending near
 To bless this charmed hour.

Upon yon bright unruffled stream
 The skies are pictured fair,
 And the sweet moon looks down to see
 Her image shining there.

And as beneath her silent spell,
 The waters upward roll,
 So does the tide of memory swell
 Within my restless soul.

They come—the thoughts I tried to hush—
 Like billows in their might,
 Till the seventh wave outspeaks them all,
 And shrouds my heart in night.

Why wake ye thus, O gentle moon!
 Sad memories of the past?
 Why should the eyes that look on thee
 With tear-drops fill so fast?

Thou hast a spell of tenderness
 Over this heart of mine;
 The absent and the loved are bound
 With every ray of thine.

Calista! in the 'stilly night'
 My thoughts go forth to thee;
 The moon which lit thy bridal hour,
 Is shining now on me.

But little has that fair orb changed,
 Since at the altar's side,
 I saw thee in thy beauty stand,
 A loved and happy bride.

I did not weep, for thou wert blest,
 And tears were not for thee;
 I could not smile, for then I felt,
 How great my loss would be.

I gave thee up, with one fond prayer,
 That all his promised love,
 Through many long and happy years,
 Changeless as mine might prove.

We still are friends, but not the same,
 New hopes and ties are thine,
 While lonely and bereft remains,
 This wakeful heart of mine.

I sigh to meet thy loving glance,
 Thy gentle voice to hear;
 But sadly steal the hours away,
 Thou art no longer near.

O, many a moon has come and waned,
 And many a year gone by,
 Short have our partings been; but now
 Long miles between us lie.

And when I saw thee last, sweet friend,
 A sad foreboding came,
 To chill my spirit with the thought
 We ne'er might meet again.

For in the silent hours of night,
 Dark dreams have troubled me,
 Dreams of the coffin and the grave,
 But, dearest, not for thee.

No, bright thy future lot appears,
 Before my dreaming eye,
 And hope points out the many joys
 Which round thy pathway lie.

O, ever, may those visioned joys
 On thee and thine attend!
 I leave thee to the care of heaven,
 Mine own beloved friend.

Pale moon! what seest thou in the space
 Thy silvery light doth fill?
 The songs of revelry are hushed,
 The viol's voice is still.

Thou lookest on the waning lamp
 Which weary watchers trim,
 On cheeks where tears have left their trace,
 And eyes with sorrow dim.

Yet all untroubled is thy smile;
 No searching eye can trace,
 A shadow from the ills of earth,
 Upon thy placid face.

Would that thy light, serene and mild,
 With peace my soul might fill;
 Would I could walk my path like thee,
 And bid my heart be still.

Activity a Christian Duty.

BY REV. S. GOFF.

MAN is an active being. He was designed by his Creator to employ his physical, intellectual, and moral powers, in procuring the comforts, the enjoyments, and the happiness of the present state of existence. From the highest to the lowest of our race, man is seeking for happiness as for 'a hid treasure.' Blessings are in store for him, but he cannot obtain them without paying the price which they cost. The earth and the heavens; nature and revelation, are full of rich treasures. The mind, the intellect, and the heart are stored with inexhaustible resources of pure enjoyment. But these treasures, and this enjoyment, are not for the indolent, the ignorant, and the undeserving. They exist only for the diligent, the persevering, and the deserving. He, then, who would enjoy the treasures of peace and happiness which the God of nature has every where in store for his obedient children, must be active—must employ the means which are conferred upon him for this purpose. If he would enter the temple of knowledge and drink from the fount of pure bliss he must apply the key of activity to the lock of perseverance, and the temple gate will fly open before him, and discover, to his enraptured vision, the glories of paradise within.

Man is also a progressive being. And there is no progression without activity. The temple of knowledge, and consequently of happiness—for knowledge is essential to true happiness—stands, as it were, on the summit of a lofty mountain. Not unapproached by mortals, it is true; yet requiring untiring and persevering exertions for its attainment. But the pathway up the steep and rugged ascent is bestrewed with fruits and flowers. And these become more delicious, and grow more beautiful as the traveller progresses onward. Hence we perceive that activity is essential to the attainment of happiness; and that knowledge is essential to happiness; and that happiness becomes purer and more refined the nearer we advance toward the temple of all knowledge and consequent felicity.

This doctrine of activity and progression in knowledge and enjoyment is beautifully illustrated by man's intellectual career. What but activity of thought, and patient, persevering reflection could have enabled Franklin to discover the identity of the electric fluid and the lightning of the heavens? A discovery which has been of incalculable advantage to mankind; which enabled him to bring the fiery element from the clouds, and arrest the thunderbolt in its career of destruction. It was activity of thought also, which led Sir Humphrey Davy to the discovery and construction of the safety lamp, an instrument which has protected thousands of our fellow beings from the destructive 'fire damp' of the coal mines. And activity of thought enabled Sir Isaac Newton to ride, as it were, on the circle of the heavens, and converse with the stars, and read those 'lectures of heavenly wisdom' which are uttered by the earth, and repeated by the stars. And hundreds of instances might be added to them, where activity of thought, and patient, persevering labor, have raised individuals high in the scales of earthly wisdom and knowledge.

And think you, kind reader, that their enjoyment was not of a purer and more perfect nature than that of those who live in indolence and ignorance? Think you that Franklin, and Davy, and Newton, had not more exalted conceptions of the omnipotent energies and all-glorious perfections of the Uncreated Mind, than he whose observations are confined within the limits of a few miles around him, and who looks upon this earth as the most stupendous work of Almighty Power? Most assuredly they had: for the wisdom, the power, and the goodness of the Creator shine forth conspicuously in all the work of his hands. And the more we study these, and the better we become acquainted with them, the more shall we love the Maker of them all, and the better shall we serve him.

And as in the intellectual, so also in the moral career of the human race, there is no progression—no advancement, onward and upward, without activity. If, therefore, we would ascend in the scale of moral excellence, and enjoy those pure and refined pleasures of which our moral natures are susceptible, all the moral powers of the soul must be trained to active, untiring, and persevering exertions. Activity is the soul of christian morality. Jesus went about doing good. And as the essence of true devotion is 'love out of a pure heart;' so the essence of true christian morality is a life of active benevolence.

William Penn was a good example of christian morality carried into practice; for he sought the happiness and well-being of all among whom he lived. He proved the power and the practicability of the precept, 'Overcome evil with good.' By the law of kindness he tamed the savage ferocity of the red man of the forest; called forth the purer and nobler principles of his nature; and enlisted his sympathies as the constant and steadfast friend of the white stranger. But John Howard was a better example than even he. The records of the human race afford few, if any, instances, of one who more nearly imitated the Master he served. He had drunk deeply from the fount of God's everlasting love; he had imbibed much of the spirit of the Man of Nazareth; and truly might it be said of him that he went about doing good.' And in doing good to, and making others happy, he found an abundant reward for all his toils, and trials, and labors of love. And he could truly say, that the soft bond which linked him to the wretched, while it soothed their sorrow, repaid him more than all the gifts an empire could bestow. Oh who would not rather be a partaker of the sublime joys and ineffable pleasures of such a heart—of a mind and a soul devoted to the promotion of human happiness, than of the low, sensual, sordid enjoyments of the ignorant and the indolent! The one is as much superior to the other, as the temple of virtue is to the degraded haunts of vice. Oh then, let us arouse to activity the dormant energies of our minds, and the latent powers of our souls, that we may reap the 'full reward of continual progression in moral excellence. For, we repeat, there is no true enjoyment without activity.

This is true in relation to christianity, as well as in matters of intellectual and moral culture. Man is an active being; and as such christianity addresses him. It appears at once, and directly to all the noble, pure, and holy principles of his nature. These it calls into vigorous, active, and continued exercise. In the plenitude of his unchanging goodness, God has opened the storehouse of his boundless love, and poured out the immortal treasures of his grace upon his wanting offspring. From the dawn of creation, stream after stream has been flowing continually from that illimitable fountain, to cheer and gladden the heart of man. And when Christ came, those streams united and formed a mighty river on which were wafted to the human race, the treasures of immortal love. But these treasures can be enjoyed only by a life of persevering activity in the christian warfare. A celestial pathway is opened for man to walk in. It is bestrewed with the fruits of faith, and the flowers of hope, and the treasures of love! Gladdening streams of salvation roll gently along on either side; birds of paradise sing in the bowers above; and kind angels are beckoning us onward! At the end of the race grows the 'Tree of Life,' whose fruit is immortality, and whose leaves are now for the healing of the nations! But these unnumbered blessings are not for the inactive, the indolent and the slothful—for those who walk not in that pathway. They partake not of those fruits, nor inhale the fragrance of those flowers, nor possess those treasures. They drink not of those gladdening waters, nor listen to that enchanting music, nor are lured on by those kind angels. Nor can they eat of the fruit of the tree of immortal life, till they have been cleansed by the healing virtue of its purifying leaves.

Then christian, arouse thee to life and activity. Gird on thy strength, and run with patience the race set before thee. Thy Master has called thee to a life of activity—a life of toil. But it is the activity of happiness—the toil of blessedness and glory. And he is now saying to you, as he said to his followers of old—'If any man will come after me—if any man will be my disciple—let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me.' Then awake thee, and be diligent to walk in the footsteps of thy Redeemer. He has set thee an example. He endured the cross despising the shame, and is now seated at the right hand of the Majesty on high. Remember, if you would win the prize, and wear the crown of a true disciple, you must run the race, and fight the battle of the christian. Run the race with patience and fidelity; fight the good fight; and keep the faith; and then there will be 'laid up' for you—and you will continually wear, 'a crown of righteousness'—yes, and a crown of glory too. Then 'the Lord will give grace and glory,' 'the one the consummation of the other.' It is a false and pernicious doctrine that the young convert, when first born into the kingdom of grace, by the spirit of love, becomes the perfect christian. Nay, it is not so. He is but a 'babe in Christ.' There is a growth in grace, and a progression in divine knowledge—a 'leaving of the first principles,' and a 'going on unto perfection.' Hence, says Paul to the Philippians, 'I count not myself to have apprehended, or become already perfect; but this one thing I do, leaving those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.'

Surely then, there is ample inducement to urge the christian onward—to stimulate him to faithfulness and fidelity in the christian warfare. A race—a celestial, a heavenly race is before him. And who would not run it?—Who would not lay aside every weight, and the sins that do so easily beset him, and run with patience the race set before him, ever looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of his faith, that he might be a partaker of the same joy? And then a crown—an immortal crown—who would not desire to wear it? The great and the good of all ages—the Patriarchs, the Prophets, the Apostles, and the host of Martyrs who sealed their testimony with their blood—these have all run the race, and won the crown. And by their example, like a cloud of witnesses, they surround us—holding us in full survey; and inviting us to forget the past, and urge our way onward! ONWARD! Yes, that should be the christian's watchword. Onward, and upward, in christian love, and knowledge, and glory, and blessedness.

The christian cannot be stationary. He is moving either onward, or backward. The Apostle speaks of some who are ever learning, and yet never able to come unto a knowledge of the truth. The true christian cannot be of that number. He is ever learning, it is true, but ever coming unto the knowledge of more truth—truth of a purer, holier, more happifying nature. And herein consists the chief glory of christianity. It leads its votaries onward and upward; and the further they progress, the brighter becomes the way. To the diligent explorer of the paths of science as he advances—

'Hills peep o'er hills, and Alps on Alps arise.'

So to him who runs the christian race, pleasure follows pleasure, joy succeeds joy, and one degree of happiness arises upon another continually, till death summons him to his eternal rest. Nor stops it even then! The all-animating voice of God, by the sweet influences of his spirit, in the gentle accents of Gospel grace, is calling us from on high; and in his own hand he holds the prize of peace, and joy, and heavenly rest, and life eternal! And as we 'press with vigor on,' Jesus bends benignantly from his throne of glory; we behold his smile of approbation, and hear his word of promise,—'Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give you a crown of life!' And then the race will be but just begun. But all its toils will be over. Then the progress will be onward and upward forever—without interruption, and without end. Then we shall 'mount upon wings as eagles, run and not be weary, walk and not faint.'

Truly then there is placed before the christian a prize glittering with bright and peerless glories—a crown that fadeth not away—and which outshines all the laurel-decked diadems, and gilded coronets of poets, and orators, and warriors, and which shall shine brighter and brighter when these are blended in common dust.

We say, then, again to the christian,—Awake to thy duty! 'Put a cheerful courage on,' and press toward the mark for the prize of your high calling of God in Christ Jesus. 'Arise, and shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee.'—And then thou shalt realize the blessedness of the promise—'The Lord shall be thine everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended.' If thou art a disciple of Jesus—if thou hast professed his name—then 'deny thyself, take up thy cross daily, and follow him.' Remember the christian life is a life of activity, and unless thou art up and doing—at 'work while the day lasts,'—thou canst not receive and enjoy the 'reward of well-doing.' Let not, then, the glittering toys of earth allure thy wandering eyes, or entice thy erring feet from the path of christian progression. Let not the 'care of this world,' or 'the deceitfulness of riches,' or the vain applause of popular favor deprive thee of the prize of righteousness, and the crown of life. Let not shameful inactivity, guilty slothfulness, or 'ignoble care' prevent thee from possessing the rich treasures of constant faith, and holy hope, and perfect love. But deny thyself of these and do the works of righteousness. Bring all the carnal and unholy propensities of thy nature into subjection to the law of thy mind. All inordinate desires and animal gratifications—'the lust of the eyes, the lusts of the flesh, and the pride of life,'—let these be denied, and every thing that hinders thee from coming up to the work with full purpose of heart, and 'enduring hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ.'

And when thou hast done this—when thou hast laid aside every obstruction that hinders thy onward progress, then 'take up thy cross.' This part of the injunction was peculiarly expressive at the time when it was uttered. The primitive disciple was called to forsake every thing that was near and dear to him—to leave houses and lands, kindred and home—and embrace, heart and hand, the cause of a despised and persecuted Leader!

But even then, as at all times, the path of duty was the path of safety. Those who forsook the cause of truth, and deserted their Master, and joined the ranks of the enemy were sure to lose their lives. While those who adhered to him—who took up their cross, and marched boldly 'through tribulation's gloomy vale'—came off conquerors, yea, more than conquerors through him who loved them, and gave himself for them.—But if the christian of the present day is not called upon to sacrifice so much as the primitive disciple, there is yet a cross for him to take up—a cross for him to bear. It is a cross for the indolent and the slothful to arouse themselves from that lethargic state of cold indifference and criminal inactivity into which they have fallen. It is often crossing to self-interest, and love of approbation to meet and withstand the sneer of superstition, the scorn of prejudice, the contempt of bigotry; and to buffet the tide of popular opinion. And in many things else will the christian find that he has a cross to take up and bear in passing through a perverse and gainsaying world.

But let him remember, if he would be a disciple of Christ, the love of his cause must be predominant in his heart. He must take up his cross and do his duty. For the Master assures that whosoever loveth father or mother, brother or sister, house or lands, more than him, is not worthy of him. Oh, then, christian, awake to thy duty, awake to thy interest, awake to thy best good. Let nothing—neither riches, nor honor, nor superstition, nor prejudice, nor popular favor prevent thee from following in the footsteps of thy Master, Jesus. But deny thyself, take up thy cross, and follow him. Follow him through evil report as well as through good report. Follow him to the scene of mourning, lamentation, and woe, and let thy hand, like his, be ever ready 'to help a brother in his need.' Follow him to the chamber of the sick, the couch of the dying, and the resting place of the dead; and 'weep with those that weep, and mourn with those that mourn.' Follow him among foes as well as among friends. Follow him in a life devoted to the service of God, and the promotion of human happiness. Follow him to the Garden of Gethsemane, the hall of judgment, and the scene of crucifixion, and behold the sufferings he endured for you, and let your heart be purified and made better by the contemplation. Follow him now to the sepulchre and witness his resurrection from the dead. And then follow on to the Mount of Olives, and behold his ascension into heaven. Nor rest thee, till within thy bosom is implanted the living faith and the unfading hope that thou shalt ere long follow him there, and 'reign with him as kings and priests unto his God and Father forever and ever.' Then thou wilt be worthy to be called a disciple of Christ; and through life 'the spirit of glory and of God will rest upon thee.' Thy death will be peaceful, triumphant, and glorious, and in the morn of the resurrection 'shall be abundantly administered unto thee, an entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ!'

My Father.

My Father! my Father! O, where hast thou fled?
Art thou sleeping yet, in thy cold, grassy bed!
Or has thy freed spirit, recalled from the earth,
Ascended to Heaven, the home of its birth!

I remember thee, Father, in life's early days,
How thou bore with my humor,—and joined in my plays;
Thy love and thy kindness, thy chidings so mild,
To me a capricious and frolicsome child.

Then thou wert rejoicing, in strength and in health,
The best gifts of Nature, the mind's purest wealth;
Thy step too was firm, and thy eye it was bright,
Thy arm it was powerful, and thy form upright.

Thou comest again beneath memory's light,
And thy locks with the frosts of age are white,
Thy steps are but slow, and thy strength is spent,
And thy form with the weight of years is bent.

Again thou comest! and O, how bright
Does memory picture the last sad sight!
I see thee stretched on the bed of death,—
Thy fast failing sight, and thick coming breath,
Tell that thy hour is come;
And it soothes the heart, tho' the eye must weep,
To know thou wert ready, and longed to sleep
In the silence of the tomb.

Farewell, dearest father! I see thee now
As when last I gazed on thy calm, pale brow;
The wind from the casement blew cold and chill,
And played with thy damp grey hairs at will,
For thou wert free from pain;
And if to an erring child like me
The gates of Heaven are unbolted and free,
Father!—we'll meet again.

The Fruit of the Spirit;

OR, THE CHRISTIAN GRACES.

CHAPTER VIII. 'FAITH, OR FIDELITY.

'OH, such the generous faith that grows
In woman's gentle breast;
'Tis like the star that stays and glows
Alone in night's dark vest;
That stays because each other ray
Has left the lonely shore,
And that the wanderer on his way
Then wants her light the more.'

Do you know, young maiden, that Fidelity hath the power to make thee grow old gracefully—to cause the silken curl, that now shades thy polished brow, to become even more lovely, when time has stolen its present charm and sprinkled it with his frost? What friend will regard the marks of decay on thy form when the heart that it enfolds has been true to its early promises; or who will deplore that the gay and buoyant tread has given place to slow and measured steps, if thy course has ever been that of faithfulness to life's higher duties? What though sorrow may be thy portion, and the world offer but few joys to thee! Know'st thou not that this Grace will inspire thee to 'hope on and hope ever,' trusting that the Lord hath still blessings in store for thee?

But why need I moralize any longer on the subject, when, as I cast my eyes to the window, I see such a practical illustration of it.

There she is—good old Anna Davis! faithful as ever to her calling. Why, verily, it seems to me that she is as necessary to the beauty, quietness, and order of yonder elegant domain, with its high pillars, arched windows, and verdant foliage, as the clinging Jasmine, that has twined so securely round the study window as to wholly exclude the scorching sun; or as that cool fountain that affords continual relief to the flowers, the weary bird, or restless bee. Indeed so long have I been familiar with her mild and active face, looking after the affairs of that wealthy house, with the vigilance of an interested owner, that were she removed, I should expect to see decay soon crumbling those walls, blight withering those magnificent trees, and tall rank grass choking the growth of the flowers.

1 Faith—fidelity in engagements, promises, and trusts.
MACKNIGHT.

But why is Anna so peculiarly active this morning? O, report says, the young Squire and his fair southern bride are soon to return home. Anna could not have stepped round more lightly at the bidding of her grandmother, whom she dearly loved, than she has to make every thing comfortable for the stranger about to be mistress of the Mansion. I wish she could be sensible of how much more she has accomplished this morning than merely cleansing and polishing, for those who will scarcely notice it. She has given me many a silent and gentle reproof for my selfishness; and when I have seen her duster wave from the window to remove every particle of dust, and her busy birch flirt over the path, not suffering even an apple-blossom to lie in the way of the young bride's satin slipper, I have been resolving in my mind to regard more the wishes and wants of those around me, and to think no employment slight or simple that can add to the happiness or comfort of those I love, regarding that addition to their enjoyment of life a sufficient reward. And this is true Fidelity—to act in secret, knowing that its manifestations in good prepared for others will be enjoyed, although the hand which prepared it may not be recognized or known. Such is God's fidelity. True to his great and abounding love, he gives us many blessings in secrecy, which we enjoy as unconsciously as we inhale the atmosphere, and as truly they are our life. Many a time as I have thought of this, I have recalled the poem on Water by our American Howitt, and almost involuntarily the words have dropped from my lips—

It loves to come at night,
To make you wonder in the morn
To see the earth so bright;
To find a youthful gloss is spread
On every shrub and tree,
And flowerets breathing on the air
Their odors pure and free.’

I have almost been incited, by beholding Anna, to tear myself from this bewitching morning air that now fans my brow as with a perfumed hand, as it is laden with the sweets of lilacs, sweet-briar, and fruit blossoms, from the Squire's garden, and throw aside my pen, and go in search of some employment that will be of more service to my friends. Yet I feel that I must tarry to give a little sketch of faithful old Anna, and it may be that thus I may do some good, felt by others though unseen by me. At least, it will serve to imprint more fully and clearly this morning's lesson on my mind.

Did Anna think, years ago, when the gentle lady, once the mistress in that dwelling, sought out her poor home and relieved her parents from almost beggary and won her from vicious society, —did she think when on her bended knee, she sought a blessing for her benefactor, and promised to devote her life to her service, that years of privation and care would be her consequent portion? She asked not of that. She was as one who had awaked from a wild and troubled dream, to behold the clear and pleasurable light of the morning sun, and, rejoicing in its beauty, arises with gratitude and cheerfulness to tread the accustomed daily round, though trials and perplexities await them at every step. She however did not begin her earthly journey alone. She sought a guide that was ever ready to whisper, Press on—fear not! And O, the dignity and beauty that her companionship with that guide has given her! Seek thou the same, young maiden, even in the pages of Holy Writ. It will ever guard thy heart from the tempter's art, and seal thy lips to the utterance of all that is not pure and holy. I know the reckless youth has checked the oath, and the gay maiden has ceased her idle and harmful chat, caused by the mild and heartfelt rebukes from lips imbued with the precepts of divine truth. Seek then the guide that Anna sought, and it will impart dignity to the humblest station in which you may be placed, by giving a consciousness of your spiritual relations. Would that many a faithless domestic, who looks well—not to the household under her charge, but to her own repose and ease, could have learned lessons from her, when she strove so untiringly to relieve her mistress of the thousand petty cares of her family; would they could have gained one impulse to overcome indifference and listlessness, and repay the many kindnesses which a benevolent spirit bestows on them, from witnessing that true hearted being parting with the love of her youth to follow and serve the gentle lady and share her adversity. She has proved her devotedness to the object of that love, for though he is now a silver-haired old man, surrounded by a dependent family, there is not a member of it but what blesses and loves the Mansion housekeeper, who has ever extended a helping hand to their necessities. I have often watched the old man as he has leaned his basket over the gate, while thoughtful Anna filled it with the ripest fruit for his invalid wife; and when the tear stole down his face, as he raised his hat to express his thanks, I have fancied that a reminiscence of early days stole over his mind. Some one has said it is difficult to look on the aged, furrowed, and wrinkled brow, and persuade ourselves that youth, beauty, and delicacy, were ever there. I fancy the old man thought it not so.

But I must to more distinct particulars in Anna's history as I have gathered them from the most aged in our village, conscious that faint and imperfect must be the best effort of my pen to sketch her portrait.

Anna was the only daughter of very poor and humble parents. Her father was one of that unfortunate class of men, who labor on from day to day with unremitting patience, yet are scarcely able, through lack of foresight or prudence, to furnish their families with the necessaries of life. His wife, with no prospect of rest or more prosperous days before her, toiled on her way, yet sad and slowly, as she bore the burden of regret and distrust. An accident that befell him while laboring in the neighboring woods and which was eventually the cause of his death, excited the commiseration of the widow Rochdale, of the Mansion, and his last days were made happy and comfortable by her benevolent efforts. His wife's long debility by the shock of his death, was brought to a crisis, and she survived her husband but a short time; and the young Anna, who had known all the sorrows and trials of poverty, was kindly taken into the widow's family, to serve as a little waiting-maid until she was of an age to choose the course most agreeable to herself.

Time flew over her pathway joyously, and her attachment towards her mistress and her two beautiful children daily increased, so that Anna had no desire to leave them for any other situation, however lucrative, save to become the wife of Richard Law, the young farmer who occasionally aided Mrs. Rochdale's gardener in his labors. An attachment had long existed between them which Mrs. Rochdale did not disapprove, and they were looking forward to brighter and more prosperous days for a union. The troublous times of the Revolution, which separated parent from child, brother from sister, and husband from wife, and lover from mistress, began to gather their terrors around them, and they determined to unite their destinies, come weal, come want, come woe.

Mrs. Rochdale's family was of the English aristocracy, and in her conscientious loyalty to the royal powers, she was led to favor some measures, and shield in her Mansion the persons of some bitter and zealous tories, which raised the ire of the patriots, so that it was thought expedient to remove her, and declare her property confiscated to the state. She had promised Anna a marriage portion, and the renting of a pleasant little cot on her estate, but with a sad look she told her, she now could only leave her with her blessing in the hands of her heavenly Father, while she herself would seek a home, among her distant relatives. Anna's heart was too full for speech, and she employed herself assiduously in preparing the few necessary articles for the journey almost without uttering a word. Her thoughts, however, were many and active; and Richard, as he leaned over the gate to meet her that evening, saw, when she approached him, though her eyes were sad and swollen with tears, that there was a glance of fixed and resolute determination, which he could not comprehend. Indeed, poor Anna required all her strength to explain to her lover satisfactorily the step that she was now about to take—to leave him and all her dear associations, and share her fortune with her mistress, through her uncertain and wearisome journey. She could not look on the fevered cheek, and into the sad eyes of that dear lady, who had shielded and protected her from the world's misery and sin, and feel it in her heart to suffer her to depart with her two helpless children, without her assistance; and as she revolved it in her mind she would not suffer a single plea of self to be put in the scale of judgment to overbalance her strict sense of gratitude and duty, she soon formed the determination to accompany her. This determination was received with no thankless spirit, for to none did the lady feel more real attachment, and to none would she more willingly resign the care of her darling children; yet she could not know the full extent of Anna's kindness, or her gentle spirit would not have suffered her to forego so many comforts that she might lighten the weariness of her patron's travels. Anna told her not of her grief at parting with Richard; neither did she show her the little treasure she had accumulated from her presents and those of her guests, to embellish the cottage at her marriage, and which she now carefully laid aside to procure daily comforts for the widow and her children; but she endeavored to cheer and console the unfortunate by wearing the smile of happiness and contentment.

Another trial awaited the lady when at her journey's end. All the relatives she had fondly hoped to greet, had fled to England, save two brothers who had enlisted in the army, and whom report said had been slain. The disappointment was too great for Mrs. Rochdale's worn spirits, and she sunk into a rapid decline. Anna procured an humble and quiet apartment for her, and there, among strangers, she toiled for her and her children. Mrs. Rochdale could not linger long in her feeble and nervous state, and she died like a christian, on her lowly bed, without a murmur, blessing Anna with her last breath, while she committed her children to her 'of special trust.'

It was some time ere Anna left the remains of her beloved mistress, and with the two orphans, who loved her with fondness almost amounting to that they had felt for their blessed mother, sought again the village that had been their happy home. The children wept audibly when they came to the village that had been the scene of all their young and innocent delights, and the first glance at their once beautiful domain told them the feet of the destroyers had been there, and crushed beneath their careless tread every shrub and flower they loved in childhood, and torn the green mantle from their loved mother's favorite seat, and disrobed the house of all its beauty, save its graceful architecture. The sensitive Ellen strained her eye to catch the least vestige of early remembrance, but George, the proud and stately little George, shut his eyes and turned away his head, declaring the sight was too unholy to look upon.

Anna endured as severe a trial as the children. She watched earnestly for the cot that was to have been hers, and found it was inhabited; and she was not long in discovering that its occupants were Richard Law and his family. Sad indeed to Anna was the discovery that her long cherished hope of having him to share her trials and joys, and assist her in performing her duty to the orphans, was destroyed. But Richard, in the simplicity of his heart, never dreamed that Anna would return, and wishing for some companion, now that she was gone, chose her most intimate friend for his wife; and he never, through all his intercourse afterward with Anna, found cause to imagine he had given her pain.

After several years, during which Anna devoted her time and strength to the children, by a fortunate series of events, the property was again recovered, and the children were restored to the Mansion. Under the guidance of an honest and faithful guardian, the estate returned in a degree to its former beauty and elegance; and for awhile the young owners and their faithful Anna basked in the sunshine of prosperity. But the gentle and affectionate Ellen, ever of a delicate and feeble constitution, drooped and died. Anna had cherished and watched over her as a fair and beautiful young flower, and she laid her to her rest with almost a parent's grief. George—restless, sad, and eager to see the world—left his home for a foreign tour, leaving Anna with a worthy guardian to transact the affairs of his house. After several years he returned with a lovely and delicate bride. She was beautiful to look upon, and all the villagers blessed the sweet lady when she moved among them. George lived but to love and cherish her, and he besought Anna to leave no means untried to render her happy.

Anna's watchful eye soon saw that disease was lurking in her lady's system, and she strove assiduously to prevent consumption from adding her, to its victims. She often won her from books which were too often of a fictitious and exciting character, creating a morbid sensibility; and by her tales of poverty abroad, would influence her to enjoy the benefits of air and exercise while seeking the abodes of sorrow. She would seek the sunniest nooks, and the coolest shades, and brightest streams, to woo her mistress abroad; and to procure the flowers that bloomed around her maiden home, she would use the greatest efforts, and plant them beneath the sick one's window, and gather the fairest for her room. If the morning was too damp, she would watch her with the eagerness of a mother, and the thicker shoes and shawl were always ready for her. If at eve she had wandered late, she never failed to meet the messenger sent with a covering to protect her from the falling dew and chill air. But all Anna's efforts were unavailing, for soon after the birth of her first child, a beautiful boy, she died, leaving a devoted husband to mourn her loss.

The beautiful and quiet home had lost its attractions to George, and his weary heart could not look upon the scenes which his lovely wife had once converted into a fairy land, and he besought Anna to watch over his boy while he should become a wanderer again. He could not rest away long, however, and he returned after two years to press the living portrait of his beloved Julia to his heart. Four years he survived to train and enjoy his darling son, and then he died, leaving him to the charge of Anna, with instructions for his future education.

The youth loved her with the deepest affection, and she watched over him with the same care and solicitude she had bestowed on his parent, at the same time continued the improvement of the farm through an industrious and skillful family. His education was strictly attended to, and he grew up well fitted for the profession he had chosen. He too has now travelled, and far in the south has formed a beautiful connection with a grand-daughter of one of those uncles that were slain in battle, and whom accident—no, it must be Providence—discovered to him, and he has won her to become the bride of his fair northern home. Anna anticipates joy and peace for them, and almost forgets the many trials and reverses she has passed through.

Hark! the carriage is rumbling through the long row of pines, and I must retire from my window, lest my anxious gaze to witness old Anna assist the young bride up the walk, may be deemed too impertinent; yet I must catch one glance of that aged servant, as she takes the arm of the young bride, never dreaming that she herself can need support.

There, my curtain is down, and trusting, dear reader, that you will not deem me intrusive, I will task your patience a little longer to read a passage I extract from a volume now lying on my table, and against which passage I find Anna's name written—it is Sharon Turner's tribute to 'old maids';—'The single state is no diminution of the beauties and the utilities of the female character; on the contrary, our present life would lose many of the comforts, and much, likewise, of what is absolutely essential to the well being of every part of society, and even of the private home, without the unmarried female. To how many a father—a brother, and not less, a sister, is she both a necessity and a blessing! How many orphans have to look up with gratitude to her care and kindness! How many nephews and nieces owe their young felicities and improvements to her! Were every woman married, the parental home would often in declining life be a solitary abode, when affectionate attentions are most precious, and but from such a source, not attainable. It is the single class of women which supplies most of our teachers and governesses; and from the lower ranks,¹ nearly all the domestic assistants of our households come. What vast changes, not promotive of the general happiness, would ensue in every station of life, if every female married as soon as she was fully grown! Certainly human life would in that case have a different aspect, and must be regulated on a new principle, and would lead to consequences which cannot now be calculated. The single woman is therefore as important an element of social and private happiness as the married one. The utilities of each are different, but both are necessary; and it is vulgar nonsense, unworthy of manly reason, and discreditable to every just feeling, for any one to depreciate the unmarried condition.' There—Anna! thou art defended!

'Concord River.'

O GENTLE river of my childhood's home!
Thy very name breathes holy peace and love;
Thy silvery current sweetly steals along,
Reflecting beauty from the skies above.

Mirrored within thy bosom's tranquil depths,
Heaven's own celestial blue in beauty lies;
And white clouds, spirits from the realms of rest,
And sunset's gleam, and evening's starry eyes,—

All smile approving on thy peaceful course,
So mild, so gentle in its onward flow,
Disturbed by no concealed, contending force,
A type of all that's meek, and pure, and true.

O couldst thou tell of all thy depths have seen,
How rich the tale to me thou wouldst reveal!
Has the light bark upon thy waters been
Of him, the white man drove with fire and steel?

Perchance in other days thy waves have danced
To the light music of his dashing oar;
It may be, that the murderous knife has glanced,
And the wild war-whoop rung along thy shore.

But scenes like these were all too dark for thee,
Thy waters would have curdled to their source;
Thy crystal mirror ne'er has blushed to see
The red man's blood, or heard his war-cry hoarse.

Thy fringe of trees, with their dark waving spires,
Has sheltered many a dusky Indian group;
Perhaps stood sentry round their council fires,
And heard the old man's words—the wild war-whoop.

Say, has the brave young warrior sought these groves,
To meet his dark-eyed maid at trysting hour,
To charm her listening ear with words of love,
Or guide her light canoe along your shore?

Aye, here he wooed and won his dusky bride;
Here, 'neath this aged pine's still deep'ning shade,
Meek forest flower, and brave old chieftain's pride,
And the 'Great Spirit' heard the vows they made.

These arches, too, have echoed with the twang
Of the young hunter's never-failing bow,
As from beneath their shade the wild deer sprang,
Then sunk, a victim to his skillful foe.

O'er scenes like these time's misty veil is drawn,
For long, dim years since then have intervened;
And Indian maid, and dusky chief, have gone
To the green hunting grounds, of which they dreamed.

Perchance their bones lie white thy waves below,
Or else, perhaps, beneath this mossy mound,
Where first the Indian lovers breathed their vow,
They sought their rest,—'tis consecrated ground.

Spare, woodman, spare these moss-grown forest trees,
Let no rude axe disturb the peace profound,
Or ruthless spade invade the quiet rest,
Of those who sleep beneath this fragrant mound.

Far other scenes have met thy gaze since then
When first our sires resisted Britain's power—
Along thy banks were marshalled valiant men,
O, what a thrilling int'rest had that hour!

How fearlessly they fought, these banks can tell,
For the bright heritage we now enjoy;
Ye marked the spot where gallant Davis fell,
A martyr in the cause of liberty.

Bear down the tale to ages yet unborn,
Of all that glorious day prefaced for us;
And here may grateful children often come,
And vow anew, to guard the sacred trust.

VICIOUS ACTS—WHY FORBIDDEN.

'Vicious actions,' says Franklin, 'are not hurtful because they are forbidden, but forbidden because they are hurtful.' How long will it be before the world, aye, even the christian world will acknowledge this truth! It is a truth which proves that piety has its foundations in our nature—our constitution, and that God's commandments are manifestations of his love for man and interest in his well being! Too many regard fidelity to duty as a restraint which lessens the enjoyment of life, rather than as the guardian angel of the good and pleasant. They fear hell more than they love heaven. They seem to think that there is some real good to be enjoyed from the forbidden actions, and while a fearful prospect in eternity keeps them from the overt deed, they desire in their heart to do it. A great change would come over their feelings, did they but realize the solemn truth that actions forbidden are forbidden, not from any arbitrary purpose, but because they are hurtful to the creature;—for instance, it is wrong to steal, not because there is a commandment against stealing, but because theft violates all the sanctities which preserve the order of social life.

A GLORIOUS DREAM.

THE reformed inebriate of Baltimore—Hawkins, who has done a mighty and heart cheering work in our city, made this remark in one of his addresses;—'I do feel for the drunkard. My heart yearns over him. I fell asleep to-day, just after dinner, and woke up crying. I could not help it, for I dreamed of all drunkards being reformed.' Was'nt that a glorious dream! Could it be made a reality, what an advance would be given to every work of righteousness and love in our land! How much of crime—of shameful ignorance—of impoverishing sloth, would be done away! And shall not this animate us to do what we can to make the dream a reality—to raise up the poor and betrayed inebriate, that he may be clothed in pure garments, and in his right mind sit at the feet of Jesus? The age demands of us effort—heartfelt, energetic, and persevering effort. By the desolation of thousands of homes—by the exposure of millions of children to a life of wrong—by the need of a well disciplined generation to meet the wants of the country we are invoked to be up and doing.

A GOOD MOTTO.

A MONTH or two since, in observing the passing of a great procession, my attention was very forcibly attracted to an array of some thousands of Catholic Irishmen, each having a medal suspended from his neck by a green ribbon. I soon discovered them to be members of the Catholic Temperance Societies, and I could not but ask myself—how differently will the order and quiet of the city be affected now than formerly by these strong limbed and hardy sons of Erin! A noble reform indeed, for I have always found a temperate Irishman to be worthy of the respect of all who admire faithfulness and true integrity.—As these thoughts passed through my mind, I glanced at a banner borne by one, and held broad and open by two others. It was a pictorial representation of Jesus sitting on the wall of Jacob's well, conversing with the woman of Samaria, over which was this motto—'Give me this water, that I thirst not.' Give me to enjoy all healthy excitements, that I may not thirst for those that in the end bring heaviness and pain.

CONVERSATION AND READING.

THE communing with another mind, either by conversation or reading, may be always profitable, if we are on our guard as to what impressions we shall receive. We should keep our Reason calm, that it may dictate and direct the writing on the soul's tablets, as the schoolmaster watchfully overlooks his pupils as they write.

THE VOICE OF SOLITUDE HEARD IN SOCIETY.

EMERSON—R. W.—says and truly,—‘It is easy in the world to live after the world's opinion; it is easy in solitude to live after our own; but the great man is he who in the midst of the crowd keeps with perfect sweetness the independence of solitude.’ Greatness is the effect of resolutely carrying out in society the calm and solemn counsels of meditative and devotional hours.

PRAYER.

‘PRAYER,’ says the same essayist, ‘is the contemplation of life from the highest point of view.’ And true it is, that prayer—fervent and loving—gives us an elevation of spirit, by which we are able to take juster views of life and feel that ‘God has a great world to care for—of which we are but a small—an infinitesimal—part, yet of value and cared for.’

A FINE SIMILE.

‘As the Sandwich Islander believes that the strength and valor of the enemy he kills, passes into himself, so we gain the strength of the temptation we resist.’

R. W. E.

MAN OF SENSE.

FRANKLIN, in his life, speaking of some papers he had published, mentions one which was ‘a Socratic dialogue, tending to prove that, whatever might be his parts or abilities, a vicious man could not properly be called a man of sense.’ What his course of reasoning was, I know not, but his idea is a good one; for the most important of all senses is the sense of virtue—the perception of that which is right, just and good. It is this that makes all the others rightly useful; for no one can rightly use the common senses without perceiving that to be vicious is an unequivocal manifestation of foolishness.

TO A STRANGER.

Tottering beneath the weight of years,
Thy step is faint and slow!
And as I gaze, a spirit bids
My better feelings flow,—

Vol. X.

And kind affections there awake,
Like living things in yonder lake.

While glancing on that lake, the eye
Sees naught but tranquil rest,
Yet currents course and beings swim—
A world beneath the breast!
So calm I seem, while feelings flow,
And living thoughts breathe strong below.

As in the lake though all unseen,
The finny tribe exist,
True to their part in God's great plan,
Lest rise the noxious mist
From off the lake's dark sluggish depth,
Sending abroad disease and death!

So in thy heart, and in my own,
These kind affections live,
Keeping the moral waters pure,
While there they motion give;
And happy in themselves, they bless,
Though none their presence may confess.

DASHING.

SOME poet has said of a character, that he had ‘A dash of purity and brightness,

Which speaks the man of taste and of politeness.’

I wish this was the only kind of dashing among those who are styled men ‘of taste and of politeness.’

BIRTH DAY.

JUNE, the 12th day! Yes, it is here, and it is true that eight and twenty years have bestowed on me their good and evil. Let me veil my face that I am no wiser or better, and let me think, feel and act more justly. ‘What is our life?’ A vapor! only in the brevity of animal being; not as it relates to the soul. What is our life? to eat and drink—see pleasant sights, and hear glad sounds? Let it not be so. Let it be to live near God and heaven. ‘Fear the Lord and serve him in truth with all your heart; for consider how great things he hath done for you.’ Hear it, my soul, and be wise.

CLIPPING.

It was a custom among the Greeks to cut off their hair as a mark of grief when a friend died, and we are told of one lady who on repairing to the tomb of her sister, merely clipped the ends of her hair so as to quiet her conscience in reference to the custom and the dead, very much as some merely clip off a little of the growth of a habit, when the solemn voice, which they cannot hush, commands them to divest themselves of it. It is mockery of virtue to content oneself with merely clipping vice. Let the whole be thrown off on the grave of the Past.

Books.

GENTLE reader, do not overlook this article, however unpromising may be its title, for it may contain something worthy of your notice. It is the policy of some writers to attract attention to their cogitations by prefixing thereto some showy or novel caption. But I have found,—and so have you,—that these magnificent titles, whether affixed to men, or literary effusions, are not always indicative of real merit. As a glaring gold-leaf sign is no test of the value and quality of a trader's merchandize, so are these dressy titles no test of the worth of the thing—they are intended to set off,—as the phrase is. I do not mean to say that these do not often succeed, for, alas! they succeed but too well. Humbug is surely the ascendant genius of the times. Frogs, since the days of the Fabulist, have made vast improvement in the art of swelling,—or something tantamount to it. Once was the time, when, if they attempted to inflate themselves to the size of the ox, it was at an imminent risk of bursting. But now—a-days, frogs, in apparent dimensions, far transcend the ox. I say, apparent, for 'tis not that they really distend themselves to the bigness of the ox, but that through some optical illusion, caused by the magic of humbuggery, they are magnified even to the stature of elephants!

Byron sang of 'the age bronze;' and still the theme, if improved, would be abundantly fruitful—but perhaps not profitable. It is not well to be always censorious, though there be enough of wrong in the world that richly deserves the lash of the censor. We cannot but regret, however, that so many inflated frogs infest the high-ways of literature, and that their monotonous croaking is mistaken, by the indiscriminate reading multitude, for that 'concord of sweet' periods which can flow only from judicious, thoughtful, and well-disciplined minds.

'Man,' says a shrewd author, 'is a duperable animal. Quacks in medicine, quacks in religion, quacks in politics,' and—I would add—quacks in literature. 'Know this, and act upon the knowledge. There is scarcely any one who may not, like a trout, be taken by tickling.' There is a formidable host of literary ticklers; and, what is more, they tickle unwary trouts with artificial rather than natural flies. But to drop the metaphor, it cannot be denied that our popular literature is more artificial than natural—that straining and affectation are its besetting sins. Many writers would seem in print, what, in reality, they are not:—and hence, for the sublime, we have—the ridiculous—swelling and pompous crudities;—for the sentimental, childish drivelling, and for originality, we are presented with old stale thoughts tricked out in a redundant dress of showy words.

The true and the beautiful, seldom wear an imposing aspect. Simplicity is their chief characteristic. I wish writers could understand this. But then, for simplicity,—if it were the fashion to be simple,—we should be deluged with silliness; for as there is but one step from the sublime to the ridiculous, so the isthmus that divides the simple from the silly, is very narrow. To nicely discriminate between them, a writer needs to possess a severe taste. It has become quite fashionable with writers to be seraphic, both in prose and verse. One would think, in perusing their rhapsodies, that the grossness of their humanity was completely expurgated, and that they hardly indulged a thought of this homely earth. I do not mean to identify these 'rapt seraphs that adore and burn' with the transcendentalists. There is this difference between the two specimens of refined humanity. While the former soar upward on the wings of holy and spontaneous rapture, the latter ascend, step by step, on the ladder of their Utopian philosophy. If these and the realists were really what their writings would indicate, they would be very proper persons,—no fault could be found with them. I fully agree with the poet, that—

'Unless
He can above himself erect himself,
How poor a thing is man!'

But then, he must do this in all sincerity and lowliness of heart. 'To erect himself above himself,'—that is, to build his manhood on his moral and mental nature, instead of his animal,—a man must, as a necessary preparation, utterly eschew affectation and hypocrisy. He must first have a sense of his baseness in order to realize the need of becoming nobler and better. He must not assume a character, which through patient and prayerful self-discipline, he has yet to attain. Our aforesaid rhapsodists and transcendentalists are guilty of this assumption. They, in aiming at perfection, overshoot the mark, and affect to have found something which is unattainable to human nature, while in its mortal stage. However sublimated we may become, still there will be a dash or two of earth about us.

If, however, we can develope 'the divinity that is within us,'—as we undoubtedly can,—and occasionally experience that 'joy unspeakable' which is the blest result of bright moral attainment, we shall do what is manifestly our duty, and what will constitute our chief happiness here below. But this is a calm and solemn work, and cannot be carried forward without humility and in deep earnestness. Let us not affect to be farther advanced than we really are,—especially in print. Let not the receptacles of literature be encumbered with our empty pretensions. Let our thoughts be genuine, if we are to present to the public, even though they are somewhat earthy in their nature. Let them, too, be expressed in plain, simple, and hearty English. Let us not try to be poetic and seraphic when we really feel stupid, and, like Falstaff, not much better than one of the wicked. It is sheer folly to mount on stilts when we can walk much easier and faster on our feet.

It was my design to introduce to the readers of the Repository a book of the right stamp. Good books are very scarce, in comparison to bad ones. Good books, like good men, are sometimes passed by unnoticed,—or are appreciated only by the few; while a really poor book, by dint of puffs and brazen impudence, works its way to general notice and applause. Books are true representatives of their authors minds. A bad man cannot write a good book; neither can a man of vulgar mind write a refined and modest book. It was my design, I repeat, to introduce, in this article, to the readers of the Repository a book of rare and various excellence; but as this article is about long enough, I shall defer the introduction to some future occasion. Meanwhile, I would just say that I have often thought that contributors to periodicals might do more for their interest and worth by their making choice selections from good books that are not generally read, than by writing for their columns what is called 'original' matter. Ripened fruit is wholesomer than that which is green. A periodical is more acceptable to judicious readers, if its matter be manly, sensible, and hearty. There are many good, and even sparkling books, not generally read, a portion of whose contents would impart great interest and richness to the pages of any periodical. It does not comport with wisdom to toil and sweat in cultivating barren ground for half-grown and stunted crops, when the desired commodity can be had, in rich abundance, ready grown and harvested. Besides much of the reading matter which is published as original, is no more nor less than the essence of others thoughts dilated down to insipidity. Even if this were not the case, I can see no peculiar merit in being simply original. If a writer has an inventive mind; if he can glean lessons of truth and wisdom from objects which, to less gifted men, would be devoid of meaning, then he would indeed be original in the pure sense of the term. But if a writer exhibit nothing new either in his manner or matter, I can see no propriety in calling his productions 'original.'

Napoleon at St. Helena.

THERE stands a rock, whose base the surging sea
Has chafed for ages with its rolling waves;
Around its blackened sides the storms play free,
And wild birds nestle in its dripping caves.

Upon its summit not a green twig grows;
No grass bathes nightly in the falling dew;
No leaf sighs there—no mild wind ever blows,—
And music! that lone spot, it never knew.

But one incessant, wild, tumultuous roar,
Comes up from where the waters swell and break;
As wave on wave comes rushing to the shore,
The crags and caves with rumbling thunder shake.

To this lone spot on St. Helena's isle,
Old Europe's conqueror oft at midnight came;
And there, alone, would tedious hours beguile,
By calling out the stars of heaven by name.

Along the sky, as on a battle plain,
He fancied they would march and wheel and meet;
Then charge and fight, retreat and charge again;
Then laughed the soldier at his wild conceit.

'Tis thus the passions of the human soul,
Will make the outward, feed an inward fire;—
E'en make the stars that in their courses roll,
A marshalled host, or seraph singing choir. D. B. H.

MORNING.

It is morning—morning in my quiet apartment.
I will throw open the shutter, and let in the glad light of day. Soft showers are refreshing the thirsty earth. How brightly beneath my window the rank peonies hold up their green heads, just ready to burst forth into a deep, royal crimson. The daffodils, too, shoot up their green spikes to meet the falling rain, the columbine spreads forth its delicate leaves to the breeze, and the bright lances of the garden lily shiver like tourney-spears in the fight. What a rich perfume is scattered abroad from the sweet-briar, clambering above the very top of its tall white frame, and clasping the boughs of the flowering cherry-tree!

Near the centre of the yard are the dahliamounds, with their bulbs buried sixteen inches in the earth, waiting for the long warm summer days to call them up to the light. The air is full of the fragrance of lilacs, just bursting their round buds to the sunbeams which have followed the showers. The clematis and the grape vine too, are putting out their leaves along the lattice work of the arbor; and the woodbines, brought so carefully from the shores of the Niagara, have survived the winter, and are giving promise of a long and profitable life. Do they perceive any change from their shale beds in Canada, to the rich loam of mid-New-England? After a long listening to the restless thunder of Niagara, is there not something sweet and soothing in the low music of Bow-Brook?

This is a part of the outward life around me—within, is the more glorious life of the mind—mind that has a time-eternity—mind that is in books. Here Shakspeare holds up his splendid mirror of the world, and shows us men and women in every-day life; in stormy excitement; in delirious passion; in dreamy love. Here Milton exhibits his gorgeous pageantries of angels and of demons; or gives us the sweeter pictures of his imagination in the beautiful masque of Comus. Scott, too, with his Border Songs and Tales of chivalry, fills the quiet room with the wildest of martial melodies. And Byron with his glorious scene-painting has made my little study one vast panorama of the olden world with all its sublime features of mountain, and lake, and river; of seas that are eternal, and of empires that are in desolation. And who is this that has peopled the solitude with blue-eyed cottage-girls, ringing their clear voices among the glades and by the springs? Who is this that has gently led around me, the gray-haired hermit, the simple herdsman, the men and women of humble English life? His pictures are all rural, his shading soft and delicate, his colors of the bright Venetian school. You have heard me speak of him often.—It is the gentle Wordsworth—the poet of Rydal Mount.

Ah! it is a bright world, though a small one, this humble apartment of mine; yes bright, for the glorious countenances of the sainted dead beam on me from the lettered pages where their souls are registered. The passionate music of a heart whose throbbings were stilled upon the shores of Africa, and the rich, deep, solemn lays of England's sweetest minstrel mingle together in the silence like the soft, invisible strains heard by the shipwrecked mariners on the isle of Prospero.

EVENING.

The shutters of my windows are closed, and nothing but the soft light of a solitary lamp is thrown upon the walls of my apartment. A beautiful shadow from the tasselled willows and budded evergreens of the vases, falls along the casement of the window, and presents an appearance not unlike the gorgeous sculpture of feudal days. My own shadow, magnified by my proximity to the light, streams across the carpet, and without the least apparent curve or inflexion, runs up to the centre of the ceiling, as though it were all one smooth and level surface. There is a soft lustre glimmering upon the face of the library, where the gilded titles stand forth in bright relief against the dark background of the volumes calling up a remembrance of those mystic signs which were emblazoned upon the walls of the palace of Belshazzar.

A faint, delicious odor is exhaled from the delicate musk-vine, and rich scarlet geraniums with which our little mantle-glass is daily supplied by a generous, flower-loving neighbor. The blossoms of the willow, too, have a lapsing sweetness as pure as it is rich, which makes one dream and feel more of Heaven than any sight or sound in the universe. And is it not a little Paradise, this home-room with its books and flowers, and its sweet, holy solitude? It has its music, too. Listen;—there is the fresh breathing of the wind through the tall elms that have shaken down their blossoms over all the grassy yard; and fainter and more indistinct is heard the low murmur of the brook that dances gaily along at the foot of the hill, now sparkling to the moonbeams, in the joy of a happy hour, and now veiling its too beautiful smiles beneath the shrub willows and black alders that are fed upon its waters. The ceaseless piping of the frogs, too, and the mournful trill of the tree-toad, make not an unpleasing accompaniment to Nature's less vocal music.

All these things have their rich ministries to the senses; but do they appeal less earnestly to the soul? Whence comes this calm tranquillity of the spirit, this bright-eyed hope of the future, this smiling memory of the past, but from the religious influences of beautiful perceptions? Whence comes this irrepressible impulse of the heart to gush forth in fervent melody, unless it be from sympathies which have been excited in it by the voices of the little brook-minstrels, singing so patiently all the long, lonely night? S. C. E.

The Mother and Mysteries.

A LITTLE child had lain for days on the couch of languishing—his delicate frame quivering with intense agony, ever and anon twining his slender fingers amid his damp, golden locks, and trying to hold himself still. The sight was melancholy to behold. As friend after friend came in, he would lift up his languid eyelids and gaze one moment and then close them again. But O the melting tenderness of that momentary glance! so full of patient suffering, so loving, and suffused with the tears he could not hide. None could meet that look and not be subdued to weeping; if any could, I envy not their sensibilities. But there was one who more than all else had sympathy for the child—his mother. With the truest maternal tenderness she had watched by his side day and night, and ministered as her own love and wise medical skill dictated. Yet he had grown more and more sick. His little frame—wasted and thin, was now racked with pain, and as oft as she told the visitor how good a child he had ever been and how patient he was then, it seemed as if her very heart would burst with grief as she saw his misery. And then too, when he spake of his grief, it was overwhelming to hear his language, so expressive was it of the truest resignation, as though good angels were whispering to him what to utter. Many hearts bowed as to a wise teacher and kept his golden words as precious. Prayers, tears, and groans, could not remove the racking pains, nor avert the work of death in that beautiful frame. He died. His mother turned from the holily beautiful face of the dead, and said—'I'll no longer believe in an eternal hell.'

'Strange words!' you will say, reader. 'Was she mad?' will, perhaps, be your next inquiry. Her words would not seem strange had you read the thoughts—the agonizing thoughts, that burned within, that coursed their way beneath the calm aspect she wore, like the strong and boiling currents beneath the quiet face of the stream. Neither would you deem her mad, had you known her feelings; for while she had been standing by her sick and dying son—so good, so gentle, and so patient—she had known 'the stern agony of thought.' She had been thinking of God and his Providence, while her eye rested on the manifestations of the intense suffering her child was enduring; and her soul quailed before the presence of the awful ideas that arose in the assembly and conference of Thought. Her spirit wrestled with angel strength against the power of the dark forms that would deny perfect love to the Deity, and Providence was still to her a truth and a happy truth. She felt that moral good was done by the sufferings of the child—but yet it was a mystery why he, the gentlest of all lambs, should suffer so much and so intensely. Here was mystery almost too great for the mother's heart. She wrestled with it and at last submitted.

A voice struck upon her ear. It was from one who could not be moved to sensibility even by such a scene as was there enacted. He spoke of God's judgments—how when we made idols of our darlings by loving them 'too well,' he took them away, that we might have our affections drawn towards heaven and escape the doom of eternal woe. The mother's frame shook with the power of her emotions. A new struggle came on, like the return of the convulsive spasms to the feverish. Her child died ere she conquered. She kissed his beautiful lips which were wreathed with a smile, as though the radiance of his last and happy thought had lingered there, hiding the shadow left by death. 'I'll no longer believe in an eternal hell!' was the utterance of the victor mind. The mysteries of this world are great enough to reconcile with the idea—the adorable idea of a perfect God, without bringing in such as attend the thought of eternal misery. If the spirit, nerved by devotion and strengthened by prayer, quails sometimes before the one, how can it live in the presence of the other? There are no feelings in humanity that can in the least aid in the interpretation of the latter mysteries, and if we are reconciled to them—submitting, unquestioning, in our ignorance, it is at the expense of every tender feeling and kind affection. Let the 'stern agony' of calm, deliberate thought be endured, and the throbbing pulse of the fevered soul will never be stilled, till that mother's decision shall be acquiesced in. Many a brain has been maddened ere the wrestling was completed; and the poor maniac weeps out a life of suffering, because her creed proved too stern for her sensibilities.

The Passion for Wealth.

THE idea of property is innate in the human constitution. The desire of possession is implanted in human nature by the Creator; and therefore to say that this desire is not to be gratified would be an impeachment of the wisdom of him who made us. I would not therefore underrate the value of the conveniences and elegancies of civilized life: their benefits to society are great; and when obtained honestly, regarded with proper feelings and used to promote useful and benevolent objects, are not inconsistent with christianity or morality.

But the inordinate—the unhallowed propensity for gain which obtains in civilized life, is a great immorality;—one, against which, the pulpit and the press should more frequently speak—not in whispers, but in tones of earnestness and severity. The pursuit of wealth has become the distinguishing feature in modern civilization. In our own country, especially, it stands out in our history in bold relief. This is owing, doubtless, to the non-existence of a titled and hereditary nobility. Money purchases here that which birth inherits in Europe—influence and power. In the old world men are born to office and station; here they must obtain them. This accounts for our being as a nation, pre-eminently, money makers. We love money—that root of innumerable evils, so well, that it has become one, if not the main object of existence. This is somewhat strange when we take into view the facts that we are christians. The principles of the gospel we adopt—its doctrines we espouse. This nation is professedly a christian nation. It would have the civilized world so understand it. Nationally, as well as individually, we claim Jesus of Nazareth for our master, and his teachings we consider our guide. Our land is, emphatically, a land of bibles—sabbaths, churches, and christian associations. Such are our professions, such is our boast.

But alas! how inconsistent with our professions are our practices! In our efforts to become rich, we are not governed by high, moral motives, such as should influence christians, in the present state of the world, in their labors for the conveniences and elegancies of civilized life. Wealth ought to be looked upon, and desired and labored for, as a means subordinate to some other and higher objects, and not as a pursuit to be cared for and watched over as an ultimate good. Neither should it be regarded as a means for gratifying appetite, sustaining ostentation, or ministering to the vanities of dress, fashion and equipage. All these should be below the consideration of those who profess to follow Him who had not where to lay his head. But with us, money is regarded as an ultimate good, or as the means of gratifying the selfish feelings by elevating its possessor into what is called the higher circles of life—to the places of influence, power, and respect. Yes, dollars and cents stand higher in the estimation of our people than literature or science, intelligence or virtue. Money—property is regarded as the principal thing. The others are considered subordinate.

The passion for gain—I mean the passion for riches, pervades all classes of society. No age is free from its corrupting influence. Our youth are educated not to become men, in the highest sense of this term—as the highest excellence to which human beings can attain—but to become sharp men of business—not merely capable of getting a comfortable living, but of becoming rich. This sentiment, inculcated in youth, grows with our growth, and strengthens with our strength; and in after years its deplorable results are manifested in servile cringing to wealth; hypocrisy and selfishness in bargaining, and overreaching in trade. It has developed and cultivated the faculty of acquisitiveness, as phrenologists call it, till avarice has become the ruling passion—the vast root from which has sprung up a spreading and poisonous tree, laden with bitter and deadly fruit. How unlike that tree whose very leaves are for the healing of the nations!

There is no passion in the human heart, so deceitful as avarice, few so strong and active, none which clings to us with such increasing tenacity. Life, health, friends,—moral independence,—the tenderest affections—our highest spiritual interests, we will not scruple to sacrifice on the altar of mammon.

In public addresses and public journals—and in many popular books, the names of wealthy men are frequently praised and their characters recommended to young business men for imitation.

In every day language—the phrase ‘he is doing well,’ means, he is making money—he is getting rich; and a man’s friends congratulate each other and him upon such joyous intelligence. The great error of the community—and that which perpetuates avarice and its concomitant evils—is the regarding success in business pursuits, or in other words, the accumulation of wealth, as the true standard of worth: as if the possession of thousands or millions of property was conclusive evidence of superiority and true greatness. It is not so. True greatness is in the soul. It consists in high, expanded, noble thoughts, generous deeds, lofty and holy aspirations: in the manly struggle against wrong—the bold defence of right—the sacrifice of every object and pursuit inconsistent with justice and truth. Greatness does not consist in the ownership of houses, lands, stocks and merchandize. These may be owned, and frequently are, by the meanest spirits, the narrowest minds—the most contracted hearts. Let not the glitter and the pomp of wealth deceive those who would rise to true greatness. Judge not of men by the trappings and gewgaws which they wear, but by the attainments of their intellects, the feelings of their hearts, the character of their actions. By this criterion, and by this alone, should men be censured or commended, disregarded or honored. But so long as the erroneous sentiment prevails that men are to be measured by the length of their purses, so long will the struggle and strife for property continue, so long will the civilized world be filled with overreaching in trade, dishonesty, fraud and corruption; so long will riches be made the main object of human pursuit, and the true end of our earthly existence be forgotten or disregarded. Let the standard then by which we form our opinions of men—the standard of excellence to which we should aim, be that which the gospel sets up—namely moral, spiritual attainments.

It is somewhat problematical, I think, whether a person can be a genuine christian and at the same time a rich man. To say nothing of the manner by which he may have accumulated his property, there is something in the possession of great wealth which necessarily unfits a man's heart to imbibe the meekness, humility, and purity of christianity.

Hence, the terrible denunciations in the scriptures against him. A man cannot be rich unless he serve mammon; and if he serve mammon, he cannot at the same time serve God. He cannot enter the kingdom of Heaven till he has given his riches to the poor. Riches, not poverty, are the obstacles to christian attainments.

With the wealthy people of his age and country the Savior had little sympathy. He associated with the common—the poor people. From these, he selected his confidential friends, his bosom companions; and from this class of the community he received a cordial welcome. Ah! who would give him such a welcome now were he to revisit the earth as he came eighteen hundred years ago—houseless—friendless—clad in coarse raiment—soiled and covered with dust,—faint and weary with travel—lecturing to the rabble in the streets—declaiming against the vices of the great, and selecting a few poor and ignorant fishermen as his co-workers;—who, I say, would be the first to extend to this son of a carpenter the rights of hospitality—the dues of common courtesy. Would the rich invite him to their splendid and costly mansions? Would the learned clergy welcome him to their desks? I greatly mistake the character of the age if he would not be seized, and sent as a vagrant to the house of correction.

Let professed christians beware how they accumulate riches. Poverty is safer, aye better, much better, for the growth of the immortal spirit.

Our Monthly Talk.

WE had made a record of the thoughts we wished to convey this month to our readers, but the record, with a numerous collection of notices, has been mislaid, or lost, since the 'copy' came to Boston. We now write in great haste, and cannot recollect what we had written. Notices which are due, may be thus passed by. One thing, however, we distinctly remember, and that is, that we made an earnest appeal to our delinquent subscribers and to our Agents. We anxiously desire that those of our subscribers who have not as yet paid, will deliberate with themselves upon the propriety of making immediate payment. We need the effects of such a measure, and hope that our friends will not disappoint our expectations, for though a small matter to each delinquent, it is to us very important, for hundreds, nay, thousands of dollars are involved in it.

From a variety of causes, we have had to part with a large number of our former patrons—all of them, where any expression of feeling has been made, have acknowledged their good opinion of the work—its general interest, christian spirit, and literary excellence. We do not despair of having their places made good, trusting as we do to the friendly Agents we have, and the interest taken in the support of the work by our sisters in the faith herein advocated, illustrated, and enforced. We wait in hope.

THIS NUMBER. 'Rose of Sharon.' It will be seen by our readers that our sister editor has not furnished for this No. as much matter as she has usually done, but a sufficient reason can be given—the great and careful labor required to prepare for the press the 'Rose of Sharon' for 1842. It is now passing through the press. We have had the opportunity to read some of the articles, and look over others, and risk nothing in assuring our friends that the next 'Rose' will be superior in literary excellence to the preceding volumes, while it will excel its predecessors in the beauty of its embellishments. We hope that an earnest and continued effort will be made by those interested in the success of this Annual to obtain subscribers soon as the Prospectus is issued, and there are peculiar reasons why we should be more than ever active in this business. We have every reason to believe that great, if not systematized influence, will be exerted to prevent the circulation of the 'Rose,' simply because of the source of its origin—among Universalists. Some have been wont to regard Universalists as an ignorant, unrefined, and unintellectual class, and they will do all that sectarian prejudice can do to prevent this opinion from being changed. One individual who has gone out from our ministry and order, has seen fit to denounce, and level his bitterness against our Annual, and however unworthy of notice, or even contemptible any opinion of his may be to us, his anathema will have effect in certain quarters. We must be prepared for any opposition. Our opponents have descended almost as low as they can for advantage against us, and we have no reason to believe that they will lessen any effort that succeeds in prejudicing the public mind against Universalists and all which they do—every volume they put forth. Our friends will honor themselves in baffling the desire to restrict the circulation of the 'Rose of Sharon.' Let them present to those unacquainted with its merits, its claims to their countenance and support.

We are gratified to think that our readers will find the present No. a highly interesting one. We ask their attention to the beautiful story of the 'Elder Sister,' by our very valuable correspondent, Mrs. N. T. Munroe. It will sustain her reputation as a writer who always appeals to the best principles and deepest feelings of our nature. Thoughtful readers esteem her articles very highly; and now that she hath 'a new name,' dear to woman, we expect that her success in awakening, through her writings, the purest affections, will be even more signal than in the past. 'The Reefer' will be found an excellent poem, such as few of the monthlies can boast of. The authoress has an exquisite talent at analogies, and her moral lessons are sweetly eloquent. She has our thanks for her favors. 'Faith, or Fidelity, No. VIII. of the Christian Graces,' will be found an excellent illustration of that grace of the christian. To quiet the guesses and surmises of some of the wise prophets among our readers, we will here state that 'Ellinora' is neither S. C. E., nor our humble self. 'The danger of tampering with Vice,' will be found an article full of the wisest admonitions, and Br. Chapin has our thanks for it. We cannot enumerate the various excellences of this No., and rest satisfied that our patrons will be interested and edified.

Br. Ballou's article was laid aside at the time of its receipt, because we had just then placed an article on the same subject, and of the same tenor, into the hands of the printer; and we have just recovered it. We are glad to greet 'L. of Concord,' again. Her favors were very acceptable. We have attempted several times to read the 'Inebriate,' but have been baffled, and in despair must say we cannot decipher it. This we regret, as we doubt not it is a good article, or we should not have kept it so long, nor tried so hard to read it. 'The Victim of Envy,' crowded out of this No., will appear in our next. Also, in our next will appear, 'The Bride,' 'The Old Graveyard,' by L.; 'My Home, Farewell,' and 'To ———,' by C. W. H.; 'Commune with your own Heart,' by Ione, 'Rural Sketches, No. I,' by L. A. P., and Heaven, by Josephine.

Our Book Table.

AN ADDRESS, delivered before the Mercantile Library Company, of Philadelphia. By Wm. E. Channing. This excellent address is worthy a more extended notice than can be given in the pages of this work. The subject which the author discusses, in his usual elegant and forcible style, is 'the Age.' His object is to show its distinguishing characteristic; which is, 'the tendency of all its movements to expansion, to diffusion, to Universality.' What is meant by this is simply this; that Literature and Science, instead of being as in former ages, monopolized by a few favored individuals, is now being diffused among the great mass of the people. This address in common with other popular discourses from the pen of the Dr., proves him to be a Reformer—not, however, quite a radical, but yet one so thorough that the term leveller would not be misapplied if used to designate to what class of Reformers he belongs.

Dr. Channing has no fears that the movements among the laboring millions for a better social state, will produce those dreadful evils which the enemies and the mistaken friends of the hardy producers of wealth forebode. More danger and greater evils, he thinks, are to be feared from the patrician than from the plebeian ranks of society.

TRUMPET AND MAGAZINE. This well known and extensively patronized periodical, has entered upon a new volume since our last No. It is too old and well known to need any notice from us; and we recur to its commencing a new volume more to show that we remember it, than because we think any word we can say will avail much.

INSTALLATION AT HAVERHILL. Br. Townsend P. Abell, late of Castine, Me. was installed as Pastor of the Universalist Society in Haverhill, (Mass.) Village Society, on, we believe, the 15th of June. We were prevented by circumstances from attending, but by the prayers of an earnest spirit were with the rejoicing friends. We are heartily glad to record this service, for our good friends have been a long time without a pastor, and one was much needed. May the union be blessed of heaven. The sermon was preached by Br. O. A. Skinner, and is spoken of as highly creditable to him. In the evening, Br. Chapin preached, and the communion was attended to. All the services, we are told, were attended by full and attentive congregations; and we must not fail to add, that the choir, as usual, acquitted themselves with great credit. We should be happy to give the excellent and appropriate hymns by S. C. E., and E. H. Chapin, had we room.

ESSEX CONFERENCE. The next meeting of the Essex County Quarterly Conference will be holden at Salem, on the third Wednesday in July—the 20th. We expect a full attendance, as the place of meeting is easy of access, and our Essex friends are always alive and active. The subject of Sabbath School Teachers' Conferences, will be introduced, and the utility of such associations set forth by those who have discussed the expediency of establishing them. We hope to see many of the officers and teachers of the Sabbath Schools in Essex County present on that occasion, as we doubt not their interest in all measures which promise good to the institution they support.

MINIATURE PORTRAIT OF J. Q. ADAMS. We acknowledge the receipt of a finely executed miniature likeness of Ex-President Adams, engraved and published by Nath'l Dearborn, Boston.

ORANGE FLOWER LOTION. The same care for the good of our lady readers that would impel us to guard them against the many miserable cosmetics which are thrust before them in the public prints, leads us now to commend to the attention of those who need it, the 'ORANGE FLOWER LOTION,' sold only by Orlando Tompkins, 271 Washington St., one of the neatest establishments in the city. It is designed for the cure or prevention of pimples, tan, or freckles, on the face, being a cooling and soothing bath. It is recommended to gentlemen who are troubled with soreness after shaving, as highly beneficial.

The Beatitudes;

Or the Elements of Christian Happiness.

CHAPTER II. HUMILITY.

'BLESSED are the poor in spirit; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.'

THE aphorisms of our Lord which make the first part of the fifth chapter of Matthew's record, are commonly called the Beatitudes, each of them opening with the word blessed or happy. Beatitudo comes from the Latin word beatus, signifying happy; and most commentators prefer the word happy instead of blessed in this connection, as the latter implies a superior degree of happiness. But it seems to my mind that our Savior meant to set forth the means of obtaining the purest and highest happiness of which our nature is capable; and he was wise who said, 'Our being's end and aim is not happiness—we may pass that by and find blessedness.'

One thing, however, is obvious, and that is—our Lord addressed himself to man's love of happiness. He did not condemn this desire or passion in man, and thus find fault with the make of our mental being, but sought to develope aright and give the best direction to this desire or passion. The world had long listened to unsatisfying views of the true nature and means of obtaining happiness, and with a better wisdom than that of the wisest he sought to end the debate.

The perfect law of happiness was yet to be given, and Jesus was to be the lawgiver. He did give it, but it was not for the outer man, but for the inward being—not for the senses, but for the soul. Herein lay unfolded the great mistake of men, and herein now lies unfolded man's great mistake, that happiness is not a sensual thing, but spiritual; for when man is surrounded with every thing the senses can desire, and every passion is gratified, there is still, far down beyond the reach of all this food, an appetite for something purer and better, reminding man of his mingled nature and need of heaven.

As when Moses declared, 'In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth,' he struck at the very root of idolatry and superstition, so Jesus when he commenced the beatitudes, struck at the foundation of all the false notions of happiness. He taught men to look beyond outward circumstances; not at men and things, but into themselves, and see if the right temper and disposition were there, and if their's was the character essential to happiness. The rich are not all happy, neither are the poor all unhappy; and when fortune flows in her favors, when power bestows her desired gifts, when fame sings her sweetest song, and health and friendship bless a mortal with their richest smiles, there may be sorrow or wo in his heart. It was so with Haman, Ahab, Solomon. The sacred page bears their histories, and a sad comment it is on unsanctified human ambition. While fame's clarion is sounding the note of praise, and wealth is increasing like the good seed in good ground; while the most abundant means are possessed to follow the beck of pleasure, and link to oneself a glad train, disease may be gnawing at the vitals of a dear one, or calamity entering the home; and what then is all outer good, if the heart has known nothing better than fortune, fame and pleasure? God has opened many sources of happiness. None are to be despised. The desires for wealth, power, and fame, are good; it is their abuse and perversion that change them to foes; and while we love earth and its charms, delighting in the social relations and prizing life, we disobey no requirement of the Deity; but we do err when we forget the fluctuating nature of all that makes up the variety of these ever shifting scenes, and neglect to seek the supreme good of the mind. He that drinketh of the wells that have their foundations in the earth, will thirst again; Jesus Christ alone can give the living water.

To him let us go, and there feel we are looking up into the face of a true friend while we hear him say—'Happy are the poor in spirit.' 'Poor in spirit,' sounds in many ears too much like 'poor spirited,' to be connected with happiness. But the idea called up by the latter phrase, has no fellowship with the Savior's meaning, for there is nothing in his religion that favors or cherishes abjectness of mind or heart. Far otherwise, for all its teachings are adapted to give to man such an idea of the worth of his nature, the excellence of its endowments and properties, and the glory of his destiny, as to inspire him with a vigor whose elasticity may never be lost. Paul gave a right idea of the spirit of christianity when he said—'God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind.' There is nothing in christianity to break down the lofty and aspiring spirit—nothing to enfeeble the intellect, and shackle reason, but every thing to strengthen, develope, and direct aright the energies of the mental qualities of our nature, and unfold the true man.

Nothing can be farther from the truth than that Jesus pronounced his first blessing on the mind that yielded up its reason to be blindly guided by him. The idea is preposterous in the extreme; for without a full and vigorous exercise of the intellect, how could any one be inclined to be his disciple, when to the natural man there was nothing to gain, and everything to lose? And did not reason do all in the comparison of his doctrine with the scriptures, and convince the people that he was a man of God? Christianity opposed to reason! No, it purifies and exalts it. Without it we are as the beasts; with it, we are but a little lower than the angels, and crowned with glory and honor. Let us not dim, or give to another that glory, or make the honor God has conferred upon us our condemnation by unfaithfulness to its worth. Yet how many look on christianity as something that fetters and enslaves, rather than giving the free action and mental power which are desirable! And I marvel not at this, when I remember what is taught men for christianity—what views thousands have concerning it—and what low conceptions of the religious character are prevalent. I feel that I should be poor spirited indeed, had I the same views of God which millions entertain, and did I believe that he on 'slender threads' has 'hung everlasting things;' for I should deem my spirit to be of little worth to be so exposed. But with the truth in the heart, I can use the language of an eloquent writer and say, 'God, as he is manifested by Christ, is another name for intellectual and moral excellence; and in the knowledge of him, our intellectual and moral powers find their element, nutriment, strength, expansion and happiness. To know God is to attain to the sublimest conception in the universe. To love God is to bind ourselves to a being, who is fitted, as no other being is, to penetrate and move our whole hearts; in loving whom we exalt ourselves; in loving whom, we love the great, the good, the beautiful, and the infinite; and under whose influence, the soul unfolds itself as a perennial plant under the cherishing sun. Such is the God of Jesus Christ; a being not to break the spirit, but to breathe trust, courage, constancy, magnanimity, in a word, all the sentiments which form an elevated mind.'

Jesus when he blessed the poor in spirit did not favor abjectness of soul. Neither did he laud that dejection of mind that is ever fearful lest it hope too much from God. There are many such, though devoted to piety, yet always in sorrow from the apprehension that they shall lose God and glory. How much mental anguish results from this one cause! Hearts bleeding and minds distracted, attest its fearful effects. Spiritually poor indeed! but no blessedness can be connected with it; for it is as a poison pervading the whole system, destroying health, debarring from a thousand innocent pleasures, and making day dark and night hideous. It has caused mortals to feel that their dependence is on an almighty tyrant, rather than a beneficent Father, and made 'The fear of hell the hangman's whip,

To keep the wretch in order.'

Jesus Christ had no sympathy with such spiritual poverty, neither has his religion; for christianity does not build its strength on the lowest feelings of our nature—on a slavish dread of outward evil, but upon the noblest faculties and affections of our being. He is ignorant indeed of God and Christ, who does not feel that the best offering which is brought to the altar of the Divinity is an affectionate and confiding spirit. Without this, obedience is but constraint; the Father is not served, but Misery dreaded. The Savior taught by contrasts, and when he declared, 'Happy are the poor in spirit!' he spake of the disposition opposite to pride and love of outer glory—that thirsting after outward dominion and splendor that made one passion of all desires, and swelled all hearts from the greatest to the humblest by pantings for national exaltation. To such the kingdom of heaven would be no kingdom; for what cares the sensual for the spiritual, or the earthly for the heavenly? His was the kingdom of truth; his reign, the dominion of righteousness; his honors, the excellences of piety; his rewards, the answer of a good conscience, peace within, a firm confidence in God, and a glorious hope of immortality. To be poor in spirit, in his sense, was to be humble, not aspiring after outer, but inner conquest, glory, and power. It was to feel that something better was needed than had before been given to satisfy the soul, and to be ready with an humble trust, like Simeon, to receive the desired good.

The kingdom of heaven! This was promised to the humble minded. What is our idea of a heavenly reign? Is it not a moral empire, a dominion of goodness, a subjection of the inferior to the better nature? It is. How plainly then do we see that it could only be promised to the mind free from that pride and vanity that fetter the spirit and weigh down its aspirations after the good, the beautiful, and the true! Our Savior in the aphorism we are considering, declared a literal truth—a great truth—a great moral revelation. The world had all along regarded martial virtue, a warlike temper of mind, as the pledge of true distinction and power. But Jesus insists upon the opposite. 'Happy are the poor in spirit,' those whose strength is not impaired by selfish considerations, who are ready to endure for the sake of being good and doing good; for theirs is the true kingdom, theirs is the loftiest throne, the mightiest authority. Poor they might be in the view of the world, but rich in the sight of heaven.

Thus the grace of humility is taught us and commended to our acceptance. The first among the beatitudes, and the first quality needed to make us happy, for well has the poet sung,

'Humility, that low, sweet root,
From which all heavenly virtues shoot.'

Humility is the first requisite to true knowledge. So reality has proved. Newton was indeed an humble man. With all his learning, and consciousness of having opened new paths to the highest achievements in science, he was never boastful or proud. When Dr. Halley ventured once to say something in his presence disrespectful of christianity, Newton silenced him by the gentle answer, 'I have studied these things; you have not!' Here is the difference between minds. One lofty in its own acquirements, scorns the exercise of that humility which to the other is the source of sublimer contemplations than were ever opened by the heavens, and which unfolded capacities and affections learning and science alone can never reach. Newton gave up his mind to facts—submitted his reason to the real, and did not, therefore, like many called philosophers before his time, form a theory by speculation, and then strive to make nature's laws and phenomena agree with it. Hence the simplest incident could excite thought, which carefully followed, led him to the discovery that

'That very law which moulds a tear,
And bids it trickle from its source,
That law preserves the earth a sphere,
And guides the planets in their course;'

and from this he could progress to the formation of a system of philosophical analysis of the governing principles in nature's magnificent round. Yet after all, a few days before he died he said, 'I do not know how I may appear to the world; but to myself, I seem to have been only like a boy, playing on the sea-shore and diverting myself with finding a smoother pebble or prettier shell than ordinary, while the great ocean of truth lay all undiscovered before me.' Happy are they who launch out upon that ocean with a like humble spirit, and not with the rash temper of the speculative and vain. Humility is the basis of true learning; the profound are oftener humble than the superficial, for many will make up in boasts what they want in knowledge, and substitute profession for principle. 'Have you got religion?' said a young revivalist, in a stage coach, to a venerable and pious divine, to him an utter stranger. 'None to speak of!' was the simple reply. The young man took the rebuke, and stilled his noisy, intrusive officiousness.

In the study of the scriptures we need this grace. To how many who scorn our holy book, could Newton's reply to Halley be directed with propriety—You have not studied these things! They are too free to bend the united powers of the mind to the careful study of that volume, and therefore trample under foot the precious treasure of human hope, trust and joy. God has given man in his very nature—in his sorrows, his wants, his sympathies, and his aspirations—enough to teach him the need of a voice from heaven; a voice that will not come from the stars though we invoke them, nor from the grave though we plead; a voice that shall speak of imperishable things, of unfading loveliness, undying glories, and an element for the immortal mind. And if with the sorrows and wants of our nature pleading for a God, Christ, and Heaven, men will dare to scorn the ark of the covenant of the Father with humanity, and tread in the dust holiest things, the retribution of injured nature will be known. To live without God and without hope in the world, is a sad destiny—the destiny of him who through pride will not come unto Jesus that he may have life. Humility comes to him, asking not why God has not revealed the secret things, but what he has revealed, conscious that the intellect has no powers that should be wasted in idle, fruitless, perplexing, and darkening speculations. How many through speculation darken counsel with words without knowledge!

This grace for which we plead, is needed to introduce minds, now strangers, to the truth of unlimited redeeming grace. 'It is false, it is vile, it is a scheme of the wicked one to fill his domains!' cry a thousand voices when Universal Salvation is mentioned, before they have examined with any carefulness a single feature of the doctrine. They scorn it—they despise it—they are too proud, self-sufficient in their own opinions, to give it sober attention; but, as do sceptics with the Bible, they know it is all idle, foolish, an imposition and delusive. Know it! as the church knew Galileo's doctrine of the revolution of the earth when they condemned him as a heretic and applauded every monk who preached against his theory. They presumed it to be against the honor of the scriptures, and therefore denounced and scorned what is now received by every reflecting mind. Truth is revealed to test the human passions, to bring out the latent feelings, and show the weakness and strength of man, and write on the page of history wise lessons for other generations. But man so loves the future and so intently gazes onward that the warning teachers in the far distance behind are forgotten, and he is still presumptuous, rash and proud. But the church cannot bend in subjection our doctrine as they could Galileo. Like the sun, it will shine and retain its warming, renovating, illuminating, and fertilizing qualities, whether the mists and clouds intervene between it and man, or not. Without humility, that required the yielding of long cherished opinions and advocated theories, no mind in Galileo's time could come to a knowledge of what study had revealed to him; it is so now, with doctrines and our faith. Men must discard pride, and humble themselves, or be without the knowledge—the soul-felt, heart-satisfying knowledge, of unbounded, free, full and complete sanctifying and redeeming grace.

We see then the blessedness of humility—its connection with our happiness. It was this grace that would have led the way to expel from the minds of the Jews the errors and anticipations that clouded their mental vision and blinded their reason, so that they could not discern in the spiritual heavens the uprising of the Sun of Righteousness, with healing in his wings. It is needed by us, that we may exclude from our hearts all the foes to spiritual improvement—all that makes us doubt, or act as if we doubted, that 'before honor is humility.'

'The bird that soars on highest wing,
Builds on the ground its lowly nest;
And she that doth most sweetly sing,
Sings in the shade when all things rest;
In lark and nightingale we see,
True types of sweet humility.'

Heaven.

'O, IT is to be feared, that heaven contains very few whole families. It is made up of the fragments of ruined households.'

Calvinistic Sab. School Report.

O, WHEN the fireside circle breaks,
When friend of friend the last leave takes,
Must the fond heart with grief be filled,
Each rising hope of bliss be stilled,
By that sad thought, so fraught with pain,
We part and ne'er may meet again?

Can but the members of a few
Glad households, that the earth once knew,
Look round in heaven without a tear,
And say with joy, 'We all are here!'
Must the far greater part be left,
To mourn for friends of whom they're left?

Must the true wife, whose earthly years
Were passed in fervent prayers and tears
For him, the loved, though erring one,
Whose smile was dear as light of sun,—
Find that in vain the tear fount stirred,
And prayers were but as words unheard?

Can it be true the beauteous child
Will roam through heaven in anguish wild,
In search of her whose mother-love
Was prized all earthly things above,
But o'er whom sin had thrown its pall,
And find that it is useless all?

Must the fond sister's ardent prayer
For him her dearest earthly care,

Whom she e'er strove to lead aright,
To love the God of life and light,
Be answered not, and he be seen
Tossed on the waves of anguish keen?

Sure such is not the blessed home
To which our Savior bids us come,
And ask for blessings at the throne
Of Him who loves us as his own;
That is a home where tears are not,
Where pains and sighs are all forgot.

O tell me not that e'er the mind
Can to God's will be so resigned,
That we can know some cherished friend
Is suffering pain that ne'er shall end,
And feel no tear of pity start,
No sympathetic throb of heart!

It cannot be! the callous soul
Alone is free from love's control.
The hardened heart dwells not above,
All are made soft by purest love;
And heaven to be a happy place,
Must all who've dwelt on earth embrace.

True, rusty links may oft be found,
Scattered from household chains around.
But God is love, and he is might,
And he will cleanse and make them bright.
Heaven's not made of parts, but wholes,
Not sorrowing, but of glad some souls. JOSEPHINE.

Rural Rambles. No. 1.

BY MISS L. A. PEABODY.

A MORNING IN MAY.

'BEAUTIFUL! beautiful indeed!' exclaimed my talented and sensitive companion, as we took a seat upon a rock on the side of the greenest and loftiest hill in the neighborhood; (our village may well be celebrated for its green and beautiful eminences;) and indeed, it seems to me the loveliest spot on earth. I had been walking with a fair friend along the road which passes by our dwelling, and winds round the shore of a clear, bright pond,—a reservoir for the mill-stream, which is not only the activity, but the actual glory of our little neighborhood. We stopped and gazed long and admiringly upon that pure sheet of water, that lay in its unruffled splendor like a sleeping thing of life. 'Twas a glorious scene;—one that would be better delineated by the pencil of a painter, than by the pen of the humble individual who is attempting to describe it. The dark evergreen forms of the pine and hemlock, mingling with the red blossoms of the maple and slender birch saplings in their white garb, as they thickly studded the opposite shore, lay mirrored in its clear depths, like another and a fairer creation. A little to the left of us, and on a parallel with the woodlands of which I have been speaking, rose a high hill, covered with a soft green carpet. Its summit, crowned with shrubs and the stumps of trees, is used for a pasture, and is separated by a rude fence from the more verdant mowing lands below. Then came to our ears nature's own melody—the sighing of breezes through the branches of the pines, mingled with the sound of the waters as they fell over the dam by the 'old red mill,' which stood a short distance below us. The only human form that greeted our vision, was the enterprising proprietor of this establishment, who might occasionally be seen passing before the windows with hasty steps, busily engaged in performing his accustomed duties. The pure breath of heaven came to us from the opposite shore, laden with the sweet fragrance of the pine, the arbutus and anemones, refreshing our spirits with its purity and sweetness, and causing us to rejoice in the supremacy of God's government, and in his guardian care over all his works. So beautiful was all around, we almost deemed ourselves in Paradise. The association, which our pure and holy faith causes to exist in the mind, between the beautiful things of earth and heaven, naturally arose in all its loveliness, while contemplating a scene so magnificent, and thrilling to our hearts.

We conversed of heaven and its inhabitants, and in our imaginations we saw the pure spirit of a fair young being, who, a few years ago, passed from earth to dwell in her native home. A delicate exotic was she upon our earth, and is it not meet that she should be removed to a better land, where the chilling blasts of affliction and adversity may not visit her too rudely, and where she may never more know sorrow and suffering? I see her now, with her dark, dreamy eyes, soft and gentle, yet intellectual in their expression; and can fancy I hear her sweet lute like voice coming in gentle murmurs to my ear, like the silvery cadence of a seraph's song. A sweet twin blossom was she to the fair being at my side; and what a pure and holy love was theirs! so sweet, so child-like in their affections, and with all their tastes and loves so beautifully interwoven, that almost their very existence seemed inseparable. But it is ever thus;—the fairest and the best of earth are the soonest stricken down by the hand of the Destroyer. And Oh! how long, and with what anguish of heart did the bereaved ones mourn the lost rose-bud, withered, alas! in its earliest blossoming. And that lone, sweet flower upon the broken stem, bowed her head at this severe trial, even as the too early and delicate spring flower shrinks from the chilling winds and blighting frosts.

But time wore away, and the buoyancy of youth could not always yield to sorrow, and that bereaved sister regained much of her accustomed happiness;—yet did she fondly cherish the recollection of her beloved Ada, as an image of purity and truth; and as we talked of the dear departed, a sigh, low and tremulous as the first awakening of a zephyr, came to my ear; and as I turned my head, I perceived that Memory was busy at the tearful fountain of that young heart, sending its glistening treasures to her eyes, which rested there like the pure dew-drops of heaven reposing on the meek, blue violet.

Come, dear Ella! you are sad; let us pursue our walk. Hear how merrily those sweet birds ring out their gladsome notes on the air, and all nature seems to be rejoicing in the 'One Great Cause!' We walked on, and soon crossed a brook on a wide piece of timber which is laid over as an apology for a bridge, at the entrance of a woody glen, in which we found an abundance of sweet May flowers—the treasures which we had been seeking. We soon gathered our hands full of those sweet gems of earth, and retraced our steps homeward, drawing lessons of the wisdom and goodness of God, from his sweet gifts to us which we held in our hands. I accompanied Ella to the village, and with another fair friend for my guide, I ascended the hill which is mentioned at the commencement of this sketch, occasionally stopping to gather the sweet innocence, mouse-ear and the bright yellow blossoms of the dandelions, mingled with sprigs of the glossy leafed laurel. A bright blue violet was found by Salina, before we gained our humble seat upon the hill-side. It was the first we had seen, and with a grace all her own, she placed it in my hand. I prized that gift, though it was a simple offering; and what a lesson of meekness and humility I read in that sweet flower. Well do I love the flowers for their gentle ministries to my heart; they have a world of teaching in themselves, and they bring their simple truths home to my heart with a deeper emphasis than ever fell from the lips of earth's ablest orators.

My companion had chosen a fine seat for our resting place, as it commanded a view of the most beautiful parts of the scenery around us. At the base of the hill, and directly before us, flowed a wide and beautiful brook, which is still known by the Indian appellation of Latacoonamug. Turning our eyes to the left, they rested upon some two or three dwelling houses, a cotton mill, and nearer to us a clothier's mill, shaded by a few old elms, which added greatly to the interest of the scene. To the right of us, extended as far as we could see, a long, narrow tract of woodland, through which passed the fair rivulet, glistening like diamonds in the sunlight, as it occasionally came to our view through openings in the trees. Farther on in the same direction, in a small clearing in the woods, the blue smoke might be seen rising from the roof of a low cabin, which appeared to us in the distance, like a cave; and still beyond, were two dwelling houses and a shingle manufactory in sight. But there was nothing near us to break the stillness round, save the songs of the robins and black-birds, and the merry chirping of the swallows, as they glided on their airy pinions close to the surface of the water, after lowering their soft breasts to the wave, then with gladsome notes rising higher in the air, seemingly rejoicing in their very existence. Hark! what delightful strain of music strikes our ears, from that clump of alders! 'Tis our old friend, 'Robert Lincoln,' singing one of his best songs. And how happy those little tortoises seem! with their shining backs to the sun, as they lay on that old black stump, just peering above the surface of the water.

Long did Salina and myself busy ourselves with our pencils, and in viewing the scene around us; then we arose and descended the hill, crossed the brook, and came once more into the village; and as I returned home, my heart rose in grateful homage to my Creator for all his benefits bestowed upon us, and that he has given me a heart to love whatever is beautiful in this, our world; and for the pure faith that teaches us that God's care is equally over all his creatures, and his loving kindness is unto all.

WE all need to be more just towards ourselves, and act up to our professions. Of what avail is it, to say we dislike the conduct of a neighbor, when at the same time, our own conduct is not only similar, but aggravated by our wilfulness.

Study to cultivate peace in all situations in life.

Judge justly,—by so doing the blessing of the needy will rest upon thee.

Gossip.

EVERY reader is undoubtedly familiar with the word placed at the head of this article, and understands its meaning. It is the habit, so very common, of indulging in trifling and foolish conversation about other people, and at their expense—prying into their business, telling of some strange or wonderful thing that they have done, surmising as to what they are going to do, or indulging in some such silly and equally interesting tittle-tattle. The subject, I am aware, is rather trite, and withal, not a very poetical one. But I am not much given to poetry. I am addicted rather to plain matter of fact, leaving others better able, to toil up the giddy heights of Parnassus, and range in the sometimes misty regions of imagination and fancy. Hence, my choice of the present subject. Though trite, I know it is a useful one; and one, too, which, if there is any subject concerning which line upon line, and precept upon precept are needed, is certainly of this character. For, of all the little vices observable in the social minglings of life—of all the abuses of the tongue, especially, of which we know there are many, none is more common than the habit of which I now speak. Without exaggeration, we may say that it is to be found in every neighborhood, in city and country, and in every grade of society. The rich and the poor, the refined and the vulgar, the sensible and those not very sensible, each, all, are found addicted to this miserable habit of gossiping—this silly fondness for telling over new or strange things concerning their neighbors, and meddling with their tongues in that in which they have no concern. Though much has been said, therefore, I am persuaded that it is well and necessary that much more should yet be said respecting it, and that plainly and in earnest, too. For this reason I speak, and shall seek to speak in this manner.

I have spoken of the general prevalence of the habit. In remarking upon this, however, we cannot, I think, in justice, say, as of many other habits, that it is to be found alike among both sexes. Men have habits that are mostly peculiar to them, and we have no hesitation in so declaring; why, then, if such be the fact, should we hesitate to say that women have their peculiar faults? Evidently, we should not. In reference to this, therefore, I think my lady readers themselves will bear witness to my justice and entire impartiality, when I say (and I hope they will like me none the less, as I am sure I do not them, because I say) that, as a class, men are not addicted to the habit, but that, as a general thing, it is principally confined to their own sex.

And the fact that it is so may be very easily accounted for. Men are out in the busy world. They have their part to act there, amid its bustle and its noise, its declaimings and toils, its strivings for wealth and its graspings for station, and influence, and power. Their conversation, therefore, it is natural to expect, will be in relation to the out of door things of the world, business, politics, stocks, trade, and the like. With woman, however, it is not so. She moves in a more limited, though not less important sphere. Hers it is, retired in a measure from the business and turmoil of life, to be confined to the narrow, and yet, in a certain sense, extended, circle of home, and its in-door duties. Hence, there is not so large a field of common conversation presented to her as to man; and hence, the lack in this particular is too often made up by gossip and tattle.

It is not, then, owing to any peculiar constitution on the part of woman, that, as a class, the sex is more addicted to the habit of which I speak than men. It is owing rather to the different spheres in which the two sexes move, and their different habits of life and business. Place man in the circumstances of woman, and the probability is he would be quite as much given to gossip as women now are.

In thus accounting for the greater prevalence of the habit among females than among males, however, I would by no means be understood as making any kind of apology for those who practise it. Far from it. I regard it as a very unbecoming, besides being an unchristian employment, admitting of no apology, and capable of no excuse, be it practised by whom it may. There is enough, in all conscience, in such a world as ours, for a company, be it large or small, of sensible people, whether they are men or women, to talk about, without meddling with other people's business, or looking into other people's houses, or families, or troubling themselves in any way about what other people may do, or calculate to do. Men can talk about their business, to be sure, to keep them from such conversation; so may women talk about theirs, if there is nothing more interesting or important. Home, its duties, its cares, and the best way of making it a good and happy home—these are subjects, certainly, not very barren, or uninteresting, at least, to any one true as wife or mother, daughter or sister. And besides; if there is nothing but gossip and the private affairs of others to talk about, far better is it that the tongue should be still and that nothing should be said, each mind falling in and conversing with itself, than that the tongue should be employed concerning that which cannot profit, but may engender mischief and strife.

We know, indeed, that it is nothing criminal, nothing at all wrong for one friend to speak to another of others and of that in which they are concerned. It is natural; it is perfectly proper, at times. Indeed, there are occasions when it is our duty to take notice, and to speak to one another, of many things in which gossips are accustomed to deal; when the peculiarities or failings of others may be, and should be, noticed by us. 'We must take lessons of the contrasts as well as of the agreements in the world around us. But these lessons should be taken in the proper time and manner.' There is a right and reasonable way of doing every thing that is proper, and a right and reasonable way of doing this, therefore, as well as every thing else. And so far from there being any objection to its being done in this manner, duty loudly calls us to it.

The objection lies only against the gossip's practice—the practice of dealing in such things at all times and everywhere, of intruding into the privacy of home and family, of spreading abroad suspicions and surmises, and giving color and shape, and wings to undefined reports, and every doubt, and questioning. Here lies the sin, and here is the error to be cured.

And alas! how wide the need of the cure extends! How many there are who cannot spend a short time with a friend, or a company of friends, without falling into this error, and being guilty of this sin! Many, when there is opportunity for this, seem to have but little relish for any thing else. Any thing that will instruct and profit is dry, and dull, and uninteresting. They must have somebody else, or somebody else's business to talk, or to tell about, to be at ease. Such may well be called, in the language of the Apostle, 'busy bodies in other men's matters.' Meet with such an one, and you will hear of the marriage, or the intended marriage of certain parties, who are themselves ignorant of the matter; if a death has taken place, you will be very likely to hear of some very wonderful thing said, or done, by the deceased before death; if any thing new has taken place, no matter what it is, you will probably hear all about it, how it happened, and when, and where, and who was there. Meet with such an one, indeed, where and under whatever circumstances you may, you may always depend upon having some budget of news undone in your ears. Some engagement has been broken, or some new one has taken place; some new couple are to be married; somebody has been buying a new garment, or piece of furniture; perhaps at an extravagant price; at any rate, depend upon something. I have seen very many such—always full. Have you heard the news? Did you know that Mr. this one had done this thing, or that Mr. that one was doing, or going to do, that? Don't you think Mrs. X. has said such a thing, or that Mrs. Y. has been saying or doing something else? These and the like, are the questions in which they apparently find their greatest gratification and delight.

Gossips seldom confine themselves to that of which they themselves have been witnesses, or of which they have had personal knowledge. They almost always deal, among others, in those things which they have heard, and sometimes heard a great way off. Mrs. A. told Mrs. B. that Mr. C. had seen his neighbor—and so on to the end of the chapter. And here is where lies one of the great evils of the habit. A single sentence, nay, sometimes a single word, however unimportant in itself originally, by passing through so many mouths, and receiving so many versions, becomes so extended and warped from its original meaning, as to convey one altogether different, and serve as a text upon which volumes of scandal and gossip are preached.

And another thing; gossips almost always deal in great, very profound secrets. They would not have them lisped to any body—especially, to get out publicly, for the world. And every one who is favored with a hearing of them, is solemnly charged that they were told as an unrevealable secret, and that they must not speak of them even to their best friend. And thus the secret goes round.

Almost every one, undoubtedly, has seen many burlesque representations of these things, setting them and the whole habit, out in their own truly ridiculous light. But did any one ever read one that, in his or her estimation, went too far in the representation? I will venture to say not. It is something, indeed, which it is not possible to picture in a light too ridiculous and foolish. And then, too, think of the valuable time wasted and misspent in it—time which might be employed in good and instructive conversation, benefiting the mind and heart, or in that, at least, which is amusing and harmless. Think, too, how cruel gossip is—of the many good names it has blasted or blackened—of the many sad hearts it has made—of the many tears it has wrung out—of the many bitter, miserable days and hours it has caused—of the many friendships it has broken—of the many homes it has made wretched and woful.

And then, again, consider how uncourteous and imprudent is the practice. What right has any one to intrude himself, or herself, into a neighbor's house, or family arrangements, or any of his private affairs? What business is it to me, or any one else, whether such a man wears a black coat or a brown one: whether his wife does this thing, or that, or neither? It is the highest degree of impudence for any one to meddle in such concerns of another. And then, too, the habit is unchristian. We are forbidden by the spirit, and by the express inculcations of the gospel, to be 'busy bodies in other men's matters.' Every one is to attend to his or her own business, and discharge his or her own duties, and leave others to do the same, cherishing ever a disposition to assist, if circumstances require.

Gossiping is something, too, which every one is ready to condemn. Take the most inveterate gossips in the community and they will condemn it, when it is spoken of as being practised by others, as strongly as any one. And I will venture to say, that if any one addicted to the habit, no matter to how great an extent, has been reading what I have said, he or she has agreed to it all; and very likely, some other person has been thought of to whom it will apply, and to them it has all been given. I speak, however, to every one given at all to the practice. Ask yourself, reader, Am I given to gossip? Do I love, or am I apt, to meddle with other people's private affairs, and to talk about what other folks have said, or done, or are going to do? Have I always some trifling news to tell, and do I love to talk about matters that concern my neighbors more than myself? And if you can answer these, or similar questions, in the affirmative, do not give away any thing I have written. I have written for, and directly to you. Take it all to yourself, therefore, and apply it accordingly.

We have seen gossiping to be foolish, cruel, impudent, unchristian and condemned by every body. Who, then, will indulge in it? Not I,—let the response of every one be; and in this determination, let the prayer of the poet be ours:

'As every day thy mercy spares,
Will bring its trials and its cares,
O Savior, till my life shall end,
Be thou my counsellor and friend;
Teach me thy precepts all divine,
And be thy pure example mine.'

DOMBROWKA.

MIECZYŁAS was the first Polish prince who received christianity. He was born blind, but at the age of seven, without any assignable cause, he gained his sight. 'It was not a miracle, however, which softened the heart of Mieczylas for the reception of religious faith, nor was a monk his preacher. Love was his priest, and woman's lips first schooled him in the principles of the christian religion. He was enamored of Dombrowka, the daughter of the Duke of Bohemia, a country which had lately embraced christianity. The lady refused to accept his suit unless he was baptized; and Mieczylas, prompted by the impulse of affection rather than faith, sacrificed the superstitions and prejudices of his fathers on the altar of love.'

Fletcher's History of Poland.

'Twas evening in Bohemia; the soft light
Of golden sunset crowned the mountain brows,
And the sweet sisterhood who guard the night
Had met around it with their twilight vows.
The low-voiced winds were gathered in the vales,
To whisper to the flowers their wild, sweet tales;
And fountains prattling to the rosy beams
Of the reposing sun; and bright blue streams
Meandering softly through the violet dells;
And trickling rills like silver water bells;
And whispering leaves, and lonely vesper birds,
And singing vintagers, and home-bound herds,
Mingled their plaintive cadences, and made
Delirious music for the sunset shade.

She knelt, Bohemia's fair and gentle flower;
Dombrowka knelt within her own sweet bower.
The winds, pure messengers of life, were there,
Twining the fragrant jasmine in her hair;
And the red rose, with luxury of love,
Wove its long branches in a shade above.
Dombrowka knelt and bowed her graceful head
Above the sacred page which she had spread.
Her golden curls like morning sunbeams fell
Adown her shoulders in their fair bright swell,
And in the violet depths of her young eyes
Thought might have found its fathomless supplies.
Her small white jewelled hands were clasped in prayer,
And her bright lips breathed music on the air.

Silence was round her; but a step drew near—
A gentle step; and a dark eye, as clear
As the wild eagle's, grew serene and deep
As it fell tenderly upon her face.
That sweet impassioned face! where love might reap
Such undecaying strength, where it might trace
So much of human feeling blent with prayer!
Oh woman! never pleads thy heart with heaven,—

Thy fervent orisons ne'er cleave the air
 Save to call blessings on the loved! 'Tis given
 To thee to pray, to hope imploringly,
 To seek thy God for others, and to be
 A lone yet faithful priestess at the shrine
 Of love o'er-mastering, yet all divine.
 The Prince of Poland listened to her prayer—
 Listened unseen, and with a silent bliss;
 Listened, and heard his own name uttered there!
 Uttered with tears, and piercing tenderness,
 Might he not weep? Though bold and strong of heart,
 Could he resist the fervency of love?
 Or quell the burning tear-drops that would start
 With generous haste his heart's deep truth to prove?

But one short hour before, his love was thrown Back on his heart, a slighted, worthless thing;
 All the rich light of early life had flown,
 And Hope lay prostrate with a broken wing.
 How it came back at one sweet word from her
 Filling his bosom with its songs of bliss!
 That word of prayer! Oh might he dare infer
 It gushed from her heart's hidden tenderness?
 One moment passed, and at her feet he wept!
 Passionately eloquent, he whispered there
 All the strong joy which through his bosom swept,
 When she had softly breathed his name in prayer.

'Mieczylas,' she whispered, 'I do love
 Truly and deeply; but the God above
 Whom thou know'st not, has heard my solemn vow;
Who weds with me, at the same shrine must bow.
 Thou, Prince of Poland, to Sclavonian gods
 Dost pour thine incense; and the flowery sods
 Of thy green vales are stained with sacrifice
 Offered to senseless idols. Prince, arise!
 I love thee, but I love my God. We kneel
 At different shrines; and surely thou must feel
 That if our hearts meet ever, it should be
 When we adore upon the bended knee!'

He answered not, but from his radiant eyes
 Spake out his spirit's eloquent replies;
 One little hand he dared to clasp in his—
 To seal upon it one impassioned kiss—
 To gaze in lowly love upon her face,
 So beautiful in every heavenly grace—
 To breathe her name—to pray to be forgiven—
 To lift his hands adoringly to Heaven—
 To call on God, the God Dombrowka loved—
 And plead to have his heart's devotion proved.
 There was a fervor in his eye—his cheek
 Burned with the earnest impulse of his soul;
 There were deep cherished thoughts he dared not speak,
 Yet which he could not utterly control.
 'Sweet lady, from my heart I cast this hour
 Each heathen idol which my fathers served;
 I own thy beauty's sway, thy spirit's power—
 Henceforth with better faith my soul is nerved.
 Lady, I worship at the shrine with thee—
 Wilt thou, beloved, worship there with me?'

Her cheek grew pale. The rush of joy o'erpowered
 Her woman's heart, too perilously dowered
 With love. He drew her to his breast,
 While she with trusting innocence confessed
 Her heart's bewildering hopes.

'I am all thine,
 If thou art God's; and thou this hour shalt prove,
 By kneeling with me at his holy shrine,
 The truth and beauty of thy faith and love.'

My Friend.

BY IONE.

JANE STANLEY was my own chosen friend. The world called her haughty, but I, who was permitted to see her heart, knew that the charge was groundless. True, it was not in her nature to display the rich treasures of a carefully stored mind to the careless gaze of the indifferent; but if a sympathetic finger struck the lyre, it gave out strains of rich and heart-thrilling music. Her most partial admirers would not pronounce her handsome, but the most critical would turn away satisfied with her look of calm, dignified intelligence. To me, she had ever been the kindest and best of friends, and I valued her love the more, that I knew it was not thoughtlessly bestowed, or shared with the multitude.

There was one theme upon which my friend was always eloquent. I would I could portray the indignant flashing of her eye, and the crimson blood which suffused her cheek, when the vice of intemperance was discussed in her presence.
 The loathing and scorn, scarcely tempered with pity, which she poured forth on the offending, debased, and wretched inebriate, was startling from the very intensity of feeling to which it gave utterance. I could never define the reason of her peculiar abhorrence of this vice. She had never wept over the grave of a fallen brother or dear friend, but she saw, at a glance upon society, the fearful ravages of the insidious demon.

Jane was wooed and won in early womanhood by one worthy to possess so rare a jewel, and a happier bride never knelt at the foot of the altar.

Hers was the love of the full, deep stream, whose current was concealed, not the shallow rivulet, whose pebbly floor could be read at a glance. She departed for a distant city to find a home, but our correspondence was unremitting for two years; from that time until her death, which occurred a few months after, I heard from her only incidentally. The history of her last hours
 I gathered in conversations with her brother, and this I am about to relate. From the commencement of her married life she had looked the personification of happiness. She was universally admired in the city of her adoption, for love had softened the outward show of pride, and her intellect always commanded respect and attention.
 Her husband was loved with all the devotion of which her nature was susceptible, for she had seen nought to lessen the esteem his virtues had inspired. Strange that the vice she most dreaded should have been the one to snatch her earthly idol from her embrace.

Go with me for a moment to her beautiful parlor, where she sat impatiently awaiting the arrival of her husband. She had thrown the book aside she had vainly attempted to read, and, having exchanged the evening dress for the loose wrapper, drew her chair to the window, and sat listening for his familiar footstep. It came at last. Jane rose to give him entrance and bid him welcome, but stood transfixed with horror at his altered mien and distorted features. She sprung from the hand that would have clasped hers, and confronted him with a look of mingled scorn and agony.

'Edward Morton, you have forfeited the heart which was wholly yours, and henceforth our lot must be a divided one. Go to your chamber, and leave me to the anguish of a breaking heart. You must need sleep.'

The last words were spoken with a depth of scorn which would have touched a heart less proud than Edward's; they recalled his wandering senses, and showed him the madness of which he had been guilty. He approached his wife and held out his hand, but her arms were folded upon her breast, and her lips were compressed and pale. 'Jane, this is not my first offence, but it shall be my last. Will you not forgive me?'

'Go to your conscience and your God,' she answered, with a terrible calmness, 'my forgiveness can avail but little.'

He took a lamp from the table and left the room. No sooner did she hear his footstep upon the stairs, than she locked the door behind him, and threw herself again into her chair. Her cold lips slowly parted, and she murmured, 'my God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?'—and then came floods of tears, and groans of unutterable anguish, for a chasm stood yawning before her, and a husband's hand was forcing her to its depths. This could not last long, and the fountain of her tears was exhausted. During the hours of that long and dreadful night, she paced the floor with a regular step. Once Morton approached the door, and begged her to retire to rest. 'I cannot sleep,' she said, 'and am far better here. I entreat of you to retire and leave me,'—she added in a softened voice, and again she was left to the solitude of her unutterable thoughts.

Morning found her at the window with a complexion like marble, and her eye beaming with unwonted lustre. She seemed like one over whom the storm had broken with irresistible violence. She had met its terrors with outward composure, but the ruin was within. When her husband descended, she met him with the accustomed salutations, but no remnant of a smile passed over her features. Edward would have spoken of the preceding night, but she forbade it. 'Let that be an interdicted subject,' she said, 'if possible, we will both forget the past. You need fear no reproaches, as I shall never allude to the subject again. I must leave you with your conscience and your God. My views and feelings are as familiar to you as myself, and repetition would only serve to harrow our feelings, while forgetfulness is most easily attained by silence.'

A servant entered and announced breakfast. Jane presided as usual, but her coffee was scarcely tasted, and the meal passed wearily away. Edward left the table, and approached his wife to give the usual parting kiss. She received it mechanically, but returned it not, and as soon as he was gone, retired to her chamber with directions that she should not be disturbed. I would I were able to follow her sad history day by day, but I could only glean this scanty remnant from her brother,—the only relative who was permitted to watch over the last months of her life. He told me that she grew more shadowy, day by day, and refused medical advice, until her failing strength refused to support her across her room.

It was a beautiful morning in the close of summer, her husband had left the city on urgent business, and her brother was persuading her to yield to their wishes. 'Charles,' she replied, 'a physician cannot heal a wounded spirit, and mine is pierced unto death.' The flood gates of her heart were open, and she told him all her sorrow. 'I have struggled against this,' she said, 'but it avails not. Since that awful night, Edward has been to me kind and devoted, and every leisure hour has been passed in my sick room. He has been mother, sister and friend, but the blow had been given, and the stroke could not be borne. He acknowledged that this was not his first crime, but he had eluded my vigilant eye, and had I not persisted in sitting up for him, it would have remained undiscovered. I had sometimes left a servant to await his coming, when, as I supposed, urgent business detained him. The autumn flowers will bloom upon my grave and die there. The snows of winter will press heavily upon this form, which has ever been carefully guarded, but I shall be at rest. Come to me whenever you can, for your presence is very consoling. There is no shadow resting upon our intercourse,' she added, looking tenderly upon him, and this sounded more like a reproach than any word he ever heard her utter.

Sorrow had done its work, confidence had received its death blow, and there was left her but the refuge of the grave. She died when summer was pouring its rich tribute into the bosom of autumn, and he whose sinful indulgence had destroyed her, knelt upon her grave a sorrow-stricken, but a wiser and better man. From the evening when she discovered his fatal propensities, she never smiled. Her husband would watch her while she slept, and the tears would gather slowly in her eyes and roll down her colorless cheeks, as though the mind could not yield its burden of disappointment even to the sweet influences of the great restorer.

A few years have elapsed since the events above mentioned, and Edward Morton still lives, but it is evident to all that his heart has no interest in the things about him. His smile is sadly sweet, his voice soft and low, and his words few, but kind and touching. A very few know the secret of his sadness. The world calls him a mourner, but it knows not that remorse and regret mingle continually in the stream of memory. In the hush of evening, he visits the grave of Jane, and the moonlight and the stars are holy things to him, for her image is brightest and loveliest then. He fancies the winds have caught the spiritual tone of her voice, and bring messages of peace and pardon, and he returns to his home a lonelier but a better man, and more ready for the summons which shall re-unite him with her who was the star of his earthly hope. She disappeared early from his view, only to be re-set with added beauty among the jewels of heaven. Is not intemperance an unpardonable sin?

A Page from the Records of the Ideal.

I SAT at midnight on the rocky shore of the sea. Solemn was the stillness around me, disturbed only by the melancholy murmur of the waves that were continuously breaking upon the rocks at my feet. The moon was in the heavens, and in the sea. Above, her pathway was the unclouded blue; below, it was fretted and twinkling gold.

My thoughts in that hour were wandering from the mysteries of earth to the mysteries of heaven; from the spiritual of this life, to the life which is all spiritual. And I invoked the solemn power within me for an answer to that eternal questioning of the soul—'How much of that which makes our mortal being glorious, shall continue to glorify the Being which is immortal?'

There was a low breathing of music;—breathing, I say; and yet it was less palpable than breath. It seemed like the voice of the motionless air—or like the floating of a spirit which moves in an element of sound. So harmoniously did it mingle with my dreams that scarcely was I aware it belonged less to the inner than to the outer world.

Great God! and has thus the imploring Spirit power over the intelligences of thine immediate kingdom? Can the far reaching Soul overstep the bounds of the finite world, and claim an answer from the ministers who wait around thine own Eternal Being? Yes, yes! 'Before me there, He, the beloved, stood!'

I was not startled, but over my senses I had no power; no power save to gaze and to listen. Yes, it was he! not changed—no, thank God! he wore the same look, he smiled the same smile as when I used to kneel beside him in the impulse of an adoration which knew not whether to linger wholly with him, or to ascend with his pure spirit in its embrace, and like a weary bird, lie down at the feet of God.

He was not changed. How could the beautiful change? It is the corruptible that puts on incorruption; it is the mortal that puts on immortality. Oh never was he such! The beauty of his soul was incorruptible, it could not pass away; the mighty love of his strong spirit was immortal, it could not die!

'Hast thou been true to me, and to thyself?' There was a curdling of bitter grief in my heart as I murmured my reply. 'Have, then, all my sweet communings with thy spirit been but the idle dreams of a deluded heart, and hast thou taken no cognizance of the earnest invocations which have gone up to thee day and night for five long, desolate years—thrice desolate to me now, since they have been unrecognized by thee!'

'Beloved, not unrecognized by me have been thy ceaseless pleadings, not lonely have been thy communings; ever have I been with thee, even when thou wert not with me. I have known and cherished thy faithful love, which has faltered not, nor turned aside, though a thousand voices of earth have tempted it to stray.'

'O what are thousand living loves,
To one that cannot quit the dead!'

I exclaimed, half rising to embrace the form that stood so radiant before me. But though there was no look of repulse, a sense of my own earthliness came over me, and I sank once more upon my seat, happy enough in the consciousness that I was still beloved.

'Hadst thou been as others are,' he continued, 'hadst thou mourned thy love as one made desolate by death, I had left thee to the poor consolation of new ties and new affections. But thou didst not bury thy love; not beneath the cold clod didst thou lay it down to moulder with my clay; no! thou didst lift it unto heaven, and from thence didst call me down to be thy perpetual companion—thy guardian even unto death. Never hast thou doubted that I am with thee, that still I love thee, and thee, Oh dearest one, thee only! Remember this one truth—whatever is perfect and enduring upon earth, shall remain, untouched by death, perfect and enduring unto all eternity. Over the unchangeable the destroying angel has no power; but the love that perisheth in the grave has no resurrection to the joys of the eternal world. Such love has not been thine—and verily thou shalt have thy reward!'

Again was there a breathing of music; and lifting my eyes, I saw no form before or around me. Yet I knew that I was not alone, and when I replied to that beloved one as my spirit dictated and impelled, I felt that I was heard and understood—nay, more,—that I was also answered.

The Yellow Cinquefoil.

THE little yellow cinquefoil,
It groweth everywhere,
Where'er my rambling steps may turn,
It smileth for me there.
I tread the verdant meadows,
I climb the mountain height,
And ever find it blooming
So beautiful and bright.

The little yellow cinquefoil,
It groweth by the door,
And gracefully it creepeth
The verdant hill-side o'er.

It blossoms in the garden walk,
And by the sparkling rill,
And where the forest leaves hang dark,
It blooms in beauty still.

The little yellow cinquefoil,
It bringeth back to me
Remembrance of a sunny hour
Of innocence and glee,
When o'er the stream's blue waters,
We sought a fairy isle,
And there we found the cinquefoil,
So like an angel's smile.

The little yellow cinquefoil,
It groweth by the grave,
Untended by the hand of care,
Its tiny blossoms wave.
It hath a glad and sunny look,
Where else were too much gloom;
And I love to see it springing
Around the silent tomb.

The little yellow cinquefoil,
In truth I love it well,
For ever doth it greet my steps
By wood and mossy dell.
Around the mansion of the rich,
And by the poor man's door,
It groweth in its loveliness
Earth's pleasant places o'er.

The little yellow cinquefoil,
It groweth everywhere,
Where'er my rambling steps may turn,
It smileth on me there.
I tread the verdant meadows,
I climb the mountain height,
And ever find it blooming
So beautiful and bright.

Sympathy.

'A HOLY thing from Heaven.'

WHAT a pleasing emotion is sympathy! What a source of gratification is the reciprocation of this feeling—it is positively necessary to the happiness of a benevolent and refined mind. It is essentially an unselfish sentiment, and one that does honor to our nature. What can better serve to bind man to his fellow man, than the ties of sympathy? The apostle Paul no doubt bore this in mind, when giving the admonition, 'Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep.'

How soothing to the mourner is the tear of sympathy—and next to the blessed consolations of religion, it is felt and appreciated. And how does affliction unite the hearts of those who have suffered in the same manner, for they alone can truly enter into the feelings called forth by trials which they too have experienced.

Our Savior manifested this feeling on several occasions; and touching indeed is the simple recital of his visit to the grave of Lazarus. He knew that he had power given unto him to raise him up again to life, and intended doing so; yet the sight of the tomb, the thoughts of the sufferings he had undergone—the grief of the mourning sisters and friends affected him, and ‘Jesus wept.’

How beneficial it is to visit the house of mourning, sad and solemn though it be. If God in his merciful providence, has not yet permitted our own homes to be made desolate by the angel of death; and if our hearts have not been chilled and cast down by the disappointments and cares of earth, it is well that we should sometimes be brought to turn aside, and consider our latter end—to feel that we too must go to that bourne from which no traveller returns; and be warned to reflect on the instability of all earthly blessings, that we may in some measure be prepared to abide the shock, when we shall also be called to separate from those loved ones who now make life so dear to us.

The feelings that are called forth by a visit to the house of mourning—the contemplation of the work of sickness, suffering, and of death, have a tendency to chasten and refine the heart and affections. And while endeavoring to pour the balm of consolation into the wounded spirit, we are led to consider how we should feel under similar circumstances, and to think how soon death may lay his cold hand on some dear member of our own family circle! And this thought will render us more kind and attentive to our friends, and will occasion us to overlook the little failings to which all are more or less subject; and while we realize how feeble is the tenure by which we hold life’s dearest ties, they become from that very circumstance to be better appreciated, and more dear; and verily, ‘by the sadness of the countenance, the heart is made better.’

Happiness is also increased by sympathy; on all joyous occasions we feel inclined to call our friends around us, that they may partake of our satisfaction. Indeed we are so constituted, that we cannot, if we would, take pleasure in any thing that is not participated by another, excepting the solitary miser counting over his hoards, (and we have always been sceptical as to his enjoyment;) the poet truly says:

‘Joy is an exchange,
Joy flies monopolists; it calls for two;
Rich fruit! heaven planted! never plucked by one.
Needful auxiliars are our friends, to give

To social man true relish of himself.
Full on ourselves descending in a line,
Pleasure’s bright beam is feeble in delight;
Delight intense is taken by rebound,
Reverberated pleasures fire the breast.’

It has often been remarked that deep and lasting friendship has frequently taken place between two persons, whose dispositions, pursuits, and tastes, were perfectly dissimilar; and this may be, but we cannot conceive that their intercourse can be marked by the same degree of pleasure which is experienced by those, whose minds possess a reciprocity, which with electric power, causes each to sympathize with the other in thought and feeling,

‘Like sister flowers of one sweet shade,
With the same breeze that bend.’

Let us suppose that two friends are taking a morning walk together; one an ardent admirer of nature, who feels what a glorious temple we inhabit, made by the hands of God himself, and that every part of it is eloquent of him; the other has not this taste, and when his friend, warmed by the influence of the scene, exclaims in the language of Milton,

‘Sweet is the breath of morn, her rising sweet,
With charm of earliest birds; pleasant the sun,
When first on this delightful land he spreads
His orient beams, on herb, tree, fruit, and flower,
Glist’ning with dew; fragrant the fertile earth
After soft showers;’

will he not feel the want of the sympathy that the mental blindness of the other prevents him from entertaining? And will he not experience a feeling of regret and disappointment, that the love of nature, which is to him a never failing source of enjoyment, should not be shared by the friend at his side?

How pleasing is the reflection to one who takes delight in the great and glorious works of nature, that however our minds may be affected—whether by joy or sorrow, we are never disappointed in seeking for sympathy amid the harmonies of earth! Are we the subjects of deep trials and afflictions? does not the mournful sighing of the midnight wind, the quiet of the dark and shady forest, the pensive murmuring of the mountain stream, and the stars looking down upon us ‘like thoughtful eyes,’ exert a calm and soothing influence upon our agitated spirits? Ay, even the lightning’s flash, and the pealing thunder, we no longer shrink from with solemn awe, for the storm and the tempest speak to us with the eloquence of heaven, and seem to say to our troubled minds, ‘Peace—be still!’

And when we are happy, and look out upon the world with joyful feelings, are they not increased by the cheerfulness that pervades the vast creation around us? The bright sunshine, the merry warblings of the birds, the wild bees' hum, the clear blue sky, the many tinted flowers of the field—all seem to sympathize in our emotions, with the 'perfection of beauty—the joy of the whole earth;' and we feel to lift our hearts in renewed thankfulness to a God of love, who hath made everything beautiful in his time.'

To my Kitty.

KITTY! 'tis said thou canst not reason!
But that, I think, is downright treason,
And malice quite;
For how couldst thou unlatch the door,
Unless thou'd thought it o'er and o'er,
And seen how those who went before,
Got out of sight!

I've seen thee raise thyself erect,
Looking demure, and circumspect,
As any priest;
Then gently place upon the latch,
Thy velvet paw, and from the catch
Remove it with a child's despatch,
To say the least.

They say 'tis instinct, Kitty dear,
Which teaches thee to list and hear,
The slightest sound,
That issues from the hall, where peeps
The little mouse, who slyly creeps
Abroad by night—and never sleeps;
Then on it bound!

And one bright, balmy summer's day,
When all thy kittys were at play,
Too near the well,
I saw thee scamper there, and mew,
And then the deep, deep well would view,
As if their danger well you knew,
And tried to tell.

What reason, Kit! hadst thou to fear,
That if the brink they played too near,
They might be harmed?
Does instinct teach thee how to shun
Each snare and pitfall, and to run,
And plead with others, who've begun
The play, unarmed?

Then—my kind and gentle Kitty!
'Tis a most lamentable pity—
That boasting man,
With all his pride of intellect,
To reason, guide, and to direct,
His fellow creature, and inspect
The gospel plan;

Did not possess thy instinct—Puss!
Nor make so much parade and fuss,
About his mind,
When he neglects its sacred calls,
Nor heeds his neighbor when he falls,
'Mongst thieves, nor breaks the chain that galls
His own man-kind.

And more than all—which proves to me,
That thou canst think—and places thee
Above man's race,
Is—that thou never hast been known
To taste the drunkard's cup—nor own
Among thy kind—e'en one who's shown
The tippler's face.

They basely slandered thee, my Kit!
Who said thou ne'er possessed a bit
Of plainest reason;
Ah! they will blush,—and be ashamed,
And feel each wild assurance tamed,
These truths to read;—and stand arraigned
Of vilest treason. C. W. H.

Scraps from my Desk.

FLOWERS AND THEIR TEACHINGS.

I HAVE been out among the flowers. What a refreshment has my spirit enjoyed therefrom, as the old drink in new life from the breath of the young. May I never cease to bless them as I bless them now; for were the passion I now cherish destroyed, what pages of richest thoughts would be made blank—what images of heaven would be unattractive—what teachers of the beautiful would be mute! Ay, flowers are indeed the smiles of God. At the morning of creation when the green earth lay in its beauty, the angels rejoiced—God smiled—and the flowers sprung up. The angels have loved them for this—poets have idolized them, and the spirit of the infant first rejoices when it greets them. A love for them can never harm. Is it not, therefore, a beautiful love? It nourishes the best affections and truest amiability; and the gentlest of our race have known much of it. Should it be lightly treated of—regarded as effeminate—jested as childish, and left to a few? No. In this world of sin, we are impious when we make a jest of aught that cultivates the sentiment of beauty—that charms the heart away from sordid pursuits, and tends to make man and woman more amiable. 'Flowers will be the first objects greeted in Paradise!' said a dying girl, as she perished in her youthful beauty—the Rose of Affection. What delightful scenes were before her! what an enchanting prospect! How unlike the thoughts of his heart who sees in the future naught but the grave! Let his grave be like his heart—earthy and stony; but O on hers, keep fresh and fair the flowers she loved—let there the daisy and the violet grow—let the rose unfold its beauties, and the fragrant pink breathe its sweetness there. Let the honeysuckle and the jasmine twine around the porch, and weave a garland for the tomb. Hither the birds she loved will come and sing; and as oft as we visit the spot, our hearts will be filled with the beautiful thoughts and pleasant images she would have us cherish. She loved flowers—I will love them better for her sake.

FLOWERS AND THE STARS.

I GIVE what has been long hid from sight—perhaps waiting for the fittest time to come forth. Ask me who wrote these scraps, for I cannot tell you.

'The poets, who have in all ages been the high priests of nature, ministering at her altar, and teaching her votaries her beauteous theology, have, in their love to trace resemblances, likened the stars which shine in the firmament above, to the flowers that bloom on the earth below. This is a fine, but perhaps rather a far-fetched fancy—coming from the head, rather than flowing from the heart. Both departments of creation are well fitted to give birth to deeply serious, but at the same time delightful and hope-sustaining reflections. The same gracious Being who in his exuberant goodness called into existence the fair sisterhood of flowers, "made the stars also;" but, in all ages of the world, flowers have more occupied the attention, and exercised a greater influence over the hearts and feelings and affections of men, than the stars which "shine and shed their light above us." Nor is this to be wondered at; the stars only come forth at night, and begin to shine when men slumber and sleep; but the flowers are with us in our waking hours, rejoicing in the sunshine, and gladdening the eyes of the children of men as they wander over the earth. The stars are very far away, shining with their golden light thousands of miles above our heads; the flowers are near us, blooming at our feet, fair and fragrant, loading the air with their redolence. When we look up to the stars, a feeling of awe mingles with our admiration. We feel as if the eyes of angels were gazing upon us, and we become troubled in their presence. Not so while we look down upon the bright flowers which are blooming around us. They, too, inspire admiration; but it is an admiration mingled with love and affection. We regard them as sweet familiar friends, to whose silent but significant language we have listened with delight, as we sat in the garden-bower, or wandered in green lanes. In such places, the influence of their meek and gentle spirit has sunk into our heart, like the dying fall of evening music, soothing down every unkindly feeling, and diffusing around an atmosphere of purity and repose.'

'Flowers may be safely said to be the sole universal favorites of the human race. Stars seem sometimes too far off—too high up—and, let them shine as sweetly on us as they will, they are felt not to be looking to our world; our sympathies are surely not separated indeed from their smiles—Heaven forbid! But our hearts need the wings of imagination to bear them through the ether; and even from the flight, how glad are they to return to earth! the sinking is 'happier than the soaring; and a small still voice says, "Child of the dust! be contented yet a little while with thine humble home." Not from lack of love speak we so of your blissful beauty! From every gratitude to Him who sprinkled you over infinitude—nor unmindful of us—are we often afraid to gaze on the night skies, in unaccepted worship. With them, in holiest moods, our hearts burn to claim kindred; but a sense profound of alienating sinfulness shuts our light, and the gates of eternity seem closed against us. Then to the lowliness of our spirits, is comfort given from the fair things of this our native earth; and the solitude grows cheerful again around us, as the moonlight shows us a constellation of primroses at our feet. Flowers indeed there are, that come and go with winter. Each season has its own; but through all the varied year the lovely, sweetest to beings who live to die and die to live, is the thought and feeling of the primrose. To "budding, fading, faded flowers, there belongs in every heart a peculiar world of emotions; yet are they all allied by one common spirit. Sadness we call it—or joy—or peace—or trouble; but it springs still from one and the same source—a source dwelling far within the soul, and in some innate power embittering or sweetening for itself its own waters. How they overflow the earth with beauty and happiness! or deaden it into a blank, barren as the grave."'

HERE is a passage from one who has done much to increase the number of Flora's disciples, and whose services in behalf of a better agriculture than known amongst us in the past, entitle him to great respect—Colman.

'In the two great floral kingdoms of nature, the botanical and the human, if we must yield the palm to that which is alike transcendent in the beauty of form and motion, and in the higher attributes of intelligence, innocence and rural perfection, yet it can be no derogation to admire, with a rapture bordering upon enthusiasm, the splendid products of the garden; and especially when their beauties are combined and arranged, as on this occasion, with an exquisite and refined taste. What is the heart made of which can find no sentiment in flowers! In some of the most striking displays of this occasion, in the Dahlias, for example, we see what can be done by human skill and art in educating and training a simple and despised plant scarcely thought worthy of cultivation, to the highest rank of gaiety and glory in the aristocracy of flowers. We may learn from such success a lesson of encouragement in the education and training of flowers of an infinitely higher value and perfection.

The vast creation of God, the centre and source of good, is every where radiant with beauty. From the shell that lies buried at the depths of the ocean to the twinkling star that floats in the more profound depths of the firmament, through all the forms of material and animated existence, beauty, beauty, beauty prevails. In the floral kingdom it appears in an infinite variety, in an unstinted and even a richer profusion than in other departments of nature. While these contributions are thrown out so lavishly at our feet, and a taste for flowers seems almost an instinct of nature, and is one of the most innocent and refined sentiments which we can cultivate, let us indulge and gratify it to the utmost extent, whenever leisure, opportunity, and fortune give us the means. There is no danger of an excess, under those reasonable restrictions, which all our sentiments demand.

"But," says some cynical objector, "flowers are only to please the eye." And why should not the eye be pleased? What sense may be more innocently gratified? They are among the most simple and cheapest luxuries in which we ever indulge.

The taste for flowers every where increasing among us, is an omen for good. Let us adorn our parlors, door-ways, yards and road sides, with trees, and shrubs, and flowers. What a delight do they give to the passer-by? What favorable impressions do they at once excite towards those who cultivate them for their own gratification, and find after all their chief pleasure in the gratification which they afford to others? What an affecting charm, associated as it is with some of the best sentiments of our nature, do they give to the sad dwelling places of the departed and beloved?

HERE is something from one whose life is mostly spent in the political arena. It must have been a pleasant hour when he penned this paragraph, forgetting the strifes of the age and bathing in an element of beauty. He gives an idea of the Useful which deserves to be remembered. Read carefully.

'It is very common with men who think there is nothing rational that is not connected with dollars and cents, to ridicule the study of flowers. "What good can come out of it?" they ask, "will it improve a man's fortune, or increase his stock of useful knowledge? Will it render him a shrewder calculator—will it earn him his bread or make him a fortune?" Grant that it will accomplish none of these useful purposes—it ought to be encouraged—though regarded merely as an amusement, out of which no evils can arise. They are very greatly mistaken who believe that no actual utility, in the common niggardly sense of the term, can be derived from the study of botany—but setting all this aside, we would encourage the study, as tending to fill up many hours of idleness with an interesting and agreeable pursuit. Every new amusement that is discovered which can be participated without any danger to the health or the morals, provides an additional means for the moral improvement of society, inasmuch as it serves to divert many minds from pleasures and entertainments which are liable to be accompanied with vice. Though to a mere plodder in the common business of life, it may seem almost ridiculous, to be engaged with enthusiasm in naming and preserving a few insignificant wild flowers, yet this very zeal may preserve many a youth from corruption and ruin, whose passions might otherwise lead him to seek for amusement in the haunts of dissipation and vice. Every amusement is useful, if it is innocent—since every thing is useful which contributes to one's happiness without bringing with it an equal amount of evil to one's self or others. There are very many pursuits, which are useful in no other way than by contributing to our pleasures. Let plodding misers and conceited sensualists ridicule them, because they neither fill one's coffers, nor spread his tables—we would answer them by saying that the most distinguishing mark between men and brutes is, that the latter pursue only the useful, whilst the former are about equally busied in the pursuit of the fanciful.

ONE more, and I will leave desk, study, and all, for the free air, where the living flowers toss their beautiful heads and dance to the music of the zephyr as it plays with the harp of the trees. I love to be there—it is a fancy ball.

The charming thoughts that are associated with flowers, with their shapes, colors, and fragrance—their poetical uses—their seasons and successions—and all that has been said about them by bookmen and lovers, lie so close at hand, and are so familiar in the aggregate to the world at large, that, like most familiar things, they are generally treated with neglect. People don't care about flowers, because they have them growing luxuriantly under their eyes, and because one crop of blossoms is no sooner wasted in the air than another crop comes out, and because, in fact, do what you will, you cannot exhaust the flowers, which are endowed with a perpetual vitality, and which without any artificial help, even against all sorts of unneighborly difficulties, will grow and grow, and flourish, and throw off their perfumes as if it were designed in the scheme of the creation to show the principle of immortality throughout the minutest works of nature.

But with all our indifference—more apparent than real—every human being loves flowers. Here is a bunch of freshly cropped violets. Not to say one word about their delicate and most exquisite aroma, it is impossible to look into their deep cups without being struck by the image of loveliness, retreating and blushing and trying to hide itself within its darkly brilliant folds, which they present palpably to the imagination. Well, we no sooner get this idea into our heads, than we begin to recollect what has been said about violets—what SHAKESPEARE said about them—what beautiful and passionate pictures have been drawn by poets concerning them—and what loveable spots they nestle in in the poetry of all ages and languages. In a moment of time we are thus carried away into a boundless region of contemplations, and the chances are a hundred to one that, if we have only patience enough to dream out our dream, we shall have traversed a more expanded surface of delightful associations over this little bunch of violets than we should care to do in the noblest library in the world.

Books are great and glorious agents of civilization and happiness. They are the silent teachers of mankind, filling the mind with wisdom, and strengthening the understanding for the strife of action; making us powerful and gentle, wise and humble, at the same time. But we cannot be always buried in our books; we must go out into the sunshine; and it is necessary in order to enjoy our books, that we should also enjoy the privilege of air and light, drinking in health and vigor, to enable us to make the best and most profitable use of our sedentary hours. In direct opposition, then, to books, or rather in secret combination with them, we would place flowers—the out-of-door books Nature has so liberally provided for us in such a rich variety of types and bindings, as to leave no excuse for not gratifying all our individual tastes. The lover of flowers has this advantage over the lover of books, that he can never be at a loss for variety; but we suspect the classification is somewhat arbitrary, and that there is hardly any one who loves the one who does not also love the other. The best way to enjoy either is to enjoy both; to take them alternately, so that they may relieve and show each other off to the best advantage. A walk in an open field, and one hour spent in gathering wild flowers, to be afterwards grouped into a vase upon the library table, is by no means the least suggestive preparation for a morning's reading.

When you say that such a person is very fond of books, you mean that he is a constant student; but you imply no more. He may be fond of profound books or flimsy books; and it is of the last importance that you should be more explicit in your description, if you would have your friend obtain any credit for a taste above the dismal round of the circulating library. But when you say that such a person is fond of flowers, it is impossible to mistake your meaning. There is no room for misconception as to what is meant by a love of flowers. You need not be a floriculturist to be fond of flowers—you need not have any knowledge of botanical names, or vegetable physiology; but it is indispensable that you should have a soul and a heart for beauty and the sensible glories of the green and bounteous earth. To love flowers, is to love nature. What may not the love of nature do for man, when all other avenues to his feelings are blocked up by selfishness, or care, or worldly influences? Let him but cherish this fertile corner in his affections—fertile in hope and goodness—and we need not despair of the darkest natured of our race. He can be reached in this one point of sympathy, when all other appeals have failed. He is vulnerable here, if the rest of his organization be as a sheet of mail.

Hence, flowers occupy a space in the consideration of worldly happiness, much greater than we might suspect at the first blush. They belong to the sunshine and the productive soil—to the light—to the winds—to the pathways, and the banks of the streams—to the skies, whose tints they reflect, and into whose radiant depths they ultimately fade, and above all they belong to us by right of birth and possession, and the loving nurture of our hands and eyes, and our scientific discoveries, which have taught us how to make perpetual summer, and to inspire the roots of sweet flowering things with additional springs of propagation. And these same flowers, which are so beautiful in themselves, so lusty in the fragrance that pours through their delicate leaves, and so fragile to the touch, live where we cannot live, and by means unknown to us. On the loftiest mountains, inaccessible to the foot of man, they leap into the clouds; in the depths of the ocean, where we cannot see them, they blossom and flourish; on naked rocks where there is not a particle of dust to take root in, they burst into bloom, and even amid eternal snows they clamber and work their way into the frosted air, where we find it difficult to sustain life, reproaching us by the hardness with which their slight tendrils sprinkle their buds abroad. There is a river in Russia, the name of which we happen to forget—which in the wintry season is one mass of ice, yet its banks are covered with roses, of which it seems there is a constant succession. All flowers should be to us what these roses are to the icy stream—suggestions of health and beauty, reminiscences of the summer time, and hopeful contrasts between the morbid intervals of life and its vitality. Flowers are always on the sunny side of things, and we too should keep there as much as we can.

Despair and Faith.

BY MRS. SARAH BROUGHTON.

NIGHT brooded on the waters. The black folds
Of autumn's tempest-clouds had skirted o'er
The bright cerulean, and the diamond stars
That here and there peep'd through the opening rifts,
As eddying winds swept on the frowning piles

Of blackening vapor, seem'd like orbs of love,
Faint beaming through the gathering mists of death.
In misery's vale I sat, beside the stream
Of melancholy, where its silent wave
Join'd with the gloomy tide of black despair.
My spirit sank in utter loneliness
And discontent; and murmurings wildly rose
In my crushed heart, for life's best gift had fallen
A prey to death; and blank oblivion's wave
Roll'd darkly o'er the future, where to me,
No ray of hope illum'd the dark expanse.
Suddenly, on the brow of midnight shone
A beam of light divine. The gloomy clouds
Roll'd back their folds of darkness, and a form
Of starry brightness, from the blue serene
Of the eternal heavens came rushing down,
On dazzling pinions of ethereal light.
At her approach the face of nature smil'd,
And murmurings sounds of melody came forth,
From hidden fountains, where the crystal springs
Leap through the pearly grottos, and anon,
Well in the tangled vale, and merrily
Ring their soft silvery chimes to flowery banks,
And gently kiss the rose, that stoops to view
Its damask beauty in the limpid wave.
She gently shook aside the golden plumes
That clustered o'er her brow, and swept the cords
Of her seraphic lyre, till the vast dome
Re-echoed with the heavenly symphony.

Whence are the meteor-flames that blaze
Bright o'er the mental vision,
As if the soul had caught the rays
Of the star-arch'd Elysian?

Whence comes the mighty unseen power
To the war-worn chief, denying
The slumbers of the midnight hour,
By his lonely tent-fire lying?

That bids him seek on vision's car
The ensanguin'd plain of battle,
Where peals the clarion-blast of war,
And the death-drums loudly rattle.

Where the deep mouth'd cannon's lightning-flash
Wakes up the sleeping thunder,
And gleaming sabres fiercely clash,
Till the life-founts burst asunder.

And battle's cloud-wreath'd demon rides
Wild o'er the rolling surges;
And gory carnage fiercely strides
Where Death his war-horse urges.

Till eagle-pinion'd victory lifts
On high her blood-stain'd banner,
And plants her throne on his own lov'd cliffs,
Where the storm's dark pinions fan her.

What power has taught the soul to stray
Through seas of glaring ether?
While the diamond orbs around her play,
And the moon rolls far beneath her.

To climb the bright ethereal road
Up the shining sapphire mountain,
Where stands the emerald throne of God,
Beside the eternal fountain.

The fount of love whose diamond wave
O'er golden sands are gushing,
Where the shining ones their plumage lave
On flaming pinions rushing.

Whence all the radiant orbs that burn
On the high seas of glory?
Go read their mystic lore, and spurn
The atheist's gloomy story.

There is a power on high that reigns,
Enthron'd in dazzling splendor,
And seraphs in their loftiest strains,
Fail to speak forth his grandeur.

That mighty Power hath called to birth
Th' unconquerable spirit;
And though it droop while chain'd to earth,
Yet still it will inherit

Immortal life; where Zion's Dove
High on Salvation's towers
Unfurls the radiant wing of love
O'er all the blissful bowers.

The music ceased: the lingering shades of night
Dispersed before the golden wing of morn.
Aurora flung her crimson banners out,
Whose violet fringes, waving in the smiles
Of day's rejoicing monarch, mirror'd forth
To my enraptured spirit, the glad dawn
Of that eternal morning, when the Son,
(His mediatorial kingdom ended) shall bring forth
His ransom'd jewels from the dark domains
Of gloomy death; when the all-glorious range
Of beatific vision shall disclose
The ever vernal landscapes, the bright streams,
Whose sources never fail; the crystal founts
Of endless love, whose stainless waters gleam
In diamond beauty 'mid the shadowing stems
Of the immortal amaranth, that droops
With its excess of fragrance: like some young
And happy heart, in the glad morn of life
Upon whose inmost cords the Holy Dove
Has breathed with quickening impulse, till the gush
Of overpowering melody, that breathes
Along the spirit-lyre strings, seems a weight
Too much for the imprisoned soul to bear.
My heart grew buoyant at the gladsome sound,
Earth, sky, and river seemed with glory rife;
The woodland songsters tuned their joyous hymn
To heaven's King; my soul in silence bowed,
And owned him King eternal, Lord of all.

The Stranger and the Maiden.

BY MRS. CAROLINE L. HENTZ.

'Twas a festal eve. The lamps sent down their trembling rays, reflected by shining crystals, and wreathing silver, on myriad forms of beauty and grace. The music sent forth the merry gladdening strains, and bounding feet kept time to the joyous melody. Evening shades deepened into midnight gloom without, yet still the gay notes were heard, and the unwearied revellers continued their graceful evolutions.

Just as the clock struck twelve, a stranger entered the banqueting room, and as she passed slowly on unannounced, and unaccompanied by any guide or protector, every eye was turned towards her,

'Who can she be?' whispered a young girl to her partner, drawing close to his side.

He answered not, so intently was he gazing on the figure which now stood in the centre of the hall, looking calmly and unmoveably on those around. Her white robes fell in long and lumberous folds to her feet; her fair shining hair floated back from her face like fleecy clouds, tinged by the moonbeam's radiance, and the still depths of her azure eyes shone with a mysterious, unfathomable lustre.

'Why are ye gathered here?' asked she of the young maiden, who shrunk back as she glided near her with noiseless step. 'What mean these glad strains, and the flowers that decorate your brows?'

The low, thrilling melody of the stranger's voice echoed to the remotest corners of that spacious hall, and the minstrels paused to listen.

'Tis a festal eve,' answered the trembling maiden, 'and we have met in joy and mirth to commemorate the era.'

'Why is this night chosen as a scene of festivity?' asked the sweet-voiced stranger.

'It is Christmas eve,' replied the maiden, 'the bright night of the Savior, and it is our custom to celebrate it with music and dancing.'

'It was once celebrated in ancient days,' said the stranger, 'with a splendor and beauty that would shame the decorations of these walls. While the shepherds of Chaldea were watching their flocks beneath the starry glories of midnight, they heard strains of more than mortal melody gushing around them—rolling above them, the thrilling of invisible harps, accompanied by celestial voices, all breathing one sweet triumphant anthem—"Glory to God in the highest; on earth, peace, and good will to men." While they listened in adoring wonder, one of the stars of heaven glided from its throne and travelling slowly over the depths of ether, held its silver lamp over the manger where slept the babe of Bethlehem. Then the wise men of the east came with their costly offerings, and laid them down at the feet of the infant Redeemer. And where are your gifts?' continued she, turning her still, shining eyes from one to the other of the throng; 'What have you brought this night to lay at your Savior's feet in commemoration of your gratitude and love? Where is your gold, your frankincense and myrrh? Where the gems from the heart's treasury, that ye are ready to sacrifice on the altar of your Lord?'

The young maiden whom she had first addressed, cast one fearful, earnest glance on her gay companions; then unbinding the roses from her brow, the jewels from her neck, and drawing from her fingers each golden ring—'Where is the altar,' she cried, 'that I may place my offering there?'

'Come with me,' said the stranger, 'and I will lead you where you can find more precious gifts than these—gifts that will retain their beauty when the garlands shall wither, and the diamond and fine gold shall become dim.'

The maiden took hold of the stranger's hand, and passed through the hall, which she had so lately entered in vanity and mirth. Her companions pressed around her and impeded her way.

'Oh, stay with us!' they exclaimed, 'and follow not the steps of the stranger: your eyes are dim, your cheeks are pale, shadows are gathering over your face. She may lead you into the chambers of death.'

'Hinder me not,' cried the fair maiden. 'I may not slight the voice that summons me—"Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil."'

A celestial smile beamed on the face of the stranger, as they disappeared from the festal hall. Through the long sweeping shadows of the midnight they glided on, till they came to a wretched hovel through whose shattered casements the night gust was moaning, making most melancholy music. By the dim light of a taper they beheld a pale mother, cradling her wasted infant in her arms, striving to hush its feeble wailings, looking down with hollow eyes on the fearful ravages of famine and disease, then raising them in agony to Heaven, imploring the widow's and orphan's God to have mercy on her.

'Lay down your golden offerings here,' said the stranger, and your Savior will accept the gift. Have we not read that whosoever presenteth a cup of cold water to one of the least of his disciples, in his name, giveth it unto him?'

The maiden wept, as she laid her offering in the widow's emaciated hand. Again the beautiful stranger smiled.

'The tear of pity,' said she, 'is the brightest gem though hast brought.'

She led her forth into darkness once more, and held such sweet and heavenly discourse, that the heart of the maiden melted within her bosom. They came to a dwelling whence strains of solemn music issued, and as the light streamed from the arching windows, it was reflected with ghostly lustre on the marble tomb stones without.

'They breathe forth a requiem for the dead,' said the stranger; and she entered the gate through willows that wept over the path. The music ceased, and the low, deep voice of prayer ascended through the silence of the night. The maiden knelt on the threshold, for she felt that she was not worthy to enter the temple. She hardly dared to lift her trembling eyes to heaven; but bending her forehead to the dust, and clasping her hands on her breast, she exclaimed, 'God be merciful to me a sinner.'

'Thy Savior will accept the offering,' uttered the stranger in her ear; 'the prayer of a broken and contrite spirit is an incense more acceptable to Him, than all the odors of the East.'

'You shall see me again,' said the stranger, when she led the young maiden to her home, by the light of the dawning day; 'you shall see me again, and we will walk together once more—but not among scenes of sorrow and death, for they shall have fled away. Neither will we walk through the shades of midnight, for there will be no night there. There will be no moon nor stars to illuminate the place, "for the glory of God shall lighten it, and the lamb be the light thereof." Farewell—I may not dwell with you, but ye shall come and abide with me, if you continue to walk in the path where I have guided your steps.'

Never more were the steps of that young maiden seen in the halls of mirth, or the paths of sin. She went out among the children of sorrow and want, binding up the wounds of sorrow and relieving the pangs of want. She hung over the death bed of the penitent, and breathed words of hope into the dull ear of despair. Men looked upon her as she passed in her youthful beauty, as an angel visitant, and they blessed her in her wanderings. Her once companions turned aside, shrinking from communion with one whose eyes now spoke a holier language than that of earth. They felt that she was no longer one of them, and speaking of her a little while, she was forgotten by them in the revelries of pleasure. At length she was no longer seen by those who watched for her daily ministration. Her place was vacant in the temple of God. The music of her voice was no longer heard in prayer and praise. On a lowly couch in her own darkened room, that young maiden was reclining. Her face was pallid, and her eyes dim, and her mother was weeping over her. Flowers were strewed over her pillow, whose sweet breath stole lovingly over her faded cheek; and as the curtains of the windows waved in the light breeze, the moonbeams glided in and kissed her wan brow.

The mother heard no step, but she felt the air part near her couch, and looking up, she saw a figure standing in white flowing robes by her daughter's side, with a face of such unearthly sweetness, that she trembled as she gazed upon her.

'Maiden,' said she, 'I have come once more. I told thee we should meet again, and this is the appointed hour. Does thy spirit welcome my coming?'

'My soul has thirsted for thee,' answered the faint voice of the maiden, 'even as the blossom thirsts for the morning dew; but I may not follow thee now, for my feeble feet bear me no longer over the threshold of home.'

'Thy feet shall be as the young roe on the mountain,' answered the white robed stranger—'Thou shalt mount on the wings of the eagle.'

Then bending over the couch and breathing on the cheek of the maiden, its pale hue changed to the whiteness of marble, and the hand which her mother held, turned as cold as an icicle. At the same moment the fold of the stranger's robe floated from her shoulders, and wings of resplendent azure softening into gold, fluttered on the gaze. Divine perfumes filled the atmosphere, and a low, sweet melody, like the silvery murmuring of the distant waters echoed through the chamber. Awe struck and bewildered, the mother turned from the breathless form of her child, to the celestial figure of the stranger, when she saw it gradually fading from her sight, and encircled in its arms there seemed another being of shadowy brightness, with outspread wings and fleecy robes, and soft glorious eyes fixed steadfastly on her till they melted away. The mother bowed herself in adoration and submission, for she knew she had looked on one of those angel messengers who are sent to minister to those who shall be heirs of salvation. She had seen, too, a vision of her daughter's ascending spirit, and she mourned not over the dust she had left behind.

The Victim of Envy.

BY MISS SARAH E. STARR.

WHEN the young, while buoyant and happy, diffusing gladness all around them, and full of rich promise, are snatched by death from loving and admiring friends; how many considerations are apt to arise calculated to excite rebellious feelings in the heart, and make resignation a difficult attainment. We think of the aged who companionless and solitary, are awaiting their summons from a world which charms no longer; of those to whom the weight of physical infirmities has rendered life a burden; and of the corrupted and debased, who are viewed with contempt and abhorrence by all except a few who love on in despair and anguish; and are ready to exclaim why were not some of these taken from the embrace of guilt and misery, and those still left with us in whose absence we are so lonely and desolate? But if early in life bright prospects are suddenly clouded;—if the fury of persecution is poured upon the young and innocent; there is a joy,—a triumph, mingled with our sorrow, when they are removed from the power of the oppressor to an eternal abode of peace and security. If in moments of selfishness the thought that their voice may not again be heard; that their smile may be seen no more, is fraught with bitterness; remembrance of the trouble which came upon them during their short sojourn here, is more than sufficient to reconcile the bereaved to their loss. . . . Maria Horton was the youngest child of a clergyman who resided in a small village in one of the eastern states. He lived to see his offspring one after another, with the exception of Maria, carried to their long home; but soon followed them, leaving his little flock destitute of a shepherd; and his companion in the decline of life with but the one earthly comfort. Mrs. Horton deeply felt her afflictions, but she was a sincere christian, and possessed a well disciplined mind, which together with her affection for her only remaining child, enabled her to appear calm and cheerful. There were some who understood and knew how to appreciate her lofty nature; but many who supposed grief could not exist where there was no boisterous display, called her heartless and unfeeling. Their want of sympathy, however, was fully compensated to her by the kindness of the young pastor who was called to fill the place made vacant by death. He had been the intimate friend at college of one of her sons, which caused her to almost feel as if the lost had been restored.

At this time Maria was about seventeen; and with dark hazel eyes, auburn hair, a delicate complexion, and graceful form; her appearance was extremely prepossessing. She was endowed too with a superior intellect,—that gift so seldom bestowed in connection with personal graces. Though she had left school, her fondness for study was unabated, and Edwin Archer, the young minister, volunteered his services to assist her in the pursuit of knowledge, which were gratefully received. Kept by her own taste as well as the recent decease of her beloved parent, from mixing in gay society,—friendly intercourse with Caroline Linden, a kindred spirit, a few domestic duties, and occasional visits of benevolence, principally occupied the time not devoted to her books. In this manner more than a year passed pleasantly away. Would that peace could have remained longer unmolested in that young breast; but too soon was a new tenant admitted.

The Macy's, an aristocratic family belonging to the village, who had a few years before removed from a neighboring city, determined on giving a large party; and in great condescension as they thought, included Maria Horton among the invited guests. She was somewhat opposed to attending it; but her objections were overruled by her mother, and the invitation was accepted. The evening came, and Louisa Macy, the eldest daughter, who had bestowed all her attention upon external accomplishments, and was distinguished for them above all that gay assembly, received, as she had proudly anticipated, universal admiration. Though much gratified with attracting notice from so many, there was one present, for whose regard she felt particularly anxious. He had been a stranger to her until that occasion; but was invited by her brother, who still transacted business in the city where they once resided, and had there become acquainted with him. Tall and commanding in person, with manners equally removed from the insipid and disgusting airs of the fop, and the unpleasing awkwardness of rustic ignorance, and a cultivated mind, Albert Wells was in truth no ordinary character. He possessed too a large fortune; this, in the opinion of Louisa Macy, was by no means his smallest recommendation. He had directed much of his attention to her for some time, when a low voice of enchanting sweetness fell upon his ear, and turning his eyes to where the sound proceeded from, he saw a young girl attired in a simple white muslin dress, and unadorned except by her own surpassing loveliness. Inwardly wondering that he had not observed her before, and wishing to ascertain whether her mental gifts and acquirements corresponded with her dignified and tranquil style of beauty, he immediately requested of Louisa an introduction. It was granted with as much grace as her mortified feelings would permit, for her quick jealous eyes had not failed to mark the interested gaze which Albert Wells had directed towards Maria Horton. His respectful greeting was returned by Maria with retiring grace, but when she found that he did not commence his conversation with a series of idle and unmeaning compliments, as is too generally the case with gentlemen, her diffidence gradually changed to an engaging frankness. Much as he was at first charmed with her beauty, he was still more so with her intellectual remarks upon whatever subject he started. Delighted with meeting one he thought so well calculated to ensure his happiness for life, he asked and obtained permission to call upon her before leaving the village. From that time Maria was conscious of a newly awakened feeling. Love,—too often the foe of peace—with all its powerful influence, was at work within her breast. From that time, too, Louisa Macy marked her as her victim—the victim of her envy. What was it to that haughty and imperious girl, that Maria had unconsciously interfered with her purpose; that she had frustrated her plan, though it was artlessly and undesigningly done, was sufficient to excite the most fiendish passions of her nature. And as she watched the mutual growth of that affection, the fierce flame raged in her soul with increasing violence. When the hope, with which she would sometimes flatter herself, that some unforeseen circumstance might possibly separate them, was crushed upon learning that a few months after their first acquaintance they had agreed to become united at no distant day, she determined to execute a diabolical intention which had entered her mind.

Let us now go back a short space, and enter the study of Edwin Archer. He is seated before a table covered with books, but they are unheeded, for he is wholly occupied by the consideration of a painful subject. He has long deceived himself with the idea that towards Maria Horton he felt but a brother's affection; but seeing her beloved by another, and loving him in return, has revealed to him the true state of his feelings. The trial is causing him a severe struggle, but he will come off conqueror. That to love her any longer will be vain and even sinful, he feels assured; and as it is denied him, he will check his too ardent regard until he can look upon her as a brother only would. If we commence to pity him, the emotion is soon swallowed up in admiration of his noble spirit. Had Louisa Macy been more like him in disposition, our story would terminate in a more pleasing manner. . . . One morning Albert Wells directed his steps to the Post Office with the expectation of receiving a letter from Maria, and in this he was not disappointed: but another too was handed him, which contained the darkest insinuations with regard to her character. No name was attached to it, neither was there any clue connected with it, by which he could discover the author; but strange as it may seem, it sufficed to poison his mind, and he fancied he could look back upon a chain of circumstances against the innocent girl who loved him so devotedly. Why was she treated with so much coldness by most of the influential families in her native village, and especially that of Louisa Macy? Why did she lead an almost strictly retired life? These, and many other queries, which if ever agitated before, were favorably solved, now served to exaggerate his aroused suspicions, and the letter on which was transcribed the warm sentiments of her heart, was torn in atoms. That it caused him many bitter pangs to think her, he had chosen to tread the path of life by his side, a guilty creature, cannot be doubted; but how differently would the case have affected her, had it been reversed.

‘Fond woman in her constancy,
E’en when the stormiest comes on,
Clings closer to the much loved one:
Nor dreams, till every tie is parted,
That all within is hollow-hearted.’

As there was no way of silencing his doubts except by making direct inquiries into the subject; and that idea he shrunk from as soon as it presented itself, he decided upon writing a letter of separation. It was very brief, merely stating in substance, that circumstances, of which until recently he had no knowledge, must forever present a barrier to their union; and that all intercourse between them must cease. As might be supposed, it was a dreadful shock to Maria, for by no warning whatever, had she been prepared for it. Pride prevented her from soliciting an explanation of that mysterious and cruel communication, and in the presence of no one but her mother and Caroline Lindon, was she ever known to allude to it. Hope would, perhaps, have again dawned upon the mind of Edwin Archer, and the feelings which had long been stifled revived in his heart, had he not beheld manifest tokens that Maria Horton was soon to be claimed by another power. The affair left such scope for her imagination, and pressed so heavily upon her heart, that its blighting effects were not slow in displaying themselves. The redoubled attentions of her mother, Caroline, and Edwin, could not make her forget the past, and she rapidly declined. . . . The same night that death visited the quiet cottage which had been her abode through life, a far different scene was transpiring in a noble mansion at a small distance—the home of Louisa Macy. A brilliant party had again assembled there, and she stood up before them and gave her hand to Albert Wells. The two-fold object, of causing him to think of her rival with aversion, and become her own, was now accomplished; but the gratification it had promised to yield, was wanting.

She knew that Maria Horton was dying, and accused herself with too much truth of being her murderess. She fancied in the midst of all that mirth and revelry, that she could hear her groan; and her guilty and affrighted conscience portrayed features, once faultlessly beautiful, horribly distorted by the agonies of death. Those who were with the wronged and injured one that hour, had the satisfaction of seeing her fall calmly and gently asleep. Albert Wells was not aware that Maria’s last moments were at hand, nor even that she was seriously ill; but notwithstanding that, her image held possession of his mind and deprived him of enjoyment. Fearing his bride might observe his abstraction and divine the cause, he exerted himself to the utmost to appear interested in what was going on around him; but the thought that if no suspicions had ever found way into his bosom, how much happier he would have been with Maria Horton by his side, was constantly present. Had not remorse been so busy in the soul of Louisa Macy, she would perhaps have suspected him of looking back regretfully upon the past; but as it was, she could only think of him in connection with the fearful price he had cost her, and during the continuance of her life she felt unceasingly the gnawings of ‘the worm which dieth not,’ and the raging of that ‘fire which is not quenched.’ Her partner saw that she was wretched and unhappy, and feeling sensible that he had not married her from motives of affection, reproached himself as its cause. He treated her with uniform kindness, but it mitigated not in the least, her misery. At the end of a couple of years she gave birth to a child, which lived but a few hours. Fever and delirium succeeded; and from her wild ravings the knowledge of her guilt was gathered. The horrors of that scene, which were closed by death, it would be impossible fully to depict. Expressions of anguish, and shrieks of despair, loud and shrill, burst from the lips of that miserable woman as visions of the past floated before her disordered gaze. Her whole frame was convulsed by frightful spasms, which increased in violence until they rent asunder the bands of life. After the painful excitement produced by his wife's shocking revelation and its awful accompaniments, had subsided, a settled stupor took possession of the heart-broken Albert Wells. He conducted his business, but in every movement and action appeared more like an automaton than a living being.

In the village where most of the scenes of our story have been laid, may be seen a small, but neat parsonage, the abode of Edwin Archer and his wife, who was once known as Caroline Lindon. After her death in whom they both took so much interest, their friendship ripened into deep and lasting affection; and never were the fortunes of a pair more worthy of each other united. Mrs. Horton resides with them, having been induced to do so by their warmly urged request. She appears as placid and unruffled as ever; looking not upon this world as her home, its trials and changes only operate in increasing the satisfaction with which she reflects upon a bright, unclouded future.

The Grave.

'THE grave is not deep. It is the luminous foot-print of an angel who is seeking us.'

LONGFELLOW.

THE grave is deep. Far—far below
Where mortals tread, and flowerets grow,
Mild zephyrs sigh and wild winds blow,
The loved dead sleep.

The grave's not deep. 'Tis but an inn,
Where we throw off the garb of sin,
E'er Heaven's pearly gates we win,
Our God to meet.

The grave is dark. No cheering ray
From eyes of love, or orb of day,
Can reach where sleeps the pallid clay,
So stiff and stark.

The grave's not dark. The holy light
Of Jesus' feet, hath made it bright,
To safely guide from sin's long night
Our spirit-bark.

The grave is cold. The damps of death
Are gathered there; the frozen breath
Of winter reaches far beneath
The earth's dark mould.

The grave's not cold. The love of God,
Who chasten's all with mercy's rod,
Suffuses e'en the valley's clod,
With warmth untold.

Curiosity.

THE wise man hath said,—'I applied my heart to know, and to search, and to seek out wisdom, and the reason of things, and to know the wickedness of folly, even of foolishness and madness.' This was certainly a good application of the heart in a useful range of knowledge, within the bounds of the Real, so that the mind might have a right understanding of the wickedness of the pursuit of the ways of folly, and of indulgence in those vain and rash excitements which have an effect upon the system akin to madness. Curiosity is the principle here brought into action; and it is the master prompter to laborious investigation, patient research, and unwearied application, that lead on to the most wonderful and beneficent discoveries, familiarizing the mind with the great truths of natural and revealed religion; while in others it causes life to be wasted in visionary projects and mystical speculations, and debases the best powers to that which is utterly useless and vain.

It is well for us to understand this common feeling or principle of our nature.

'It came from heaven—it reigned in Eden's shades—
It roves on earth—and every walk invades;
Childhood and age alike its influence own;
It haunts the beggar's nook, the monarch's throne;
Hangs o'er the cradle, leans above the bier,
Gazed on old Babel's tower—and lingers here.

To all that's lofty, all that's low it turns;
With terror curdles, and with rapture burns;
Now feels a seraph's throb, now, less than man's,
A reptile tortures, and a planet scans;
Now idly joins in life's poor, passing jars,
Now shakes creation off, and soars beyond the stars.

Yes, thro' life's stages may we mark the power
That masters man in every changing hour;
It tempts him from the blandishments of home,
Mountains to climb, and frozen seas to roam;
By air blown bubbles buoyed, it bids him rise,
And hang an atom in the vaulted skies;
Lured by its charm, he sits and learns to trace
The midnight wanderings of the orbs of space;
Boldly he knocks at wisdom's inmost gate,
With nature counsels, and communes with fate;
Below, above, o'er all he dares to rove,
In all finds God, and finds that God all love.'

That curiosity lives in us as an active intelligence

we know—we are controlled by its influence every hour, and its power is oftentimes irresistible, and lessens in no small degree the freedom of the will. We talk much of curiosity, but, in general, its real and important office in our mental being is but little understood, and we are apt to speak of it as among the minor and lower propensities of the intellect. Far otherwise is it. And we are led to this unjust estimation by forgetting that the noblest virtues, and the most degrading vices, spring from the same passions differently directed, and that all our passions are needed and useful in the wise constitution of our being, but may be perverted or too strongly excited so as to produce evil. Take for instance the love of excitement. This in some character or other is common to man, but how differently is it directed! It is gratified by the sweet feeling of delight that comes over the soul in the contemplation of the beautiful in nature, or while hearing a welcome strain of music, or gazing on a lovely picture, or reading an interesting book, or listening to the eloquence of the orator; others find its gratification in mere animal sensations and delight, seeming never to raise them to the dignity of a religious being; and while in the dreams of poetic fancy, or the opening truths of philosophical research, or the raptures of devotion, some find the needed and satisfying excitement, others find it in the intoxicating potion, in the race and the fight, or the enchantments of gaming. All lasting reformation of character must result from the different direction of this common feeling, for it must be gratified in one way or another; give men the gratification of elevated feeling, intellectual enjoyment, and religious affections, and they will not desire or have aught to do with the excitement of 'the flowing bowl.' The temperance reform owes more of all the true success it has obtained to the increased and general love for the lecture room and the lyceum than to any thing else. The whole of religion is the right direction and action of the passions, feelings, and affections, common to our nature; and the whole of sin is the wrong direction and action of the same. If men knew and realized this, they would have a clear and rational idea of the religious character, of regeneration, and of individual duty; and would understand how much is meant in the declaration—'Lo, this only have I found, that God hath made man upright; but they have sought out many inventions.'

Here is presented direct and in full the influence of the perversion of curiosity—the guide to inventions; as here all man's corruption and degradation is traced to the inventions sought out to pervert and overact the passions, feelings, and affections. With this effect of curiosity we are all well acquainted; we have suffered from it, and it will indeed be a blessed thing when men shall be curious only for that which is good. And this is the right direction of this principle, and thus directed it has wrought wonders. Indeed its effects are so astonishing that we are apt to imagine individuals endowed with supernatural gifts, when we discover what stores of knowledge they gathered, what discoveries they made, and how much they have led on the march of mind. Had Sir Francis Bacon been curious only to philosophize after the manner of his time, would he ever have given to the world the system that made him the reformer of philosophy, and that established the true principles of study and investigation? No. Scholastic subtilties, and visionary speculations would still have reigned, causing men to be ever learning, but never able to come to the knowledge of the truth.

The same idea may be applied to all the wonderful changes in the application of the sciences, and in the opinions concerning the laws and influences in nature. Wherever we look, we discover the mighty power of curiosity, leading to searching and seeking in the hidden depths of knowledge, that wisdom may be discovered, and the reason of things understood. It is great with every one, acting according to the bent of the mind, and good, or hurtful, according to the feelings and passions associated with it—the motives by which it acts and the purpose that controls it. I care not how curious men are if they will only reflect sufficiently—if they will give reason her rightful sway, and remember that imagination may give such hues to folly as to make her appear like wisdom. Pointedly and profoundly hath it been said—'By the vulgar I do not mean the mere mob, but men of every class who reflect but little.' An admirable definition, but not always honored. The poor and depressed have too much been termed the vulgar, but often among them has arisen the mighty reformer, and by the efforts of profound reflection in the retreat of obscurity, he has been made able to come forth to baffle the exalted and great.

In reference to religion in particular what an instructive application has our subject! God hath made us to be curious in respect to religious things, in implanting in us the principle of faith and the aspirations after a holier and happier state. It matters not, we here repeat, how curious men are, if they will reflect sufficiently: Here is the trouble, they will not as they should, reflect; curious to hear and to plunge into strange speculations, they rush on without any due preparation of mind to reason carefully, and control the imagination and their excitability, and before they are aware of a change approaching them, they are confused, perplexed, alarmed, converted. Here is the cause of the strange scenes, and the wonderful metamorphoses, that occur in the protracted meetings of excited religionists. Persons are curious to see and hear; they go without any careful preparation to judge things calmly and correctly; then enter the theatre—they are pleased by the fantasies—soon something attracts their attention differently—they become more serious—fears are awakened by imagination made vivid, and they at length declare themselves converts. Sober sense and profound reflection have had but little, if any thing, to do with all this. How could they? The dominion of sober sense and reflection is not felt or acknowledged amid strange excitements and appeals to the feelings—to man's love of happiness and dread of suffering. The whole of the strange conversion was the result of throwing one's self amid excitement with unguarded feelings and without due thought concerning the office of reason and reflection.

The effects of curiosity as connected with the religious excitements, for which our age will be noted in history, are indeed often ludicrous, but never strange to a philosophical mind. And in respect to religious and moral truths how perverted and abused is the principle of curiosity! How few are there in this community who apply their hearts suitably to understand the laws of nature, to trace out the causes of the phenomena connected with the revolution of the seasons, and become acquainted with the organic laws of their own being, upon obedience to which physical health and happiness depend,—how few are there of such compared with the number of those who are troubling themselves by being curious about the end of the world? And how few of these thus troubled realize, solemnly and truly, that the world may end to them much before the time predicted for its dissolution? Yea, mathematical calculations, founded on suppositions, attract more attention than the simple, but infinitely more important, rules of every day duty. Novelty, novelty, is the order of the day, and did not necessity compel them to industry, there are many who would, like the Athenians, spend their time in nothing else, but to tell or to hear some new thing. Happy is it for themselves, their friends, and society, that they are not able thus to imitate the speculating Athenians. And it is a fact, not generally known, that the great leader of the new measures revivalists vindicates his procedures on the ground of the necessity of gratifying the common love of novelty; as thus we read in Finney's Sermons on Revivals—'When a measure has novelty enough to secure attention to the truth, no other new measures should be introduced. You have secured the great object, novelty. And the more sparing we are of our new things, the longer we can use them. By a wise course, this may undoubtedly be done for a long series of years, until our present measures have sufficient novelty in them again to attract and fix public attention. And so we shall never want for something new.' May we but consider such language as to scorn to apply the policy it dictates, and which makes religious institutions and ordinances but means to attract the love of novelty, and consequently dooms them to nothingness so soon as their novelty has passed away. And when they are discovered to be but like the new scenery and dresses that call attention to an old play to be performed in the theatre, will reflection be satisfied? or will not a reaction take place, and the attention pass away with the novelty that attracted for the time? 'A spasmodic religion' is not the religion of the heart, baptized in the waters of truth and love, and which makes the most powerful curiosity of the mind to be—to know Christ and how to follow him. Such a religion is not born in the soul by the artificial heat of periodical excitement, but is there created by due attention to the Savior's directions—'Search the Scriptures.' 'Why even of yourselves judge ye not what is right?' 'Come unto me ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' Noble indeed is that curiosity that is inquiring after Christ in the way of his appointment, and that, spiritually, searches for him, as did, literally, his parents when he was first lost to them.

Let us then remember, that as in other things, so in religion, there is a right and wrong curiosity. One person is curious to know why God has not revealed more; another is curious to know what he has revealed. One confines his curiosity to speculations concerning the Unity or Trinity of God; another seeks rather to know the perfections and character of the Deity. One would define the true nature—the divinity or humanity—of Christ; another seeks to know the relations that exist between Christ and him, what he has been, is, and will be to him by the ordinations of the Almighty. One is ever inquiring whether or not all punishment is confined to this life or extended into the future; another seeks to make the right application of the sureness of a righteous retribution for evil done. One speculates and dwells on the question whether the resurrection is immediately after death to each, or at a future distant time to all; another seeks to strengthen his confidence in the truth of a glorious life immortal, leaving the times and seasons with the Father.

Which of these we should imitate, is very easily seen, for that curiosity is the best which is associated with inquiries that tend to increase our acquaintance with the character of God, the principles of his government, the aims of life, and the hopes of the soul for an existence eternal and glorious. While there is enough of the useful and happyfying to engage our curious thoughts, we can afford to withdraw our curiosity from that which is idle and vain; and reason dictates the propriety of keeping a proper balance of mind, so that we do not run mad after one peculiar speculation, or give up all our thoughts to one subject, but justly divide our attention so as to give play to the various faculties of our being, and be temperate in all things.

But above all subjects in importance and practical utility in a religious point of view, is the character of the all ruling God. Here we may justly be greatly curious—here we may apply our heart to know, and to search, and to seek out, with profit—here we may linger as engaged in a work worthy the employment of the noblest energies of the loftiest mind. To know God aright is the sum of natural religion—the first and grand and inductive principle of revealed religion. Men do not understand this fact as they should. They cause the articles of a creed to shape their idea of God, instead of making the true idea of God shape the articles of their creed; and thus they go on familiar with a creed and its relations, but ignorant of God and the great purposes of his will. The Apostles understood this, and the knowledge of God was the great want with man in their sight, and hence the warfare in which they were engaged was against every high thing that exalted itself above the knowledge of God. And this is the christian warfare now. Many are the high things thus exalted which hide from the mind the true knowledge of God and make it worship it knows not what. To how many in the professed christian world has the preaching of the unknown God yet to be made, for the Father is as yet to them unknown—he is not seen in the beauty of his paternity and universal love, swaying a sceptre of righteousness and equality, and leading on the course of events to a consummation glorious as he is powerful, perfect as he is wise, and universal in blessings as he is good. Let 'God is Love,' be written as the eternal truth concerning the Deity's character—felt to be such, and as such associated with all investigations of the scriptures, and it is as impossible that the doctrine of endless sin and misery should be believed, as it is that a mind receiving fully the truth of the revolution of our earth, should cherish faith in the doctrine of the dark ages maintaining the coursing of the sun. And while that holy truth is recorded in our sacred book, the hope of man may be ever strong in the ultimate universal prevalence of the faith of the Restitution.

The Sea Shore.

'Tis now the hot noon of a summer's day.
Alone I sit upon a pebbly beach,
Beneath the shadow of a giant cliff,
And gaze upon the unbounded sea.
No living thing is moving on its surface,
Not e'en a whitened sail, or island green,
Breaks the smooth line of the horizon.
The ocean seems asleep: its bosom heaves
Like a warrior's when he slumbers
With his armor on—glistening in the sun.
No other signs of life the eye beholds,—
Save here and there a weary cloud moves languid
O'er the blue arch above, like an angel
Longing to drop upon the cooling waves,
But dares not leave its native heaven, unless
To do some deed of mercy in this world.

Hark! there are sounds in this lone retreat:
Sounds of the grandest music. It is made
By the ever rolling waves along the shore,
E'en in the calmest and the stillest day—
Such as now is smiling on the world,
When not a breath of air is moving
On the ocean's breast, or sighing o'er the land,
The gentle roll of waters on the shore,
Steals o'er the soul with soothing melody.

In this sweet spot, on such a day as this,
I love to lie upon the smooth, hard beach,
And see the waves chase one another on,
And hear them sing their sounding requiem,
How beautiful they break against the rocks,
Then die retreating on the pebbly shore!

This is the place and scene for holy thought—
For high and heavenly aspirations.
The soul is here unbound from worldly cares.
How it springs from the trifling things of time
To hold communion with the works of God,
And thinks this world of little worth, unless
It be the entrance to another.

A whole Family in Heaven.

MAN by nature is a being of sympathy. He is not content with being free from misery himself, but he wants others to be free! he is not satisfied with being delivered from the curse of slavery himself, but he wants others delivered; he is not content to be saved from intemperance himself, but he wants others saved. Nor can his happiness be perfected until his wants are satisfied. They are the wants of the inner man; and are therefore parts of that holier existence which is to survive the death of the body, and never can it feel fully satisfied and perfectly at peace, while there is an individual being suffering under the curse of intemperance, under the curse of slavery, under the curse of sin, and its knowledge of that suffering remains. It, therefore, is a cheering circumstance to the philanthropist, to hear of the delivery of even one soul from bondage and death; and to the christian, to hear that one has turned from the error of his ways, and embraced the Savior.

Nor is this feeling of the social and religious nature of man, to be deprecated or condemned as anything improper or unworthy of our regard. Jesus, the man of God who knew no sin, wept;—he wept at the grave of a friend;—he wept with those who wept, and the Jews said, 'Behold how he loved!' He wept over Jerusalem and in prospect of the dreadful overthrow that was soon to come upon it. This was the tear of sympathy; and it cannot be wrong to feel as Jesus felt, or weep as he wept. It is far from being unbecoming in us to imitate such an example.

And this feeling is not confined to this world, nor to man in the days of his flesh. Saith him of the golden mouth, 'Likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons who need no repentance.' And again, 'Likewise I say unto you, There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth.' It is cheering, therefore, not only to us, but to the angels of light and glory, to hear that even one sinner has returned to God. This feeling then is a noble feeling; it is a lofty virtue; it is not to be stifled or set bounds to, but to be cultivated as one of the divinest of feelings. Man, then, is not an independent, separate and abstract essence. He never was designed to enjoy earth exclusively, or occupy heaven alone. He has sympathies, social, moral and religious; and by these sympathies his happiness is intimately,—nay, inseparably connected with the happiness of those around him. His kindred first, his friends next, and the world next. But in none of its manifold varieties is this feeling held to be more sacred or hallowed than when it assumes the character of a kindred tie, and becomes a family bond. Hence it is in this sense that we are now to view it, and in this light we are to contemplate it in this connection. The human sympathies belonging to man's nobler nature, we have seen, do not permit him to be a cold and indifferent spectator of the world, but constitute him a relative being whose happiness depends in a great measure upon those around him. These feelings in their most sanctified and hallowed form, lead to alliances of the affections, and these become the foundation of families. Here the social sympathies assume a kindred form, and become sanctified and hallowed by nearness of blood. This is the most perfect view we can have of the social sympathies: and if they are founded as they must be to be rendered perfect, in deep religious feeling and vital piety, they constitute the highest sense we can have of earthly bliss and perfect peace. There is not a more beautiful sight on earth, than that presented by a family unbroken, all united in love, sitting together amid each other's smiles, confiding in one another's hearts, believing one religion and worshiping one God. A father and mother, parents and children, brothers and sisters, faithful to their God and one another, breathing the same prayer morning and evening, and with one heart and with one mind, praising the Lord in the beauty of holiness. O it is a delightful sight; it is a heaven in miniature; a very paradise on earth.

But let that family be broken:—let one be taken from it, and their happiness is no longer unalloyed. Is one gone? They anxiously await his return. Does one become a prodigal? There is joy when he returns. Is there no prospect of his returning? That is a little heaven on earth no longer. Is he in misery? They weep. Does he finally return, saying, 'Father, I have sinned?' The fatted calf is killed, and there is no elder brother to murmur; but that family is again happy:—it is again a heaven in miniature. But one dies. Perhaps it is a little one; perhaps it is the aged sire; perhaps the mother is taken; perhaps a brother or sister is left a lonely one. Religion now alone can give peace. Is there hope? Is the father sure that his partner has gone home to glory? Is the mother sure that her little one is safe in the arms of Jesus? Is that brother or that lonely sister sure of meeting a whole family in heaven? and would heaven be heaven to him or her without? At such a time, a faint hope that it may be so, will not satisfy. This cannot speak peace. There must be assurance at such a time. And it is laid down as clear, that nothing but a firm and unyielding faith that every one of that family are to dwell in glory, can satisfy that lonely one. [I now have in my mind a soul that can testify to the truth of this!] But farther nothing short of the fruition of such a faith and the salvation of every individual member of that family, can perfect the happiness of one individual thereof.

Christianity as we understand it, gives this assurance; and it does it in no uncertain language. Before a family is broken, it gives them the pleasing assurance that every individual thereof is going to heaven:—that not one shall be wanting. And this assurance makes them happy. It is therefore good to live by. When the family is about to be broken by the death of one, it assures the dying one that the weeping ones around him, whom he loves, are to meet him in heaven;—that not one shall be lost. And this assurance makes death sweet, and heaven a home. It is therefore good to die by. And it says to the mourning ones, 'Mourn not, thy friend is not dead, but sleepeth;' 'he is gone, but not lost:' therefore mourn not, ye shall meet him again in the skies, and in a better land. It is therefore comforting to the mourning and soothing to the sorrowing. The poet Burns, one of nature's sweetest singers, staying with such a family as that we have been speaking, over night, left the following lines in the room where he slept:

'O thou dread Power, who reign'st above,
I know thou wilt me hear;
When for this scene of peace and love,
I make my prayer sincere.

The hoary sire—the mortal stroke
Long, long be pleased to spare!
To bless his little filial flock,
And show what good men are.

She, who her lovely offspring eyes,
With tender hopes and fears,
O bless her with a mother's joys,
But spare a mother's tears!

Their hope, their stay, their darling youth,
In manhood's dawning blush;
Bless him thou God of love and truth,
Up to a parent's wish!

The beauteous, seraph sister-band,
With earnest tears I pray,
Thou know'st the snares on every hand,
Guide thou their steps away:

When soon or late they reach that coast,
O'er life's rough ocean driven,
May they rejoice, no wanderer lost,
A FAMILY IN HEAVEN!

Yet all this is but a heaven in miniature. It is only an emblem of 'the good, the beautiful, and the true.' An unbroken family on earth, with nothing but love to unite them, is only a figure of that heaven which is above. Carry it out in its highest sense. God is the Father of the spirits of all flesh. All mankind are brethren. Heaven is the home of all men. Stop not at the ninety and ninth, but seek till you find the hundredth.

What a delightful thought! What a glorious hope! What a cheering prospect! How happy does such a faith make man! This is that religion which contains all that good men desire, promises a realization of their fondest and best hopes, goes hand in hand with the most enlarged philanthropy, and insures a consummation of all the holiest, and best, and most elevated and ennobling of man's sympathies and angel's perfections. 'Herein do I rejoice with a serene eternal peace.'

The Fruit of the Spirit;

OR, THE CHRISTIAN GRACES.

CHAPTER IX. MEEKNESS.

'MEEKNESS as a natural temper, sinks into meanness and servility; but when, as an acquired temper, built upon principle, and moulded into a habit of the mind, it is the grand distinctive characteristic of the religion we profess.'

THE scorching sun of a midsummer's day, that since early dawn had been playing among the roses, prying into the depths of the purple bell, and dancing on the glistening leaves of the vine that enriched the piazza of Mrs. Courtney's beautiful dwelling,—had, at last, withdrawn its beams to bestow them on less fairy-like scenes, when her daughter Emily, with her gay young visitors, who had shrank from its scorching gaze on their soft, delicate complexions, bade it farewell with joy, as they now sought the cool and shaded retreat. They were a light hearted and thoughtless band; and the eye could not but gaze in admiration on the smooth fair brows and beaming eyes unmarked by a line, and undimmed by a shadow of the world's care or sorrow; and as it watched the busy fingers weaving, in gay colors, the beautiful design, or forming with the bright needle some tasteful article of apparel, occasionally pausing in their employments to turn the leaves or read aloud from the gilded volumes, or to give freer reign to the mind's beautiful fancies, it could not but convey to the imagination, images of light and loveliness untarnished by contact with the rude and discordant world. But alas! while yet the eye gazed, the ear caught some strains that caused the observer to take his vision from what were deemed regions of purity, and direct it again to the soiled flower on the dry sod of the beaten path; for ah! like those dim objects of earth, is the young heart which cannot receive the heavenly dews of love and benevolence, ere the dust of earthly pride, vanity and prejudice, gathers around it. The view from their beautiful retreat was one of exceeding quiet and loveliness; and some of their number, as they gazed upon it, were not unmindful of the heavenly vision, as they received into their heart the calm serenity of a scene, that to the care-worn and afflicted seemed 'fashioned for a happier world.' Far in the distance lay a neighboring village with its white dwellings embosomed in foliage, and its tall spires towering to heaven—glistening and sparkling in the sunlight, seeming bright pyramids of stars. Rich orchards and cultivated farms sloped down toward a noble river, which seemed to have paused in its onward course to dally with the bended boughs and nodding flowers, while it stole a reflection of their grace and beauty to give loveliness to its own pure bosom. All the rich hues of the summer clouds too, were mirrored there—and the sunlight danced and glittered on its surface and lighted it up as it wandered far in the distance, until it became as 'A line of silver mid a fringe of green.'

Nearer them wound the village road, following the course of the river, while directly opposite on the beautiful sloping banks were situated many of the quiet dwellings of their neighbors. To be sure the architecture and aspects of the dwellings varied, for there was a row of noble buildings to the right, while to the left many were seen embrowned and decayed by time, but none were destitute of graceful trees and smooth verdant lawns.

Why should many of the young friends of Emily Courtney, who could look abroad on all this magnificence and beauty with hearts at ease, remain so unmoved and regardless? Alas, their mind's near-sightedness could not carry their vision beyond the line of the village road; and to the objects that passed to and fro there, was their whole attention directed; and not the most charitable and christian-like were many of their observations on the frequent passers by. One was dressed too meanly—another too gaily. One was all the time gadding, another had just found time to crawl out. One walked too proudly, another too languidly. These criticisms, with various remarks on the business and characters of the individuals, employed most of the time, until a young lady, neatly attired in a plain black dress, with a trim cottage tied closely round her interesting face with a simple ribbon, advanced, and raising her sedate but cheerful looking face to the group, smiled, bowed, and passed on.

Emily, and the young friend nearest her, looked thoughtfully as she passed, while significant glances were exchanged by some of the other ladies.

'I declare, Amanda!' exclaimed Harriet Manly, who had watched the lady eagerly; 'Mrs. Chalmers has gone into that old black house again! is it not the third or fourth time we have seen her this week?'

'Why, yes,' was the answer, 'she will lose all her former friends soon, if she continues long in this course. Here she has pleaded positive engagements in her family, as an excuse for neglecting to call on the Knapp's, the Hartley's and Burnham's, and this week she has passed repeatedly their dwellings, on her way to that low family.'

'Well, it's her own fault if she does lose them,' returned Harriet; 'for if she does not respect herself, no one else will respect her. That's what I've been taught ever since I learned my alphabet. And I'm determined to move always in the most genteel and respectable society,' she added, bowing gracefully to her laughing companions.

'Only think,' says another voice, 'what advantages Mrs. Chalmers has had for becoming the most accomplished and fashionable lady in town! You know her father was very rich, and after that spendthrift son became an outcast, he lavished every indulgence upon Caroline, as his favorite. But what did it all profit her? You know she rejected many high offers which would have brought her to stations where her accomplishments would have brilliantly shone, and chose after all to become the humble wife of that obscure young clergyman, who had nothing to recommend him but clear voice and brains.'

'I don't know,' again ejaculated Harriet, 'as he has even those qualities to recommend him, for I have never set my foot on the threshold of his little rusty looking chapel, which none but the poor and low frequent. However, I should think Mrs. Chalmers, if she adopted the right method, might advance his popularity a little, for some do pretend to say he has talent of a superior order; but in the place of seeking for him the patronage of many of her wealthy friends, she devotes the most of her leisure hours to the humblest of his humble parishioners. Apropos, old stupid Kent's family.'

'Did you notice how meanly she was dressed?' said another maiden as she played with the golden key suspended on her costly chain. 'I don't believe that even a Betty in her father's family ever appeared in the street with less ornament, or a more simple hat or dress. And that is not all—'

'But enough—I pray you!' tearfully exclaimed Emily Courtney, who had waited, in breathless anxiety for the conclusion of the idle chat; for she had seen at the nearest window the form of her elder sister, and she felt how truly her noble heart would grieve, when she overheard, as certainly she must, the foolish remarks of her young friends on one whom she knew Sophia regarded with almost veneration. A nearer observer might have seen the emotion that had played over that sister's intellectual face during the conversation—the shudder of deep feeling when the light allusion to the brother was made—the glance of indignation at the mean estimate of the worth of her friend's accomplishments in her present situation—and a smile of bitterness at the weak remarks on her dress. But they all passed and left nought but a tear of pity to tremble in her dark eyes, as she arose from her seat and joined the company without.

Some of them started in amazement when they discovered that the high-souled and dignified Sophia had been a listener to their thoughtless chat. She perceived their surprise, and looking around upon them, said with a tone of deep emotion, 'My young friends! I could not so readily forgive you the injustice you have done my dearest friend, if I in the least imagined you were at all sensible of her inestimable qualities, or the high motives which prompts her present course. Mrs. Chalmers is the same refined, affectionate, and graceful Caroline, that was once the life and charm of our gay assemblies; but circumstances called her to fill a different sphere, and she obeys its simplest duty.'

'Well, Miss Courtney,' said the undaunted Harriet, 'I should like to know what called her? I never could conceive what did—but all at once she seemed seized with a sudden passion to visit among the destitute, the oppressed, and even the vicious. Why, don't you think, Miss Courtney, not long since she was visiting her rich aunt in company with my sister. After tea a walk was proposed. When they were quite a distance from home, there came on a violent shower, and they were obliged to seek shelter in one of those miserable hovels on the hill. The ladies would not, of course, you know, go into the dark, filthy rooms, but preferred to stand in the old porch; yet Mrs. Chalmers went in and sat down, questioned the inmates, who stood gaping at her, as to their situation, and took up a little dirty, ragged child in her arms—parted its matted hair from its forehead, and declared that its eyes—which my sister said shone like glass buttons through all that dirt—were the most lovely she ever beheld. And don't you think, the very next Sabbath, we saw the identical child with her mother passing our house dressed in clean clothes for church. I should not wonder if they sat in Mrs. Chalmers' pew.'

'Harriet,' said Miss Courtney, 'your woman's heart should be moved to pity, not indignation, by that instance of Mrs. Chalmers' meekness. Do you not see what effect your recital has had on your young friend?'

'Why Emily, Julia, and even Amanda!' said Harriet, looking around on the tearful group. 'What in the world did I say, that should affect you so?'

'Harriet, will you listen to me? perhaps I may excite one throb of sympathy in your heart, by disclosing to you the secret of Mrs. Chalmers' thoughtful and meek spirit.'

As Sophia invited their attention to a recital, it was pleasant to see the willingness manifested by the group to listen to her, though she was about to set forth Meekness—a grace too much slighted, and too often coupled with the inactivity of those who have no energy of character, and who are constitutionally placid. Meekness as a grace is an acquired characteristic, and much energy must be called forth, ere many who now have it not, can possess it—ere all Emily's friends will be of the meek.

With a calm and sweet expression of countenance, Sophia began:—'Caroline was once as gay, careless, and fond of the world's gear and glitter as you; but deep, far down in her innermost heart, was a mine of the purest and holiest affection, which, perhaps, a smooth, quiet, and untroubled life would have failed to open. But it was early penetrated by a severe infliction, and the treasures which from it have sprung to bless and cheer the cast down and sorrowing, wherever they may be, have caused many to bow in deeper devotion and gratitude to that Father who wounds but to heal. She and her brother were the younger children you know of a wealthy parent. Early in life they were deprived of their mother, and Caroline was left to the charge of her elder sisters. They all loved her tenderly, but the deep affection she would have bestowed on a mother, seemed granted to her brother Edgar. No little care or trouble of her younger days was wept over in secret,—there were no tasks that she struggled through alone,—no pleasure that she enjoyed privately, for her fond young heart knew where was the one ever ready to participate with her. And then as years advanced—O you that have kind, noble brothers, know the joys their intercourse must have granted them—he was her protector and counsellor—she the true, gentle friend.

Their sweet intercourse was first broken by his removal to college; and the young Caroline, who had never doubted his infallibility, thought and prayed only that he might return and find her all he wished. Bright were the pictures her fancy wove of her noble young brother, leaving his seclusion in future years, crowned with the laurels of success, and going abroad with a firm manly purpose to enlighten and purify his fellow beings.

All of his vacations were passed with his sister, and her bright young dreams were pictured to him. At first they found a ready response; soon they were unheeded, then laughed at, while he carelessly patted her cheek, and called her a silly, ignorant girl. After a season he found no time for intercourse with her, but his days of recreation were devoted to excursions abroad, with the companions he had brought with him from college. Caroline searched within her own heart for the change, fearing she had not cultivated her mind aright to become his companion, and more earnestly did she strive to fit herself for intercourse with his, as she thought, nobler mind.

Alas! she knew not that in that secluded and far off retreat—his college home, foul sin and crime could lurk. She knew not that even there the false prophet with his glittering veil could enter, and by his vain attractions lure many of the yielding and unsuspecting ere he threw aside the sheen and displayed his hideous aspect. Poor, unfortunate Edgar! his trusting and yielding heart soon became a prey to some hardened and heedless villains, and the frequent allurements of the poisonous bowl and the billiard table stealthily offered him, unnerved him for his duties, and heated his brain for more daring and ruthless adventures.

Report at last came to the ears of his family. They entreated and remonstrated, but all to no purpose. While in their presence, his natural tenderness of heart would yield, and he would promise reform; but the serpent's coil was around his heart too tightly, and its fascinating eyes lured him beyond the light of home, and heedlessly he abandoned himself to its wiles, and was lost! Offence upon offence was committed at college, and upon his young and careless head fell all the sin of the more crafty and cautious. He was expelled as unworthy, and came again to his home. Ah! how different was his return from what his proud friends had anticipated! His old father for years had looked upon him as and when he beheld his degradation he looked on him with bitterness and reproach, while he told him of his withered, wasted hopes. His sisters feeling that all their entreaties had been disregarded, almost spurned him from their presence, as a disgrace to their noble house. For days he would wander from his home, and return not until impelled by necessity. His wants were coldly and mechanically attended to; and so carefully had he been nurtured that he knew not as yet how to dispense with many services it was difficult to obtain. Caroline alone, amidst all his degradation and estrangement, looked tenderly upon him, spoke kindly to him, and was ever ready to do what she could for his comfort.

Often when with his brain heated and bewildered he had thrown himself on the couch that one careful friend had smoothed for him, he would awake from his stupor with a soft hand bathing tenderly his fevered brow, while low but fervent prayers were breathed to heaven for his relief and reformation. Sometimes the anguish of remorse would come, and he would rise from his couch and throwing his arms around that young creature's neck, he would weep bitter tears of penitence, and promise amendment. His proud spirit would not brook the scornful and indignant glances of his friends, nor would he kneel to them for pardon, and he at last formed the resolve of quitting them forever.

The eve before his departure he stole into Caroline's room, and looking over her shoulder, found her intently reading her little bible that he had given her in their hours of happiness. Thoughts of his young, innocent days came to him, and he laid his head upon her bosom and wept like a child. 'Caroline, pray for me, a hardened wretch!' he sobbed. 'There is no feeling in my heart save for you. And through your tenderness alone shall I ever be restored.'

'Edgar, Edgar!' exclaimed she, straining him convulsively to her bosom—'I would weep my life away for your recovery. I feel that I could spend my days in prayers and supplications for you. O why will you not return to the path of innocence and virtue? O kneel, kneel with me here and promise it!'

'I promise it, sister, but not here. I am a miserable, degraded man. The good all shun me—the vicious alone claim me as of their society. My father and sisters loathe me; you and you alone art kind and gentle with me. I must depart. Ask me nothing more. You alone will care for my absence, and I promise you some day that you shall hear from me.'

Caroline could not remonstrate, for she felt she could bear any thing for the sake of his recovery, and his face seemed lighted up with a high resolve.

Nothing was heard for a long time of Edgar. No one seemed to care whither he had gone. The young clergyman who had taken the pastoral charge of that humble, but very worthy society, had met Caroline often in her walks, and her meek, but suffering look had awakened his sympathies. He sought an introduction, and the affectionate interest he evinced for her, won from her the story of her grief. He sympathised in her sorrows, and spoke tenderly of her poor erring brother. He knew the influences that had been around him to draw him from virtue, for he had known him at college. The christian-like and benevolent spirit he manifested toward the weak and erring, drew the heart of Caroline closely to his own. In his society a calm and holy peace was infused into her soul, and she learned more fully than ever to heed our Savior's admonition, 'Take my yoke upon you and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly of heart, and ye shall find rest to your souls.'

A deep and holy affection for each other grew within their hearts from their intercourse, but they forebore to mention it to Caroline's father, for they knew that all his proud hopes were now centered on her, and his health, which was rapidly declining, she felt should be her tenderest care without a thought of self. Her sisters had married and left the paternal home, and she was left his sole attendant. During her father's long illness she forebore to speak of her brother for fear of the effect upon his excitable mind, and she nursed him as tenderly as an infant, checking the least thought that arose in her mind of his former harshness and cruelty.

The lamp of life waned low, and her father's days seemed almost spent. One evening she sat alone in his room supporting his pillow that he might gain a little rest, for his spirits seemed unusually depressed, when a letter was brought to her. It was from Edgar. The hasty perusal told her anxious, throbbing heart that, in a far-off land, among strangers, he had wept alone in secret for his sins, and with truth and humility had sought pardon from above; but not until he had obtained forgiveness from his old father, could he feel that his pleadings for reconciliation with God were answered.

When the father awoke, refreshed by his sleep, Caroline carefully told him of the letter and its contents. While she read it, tears thick and fast flowed down those aged cheeks, and he groaned as he thought of his son's sufferings far away. She read his plea for pardon, and looking up with a countenance full of love, joy and hope, she exclaimed—'Do you grant it, father?'

'O yes?' said the old man, convulsively clasping his withered hands, while the tears flowed faster down his pale, sunken face. 'God knows I forgive him, and bless thee, too, my child!' and he clasped his trembling arms around her neck, and breathed his last.

After her father's death, Caroline made all effort possible to discover the true situation of Edgar, and won from him, by letter, the truth, that though engaged in business, he was often, from his ignorance in worldly affairs, in deep want. Her father's will—dictated in a moment of passion—had left him penniless. A part of her share was willingly sacrificed for him, and placed in his possession without listening a moment to a doubt of his right to it. She willingly relinquished her father's splendid establishment, and gave herself to the protection of the young clergyman in his humble home. All they have, above what is needed for their simple wants, is devoted to suffering humanity. They covet not worldly splendor, but they have sought the ornament of a 'meek and quiet spirit,' which in the sight of God, if not of man, is of great price. Edgar may never return to his home again, but ever will his heart respond to the touching lines of Byron to his sister,—for when all forsook and frowned upon him his sorrowing spirit could breathe,

'In the desert a fountain is springing,
In the wild waste there still is a tree,
And a bird in the solitude singing,
That speaks to my spirit of thee.'

Miss Courtney paused from deep emotion. She had nerved herself for the recital which nothing but the strong hope of imprinting one deep and lasting impression on the hearts of those thoughtless young creatures, could have drawn from her. She had gained her desired end, for not a word was lisped by the now thoughtful group as they raised their tearful eyes to Sophia. She arose, pale and trembling with emotion that sprung from a love she had suppressed for years, and hastily she returned to her silent apartment.

The shades of evening had gathered, and the group arose to depart wiser and better than when they first gathered there. 'Do you not think it is true,' said the volatile Harriet, who had almost forgotten her sadness, in wondering why the beautiful Sophia Courtney never married,—'do you not think it is true, as we have sometimes heard reported, that Edgar Norton was the first love of Miss Courtney, and when he became unworthy she could think of no other?' It was even so, Harriet.

Reason Disregarded.

THERE is no fact that is oftener denied, and which can be more easily demonstrated, than what we have often asserted respecting the disparagement of the true office of Reason by the dominant theology. There is no denying the daily manifested fact, that men will reason like reasonable beings—like those who honor that lofty attribute of our mental nature, while subjects not connected with religion are the themes of conversation, but adopt altogether different principles of discourse soon as the subject of religion is introduced. And yet if there be one theme which should call out the noblest exercise of reason—its full strength, penetration, and acuteness, it is that. Why? Because some of the greatest evils in every community, from the far retreating ages of the past to the present day, have had their origin in the divorcement of Reason and Religion. The domination of many a false religion has here its power, and men have often and extensively dignified credulity, or implicit belief of assertion, with the name of faith. No greater mental evils have ever cursed the human race, than have gained power through the discarding of the true office of reason in reference to religion, and yet still it is set aside and despised.

Not a great while since a young lady was conversing, not reasoning, upon the subject of Universalism, and being asked what she thought of the doctrine as advocated by her friends and relatives who are firm in the faith, she answered, 'It appears all reasonable when they talk about the doctrine, but that makes no difference with me.' What is this but a plain avowal that the reasonableness of a doctrine is no commendation of its merits or principles to her? And yet she is an intelligent female—possessed of a mind good in many respects, and of considerable conversational talent. But what are the highest attributes of mind when united with a prejudiced spirit—a spirit that cramps and fetters all the powers of the soul when they would exert themselves in reference to the most important subjects? A doctrine appears all reasonable, but that makes no difference with her; i. e., it is all the same as it would be did it not appear all reasonable! O it is enough to wring out—it has wrung out—the bitterest tears, to see how many kind, generous, and affectionate spirits are bound to error by slavery of mind—by the passive yielding of the reason to the blind guidance of the despisers of the Beauty of all Truth and the Glory of all Hope! It moves to tears, because we know what joy is taken from the heart—what loveliness is removed from, or veiled to the spiritual vision, and how much less glorious the future is than it should be to them. O woman! honor thy reason! for thus thou wilt be led to the reception and fervent love of a faith that will accord with the deep, the unutterable sympathies of thy being, feeding the hopes that make the beauty of thy love, and give a strong soul to thy devotion to the purification of the sinful world. A faith that will bless and satisfy in all the varied circumstances of life—that will give a glad heart to gratefully enjoy the good of prosperity, and a glorious spirit of prophecy to sketch pictures of heavenly loveliness on the dark curtain of the future, when misfortune, bereavement, or death, visit thee. God bless and aid thee to use thy reason, so that his holy word may give thee such a faith—the faith of universal, preserving, sanctifying, and redeeming love.

Our Book and Memoranda Table.

SEVERAL notices were lost and not recovered in time for our last No., so that we have more than usual to insert, and are deprived of any room for a familiar talk with our readers. Yet we do talk to them by our notices.

ROSE OF SHARON, for 1842. The prospectus of this new Annual will be sent to our friends in this No., and we do earnestly hope that not a little effort will be made to see what can be done to give this work a speedy and extensive circulation. To every young lady who is so situated as to be able to rightly solicit subscribers to this Annual, and in whose heart is the love of our faith, we appeal for assistance. We appeal strongly through our restless anxiety to give a wide circulation to this queen of the Annuals—an anxiety springing from a knowledge of its worth, and from an acquaintance with what will be done to prejudice the public against it, by those who 'blaspheme the worthy name by which we are called.' Gentle maiden, who lookest hereupon! dost thou love our holy faith? and art thou desirous to have it more respected by those who deem its advocates unrefined and unintellectual? Give then thy countenance to this work; deny thyself of other gratifications, if need be, to possess it, and thine shall be a welcome Rose, its leaves all bright and fadeless, and full of the sweet fragrance of holy and pleasant thought. Read the Prospectus.

Those persons who obtain subscribers are requested to return the Prospectuses by the 10th of Sept. next. The work will be published on the first of Sept.; and we are requested to state that the publisher, Mr. Tompkins, will have a large supply with him in New York, at the time of the meeting of the General Convention there, which will afford a good opportunity to many of our friends to obtain copies easily through the ministers who may attend the Convention; all of whom, we doubt not, will be perfectly willing to transact the business.

FAMILY AND PULPIT BIBLE. The possession of a really good family Bible, is no very ordinary occurrence, and yet it is a matter of great importance. When one is bought, it is not intended that it is soon to be superseded by another, but to last through life—to become more and more sacred by increasing associations of a hallowed character—to be one of those treasures to which the heart will longest cling. When the mother gives it to her bridal daughter, or the father to his son, they hope it will be such a treasure—one that they will 'love for the giver's sake and read for their own.' A good copy must be a matter of importance, that the eye of taste may be gratified, that it may be kept with care, that it may be easily read by the aged and young, that aids may be furnished to understand its contents, and that it may be a sacred ornament of the household. Each of these qualities is of consequence, and will be so allowed by those who have given attention to the matter. And we are happy to state that an edition of the Bible corresponding to our Ideal, has been published by B. B. Mussey, Cornhill, Boston. The paper is firm and white—the type clear and full—the marginal references of the best class—the index sufficiently extensive—the list of scripture names, with explanations, full—the Concordance, Brown's approved—and the tables of weights and measures valuable. The plates are of a good quality, the Family Record neat, the Apocraphy in its place, while the binding is strong and rich—beautiful calf. There is no exaggeration in this description, and an examination will convince our friends of the fact. For a family or pulpit Bible, we know of no better edition. We are told by a friend, who knows, that there is no better edition in the country—and therefore we cannot but advise those who are seeking a good Bible for the family altar or the desk, to possess themselves of a copy of the edition published by Mr. Mussey.

ESSEX COUNTY QUARTERLY CONFERENCE. The last meeting of this Conference was held in Salem, July 21. A good meeting was enjoyed. An animated discussion of the importance of Sabbath School conferences, took place, and a resolve passed recommending the officers, teachers, and friends of our schools to give attention to such organizations, which recommendation we trust will be kindly received and carried out. Ordination was conferred in the afternoon on Br. Henry C. Leonard, now of Gloucester, West Parish. The Sermon by Br. S. A. Davis, from Ohio. The Right Hand of Fellowship, by Br. Prince, of Essex, was a beautiful and touching performance. The Conference adjourned to meet in Georgetown, Oct. 20.

SABBATH SCHOOL ASSOCIATION. Among the anniversaries which called the friends of religion and the great interests of humanity to our city the last week in May, was that of the Universalist Sabbath School Association. A good delegation from our Schools was present, and the business was done in unity of spirit. The public exercises, though unreasonably neglected by our city friends, were of a very interesting character—the sermon being delivered by Br. Greenwood. The Report by Br. Adams, was of great interest, being well condensed from the returns made by the pastors or superintendents of many schools. All these returns unite to speak of the interest children take in the exercises of their schools, of the delight true teachers enjoy, of the great importance of interest for the schools in the hearts of parents, and the great value and indispensability of a good library. A good deal was said upon the last item, sufficient to convince any one that something like a concentrated effort should be made to aid in selecting from the great mass of books, the good and valuable. If each school would make a catalogue of examined books found to be good, and these lists were brought together, an excellent catalogue might be formed. Many teachers are too fastidious, not remembering the variety of opinions that exist among Universalists on minor points of doctrine, aside from the great and glorious truth of the final restoration. Remembering this, many volumes may be culled from Unitarian libraries, of the highest worth and interest. Indeed we are, and gratefully own it, indebted to the Unitarian press for some of our very best books, and to it we look for more.

We trust the Circular and Address sent out by the Board of this Association, will receive the earnest attention it deserves. They are full of the best hints and advice, and will do good in giving right ideas of the duties of officers and teachers in our schools.

We hope that the subject of auxiliary associations—alluded to in the resolves—will receive due attention from the friends of Sabbath Schools. The teachers of neighboring schools will find great benefits arising from forming a County or Teachers' Association, to meet at suitable times, and at the several churches, to discuss matters of importance pertaining to school discipline and instruction—to hear addresses and mingle thought to mutual profit.

MASTERMAN READY. A Story. By Capt. Marryatt. This brief tale, unlike most of Capt. Marryatt's productions, is entirely free from profanity, vulgarities, and low expressions. The tale itself is one of the most lively interest. It describes a storm at sea—a shipwreck—the landing of a family who were passengers, upon a lone island, and the various means by which they were made comfortable and contented in that desolate place. The hero of the story—Masterman Ready, is an old weather beaten tar, upon whose coolness, courage, and tact, the salvation and comfort of this shipwrecked family are made to depend. The book is intended for children, and a capital one it is; for it teaches in the most striking manner the advantage of practical knowledge and a familiarity with hardship and danger. The story of Masterman Ready carries us back, in imagination, to our boyish days, when we were so delighted with Robinson Crusoe, that we never tired of reading it. This story of Marryatt's is somewhat like it. Every person who begins to read, will not rest without finishing it. If such readers are to be found, all we have to say to them is, we are very far from wishing to possess their taste.

ESSAYS. By R. W. Emerson. This book is original—original both in thought and style. It is difficult to point out its characteristics, even in general terms. The book is full of noble spiritual thoughts—lofty and transcendental sentiments; and these are uttered without any attempt at logical arrangement, or much apparent effort for rhetorical beauty. Some portions of the Essays, we must confess we cannot understand; but what we do understand we accept and admire. And we would fain believe that the fault is in us, and not in the book, that we are unable to apprehend or comprehend more of its deep and holy meaning. We flatter ourselves that the older we grow, and the more we read of Mr. Emerson's productions, the better we shall understand, the better we shall love them. The faults, if there be any in the work, we are unable to perceive, and of course cannot point out. Indeed, we are not sure that we should mention, should we ever discover faults. We feel confident we should not, unless there were many, and these gross and palpable. We hazard the opinion, that the good things in this book will far, very far outweigh all the imperfections and errors which the most prejudiced and fastidious critic might discover after the most laborious examination. There is something within us which immediately responds to the sentiments in these Essays. We feel the dignity, the nobleness of human nature. We realize the immortality of our destiny. We are made better philosophers, better Christians, better men. We recommend the work to all who love the highest order of truth—we recommend it as the best ethical and spiritual book of the age.

L. E. L. We have received from Mr. Mussey a copy of the Life and Literary Remains of L. E. L., in two volumes, by Laman Blanchard. This is a work which has been looked for with great impatience by the admirers of this lovely and ill-fated daughter of the Muse. It is a work, too, which we feel confident will not disappoint her warmest friends. The mystery of her fate, it is true, is not explained; but this is evidently not the fault of her biographer. Eternal silence must keep the chronicles of her dying hour. But her life—it is one still gliding stream of beautiful thoughts and generous deeds; a model for all true and delicate feminine natures; a sweet picture of self-sacrifice and earnest devotion to the happiness of those she loved. Of her poems we will not at this time speak, as we intend, at some future day to read them carefully with reference to a more elaborate review. Some extracts shall at that time be given; meanwhile read the following on 'Immortality.'

'Strong as the death it masters, is the hope
That onward looks to immortality;
Let the frame perish so the soul survive
Pure, spiritual and loving. I believe
The grave exalts, not separates, the ties
That hold us in affection to our kind.
I will look down from yonder pitying sky,
Watching and waiting those I love on earth
Anxious in heaven until they too are there.
I will attend your guardian angel's side,
And weep away your faults with holy tears;
Your midnight shall be filled with solemn thought;
And when at length, death brings you to my love,
Mine the first welcome heard in paradise.'

'TALES FROM LIFE.' Br. Tompkins:—Amongst the number of publications which you have issued in defence and illustration of the faith, for some time past, no one has given me more pleasure than 'Tales from Life,' by Br. Geo. Rogers. Being somewhat acquainted with the author's felicitous talent for narrative writing, I had promised myself much satisfaction in the perusal of this little volume; but my expectations have been more than realized. Were I to attempt criticism, I doubt not that I might find myself able to give a slight preference to some one of the Tales, but not without adding, all are capitally executed. There are in it no sickly, love-lorn ditties, unbecoming the character and mission of the book. The work is in thorough, good keeping, throughout. It is not overwrought, nor yet is there any thing aimed at, which is not reached. Since what I have said, I have said because I believed it true, and not for flattery, I do most heartily wish the book might be widely circulated. Should any one be induced to purchase the work from this commendation, and repent, if he will give due notice thereof, he shall receive the price again twice told, and be well paid for his trouble. Br. R. in his preface intimates, that should this effort meet with favor from the denomination and public, he may be expected to furnish us with kindred labors. Professing to know somewhat of the tastes and wants of the Universalist community, I will venture to say to him, that, the laconic, but comprehensive command in the Apocalypse, is in this matter, specially applicable to himself, (viz.) 'WRITE!' I must say, Br. Tompkins, in conclusion, that, had I books for publication, the exceedingly rich manner in which yours are got up, would induce me to patronize your establishment. J. C. WALDO.

MANCHESTER, N. H. We are glad to hear of the settlement in this place of Br. G. W. Gage, late of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., who was installed as pastor of the Universalist Society, June 23. Sermon by Br. E. H. Chapin. Manchester is a busy place, and needs an active minister—active in body and soul, and such a one we trust has been directed to the friends there. Br. Gage has our best wishes and prayers for his success.

GOSPEL BANNER. This most excellent periodical has entered (July 17) upon its 7th volume, and is decidedly one of the most vigorous of our denominational publications. There is a frankness, boldness, and integrity, in Br. Drew, which we admire, and a plainness of utterance, which is a praiseworthy trait in an editor, in this age of mysticism. His paper is always interesting, and we heartily wish him a great increase of patronage. The Universalists of Maine are false to themselves, if they do not give him a generous support.

'UNIVERSALIST BELIEF; Or the Doctrinal Views of Universalists.' Thus readeth the title of a new work by Br. Asher Moore of Philadelphia, published in a very neat style by Gihon, Fairchild & Co. We intended to read this volume ere we noticed it, but divers circumstances have occurred to prevent careful perusal. Such volumes should, of all others, be noticed critically, and we are very ill satisfied with the hasty and brief notices usually given of them—so ill satisfied as to resolve to read critically ere we pronounce an opinion again. Of this volume we therefore say that its style of composition is good, and we have no reason to believe that the work as a whole is not commendable. With this belief, we commend the volume to the attention of our readers. It is printed and bound very neatly; 215 pages 12mo. Price 50 cts. Can be had of A. Tompkins.

NEW MAP OF THE VICINITY OF BOSTON. We acknowledge the receipt of a very neatly executed Map of the vicinity of Boston, with the dates of settlement, population in 1840, and distance from the capital, drawn by Alonzo Lewis, and published by Nathaniel Dearborn, 53 Washington Street, Boston. This is a valuable and convenient map, as it is done up in thick covers, making a thin volume about 5 inches by 3 1-2; and we commend it to public attention.

THE BIBLE UNIVERSALIST. Such is the title of tract No. 1, published at the office of the 'Star in the East,' Cincinnati, O. It contains 32 scripture arguments for Universal Salvation; or rather it contains passages of scripture quoted with reference to the doctrine of Universal Salvation, and remarks to set forth their pertinency. The tract is from the pen of our industrious Br. E. M. Pingree, who vigorously applies himself to the important work of the controversialist in truth's behalf; and his writings have given to the Cincinnati weekly an earnest and strong character, which must command attention in every thinking community or circle. He and our good Br. Gurley are well united, and we wish them great success.

WORCESTER, MASS. We rejoice to hear of the organization of a Universalist Society in the beautiful town of Worcester. The pleasantness of that town always wanted one charm to us—the association in the mind of the existence of a brotherhood in the faith. About fifty persons, we learn, signed the Constitution at the commencement, and under the judicious labors of Br. S. P. Landers, we have every reason to believe that the society will become permanent, will increase, and exert a good influence in the community.

'A LETTER TO REV. NEHEMIAH ADAMS, occasioned by his Sermon entitled "Injuries done to Christ;" by a Unitarian.' The author of this excellent production, we understand to be Rev. E. S. Gannett, and it is highly creditable to his christian disposition. Most effectually, and yet kindly, does he rebuke, and show the unreasonableness of, the position so commonly taken by Trinitarians—I am right, and am hurt by all opinions at variance with mine, and what injures my feelings injures Christ!—not remembering that, —as the author of the letter remarks,—our feelings are also wounded by the views which they hold. We thank the friend who gave us this pamphlet, and may make it the subject of a future article.

LECTURES ON THE ELEVATION OF THE LABORING PORTION OF THE COMMUNITY. By Wm. E. Channing. A renewed perusal of this work has served to increase our very high estimation of its excellence. It is a 'tract for the times,' whose sober meaning is worthy of being written on the hearts of all who toil in the great workshop of life. It cannot but breathe strength into the soul of the laborer—it cannot but make him feel that his vocation is honorable and worthy of being honored by him, and it cannot but give him new and higher impulses. First, the author considers in what consists the elevation of the laboring class. In treating this, he offers in the opening a few excellent thoughts on the negative of the question;—that the proper or desired elevation of the laboring portion of society does not consist in raising them above the need of labor—making life one long holiday, for he has faith in labor as an ordination of God for our highest good. Again, this elevation is not to be gained by efforts to force themselves into what are called the upper ranks of society. He wishes the class he addresses to rise, not to the wearing of the artificials of life, but to substantial improvements and real claims to respect. Under this head, there is a very fine passage on Fashion—'a poor vocation.' Again, he does not expect that this elevation will come by seizing on political power and bending the administration of government to their particular interests. In short, it is not an outward change of condition, but elevation of soul. 'Without this, it matters not where a man stands or what he possesses; and with it, he towers, he is one of God's nobility, no matter what place he holds in the social scale.' 'A bird may be shot upward to the stars by a foreign force; but it rises, in the true sense of the word, only when it spreads its own wings and soars by its own living power.' The elevation of man is to be sought for, or consists, in the force of thought exerted for the acquisition of truth, in force of pure and generous feeling, and in force of moral purpose. The author next meets nobly several objections, and then with the utterance of strong thought, shows us the grounds of hope for the desired good. It is a beautiful whole. We commend it to all, for it is worthy of universal perusal.

EAGLE OF THE MOHAWKS. This work, which is now being published in the columns of the Union and the New York Christian Messenger, is to appear at last in the form of a book. Although we have not read any portion of the story as published in the Union, yet we feel assured from what has been said by those who have perused that part which has been printed, that the tale is one of interest and excellent moral tendency. We like the title—we admire the subject. Forest scenery and the Indian character are to us full of the romantic. Price, $1 for the two vols. Six copies for $5.

STEPHEN'S NEW WORK. We have received from Mr. Mussey, a copy of Stephen's new work on 'Central America,' but have not opportunity to examine it sufficiently to venture upon a notice this month. Before the issue of our next number, we design to give it a careful examination and to speak of it as we believe it deserves. Some friend has remarked to us, that it is worth the price of the work to be permitted to look at its mechanical execution—and whoever has read the former volumes of this popular writer, will need no certificate of its internal power to interest and amuse. s. c. e.

ORIGIN OF EVIL: an Essay addressed to the American Clergy of all Denominations, with a view to the improvement of Morals, Politics, and Religion. By a Layman. In press, and to be published the 15th Aug. inst.; to be had of A. Tompkins, 38 Cornhill. pp. 24, royal octavo.

TO CORRESPONDENTS. Several articles intended for this Number have been crowded out. We anxiously look to many who have promised us articles, for a fulfilment of their promises. Is it right to neglect us thus long?

The young and fearless soldier a victor's trophy won;—
 Alas! it decked his gravestone before the fight was done!
 Upon the foeman's vessel the conquering sailor stood—
 Alas! the hero's triumph was purchased with his blood!
 But the daughter hath in safety dwelt; though fragile is her form,
 She still may cheer her father, his prop amid the storm;—
 Ah no! the sheltered rose must fall; they perished one by one,
 Yet the poor old man kneels down and cries, 'The will of God be done.'

CHAPTER III. SORROW.

'BLESSED are they that mourn; for they shall be comforted.'

To declare the mourner happy, brings a strange sound to many ears, and produces far different than feelings of conviction that the aphorism is a correct one. It was doubtless so when our Lord uttered the words, 'Blessed are they that mourn!' Many in that vast throng knew what mourning meant, and could not connect the least idea of happiness with it. Nor did he pronounce the blessing on all mourning; for he knew, as well as the apostle after him, that there was a sorrow that worked not life, but death, and by which, therefore, the heart was not made better. He looked into the hearts of his hearers—he saw there deep lamentation for the vanished glory of Israel, that beauty-had departed from her high places, and the heathen still triumphed; as he saw this, he pronounced that mourning blessed when it led to the acknowledgment of the cause of Zion's desolation and produced a true grief for sin—the lament that her iniquities had caused the sceptre to depart from Judah. Well he might do so, for it was this feeling that would lead them to contriteness of spirit, and prepare their hearts for the comforts of the gospel. That mourning was, and is, intimately connected with human happiness by which the heart is made better—the disposition improved—the child brought home nearer to God. And when this lesson is learned, we understand the spiritual value of afflictions, the true philosophy of sorrow, and how our griefs may be reconciled as the ordination of wise Benevolence, for our highest and best good.

Ossian speaks of 'the joy of grief,' and his language is the poetry of truth. There are deeper well springs of joy in grief than in any of the luxuriant grounds of pleasure, and many have tested the reality—finding in experience a valuable comment on the sweet Psalmist's words—'They that sow in tears, shall reap in joy.' There is a power in sad and mournful music, in the breathings of the melancholy muse, and in the touching narrative or painful tale, to which all hearts respond; and an undefinable joyous sadness is felt as we mourn with the mourner. The gay and sportive recital loses its charm after a few perusals, while the tale of sorrow always has a freshness that interests and pleases. There is a chord touched that gladness cannot reach, and its music, though sad as the strain of the dying swan, is sweet as the song-bird's in the hour of its love, and teaches the tender morality of sympathy with our kind. Life would be monotonous and dull, were it all joy; for who would wish to see the river flow ever smooth and gentle, and earth present one aspect of vernal brightness? The dew on the flowers have made them more charming, and tears in human eyes have woke a love smiles alone never could have created. Yes, indeed, grief has been, and may be, sanctified for our happiness.

Happy are they who mourn! could be better declared by him who did declare it than any other; for with him, in his gospel, were the interpreters of the mysteries of life, and the ministering spirits of love from the better world. He saw how the human heart was waked from its lethargy of sorrow, taught of the instability of earthly things by afflictions, and made by bereavements to inquire for the everlasting home and unshadowed beauty. He knew how adverse to human good was that lethargy, how fatal to lasting peace the fastening of the mind to earth, and how little man knew of his higher nature while here to him was heaven and time eternity. Therefore he could well pronounce a happiness connected with mourning, and promise comfort to the sorrowful heart that would hear him. Whatever makes us feel more our better nature, and realize more our immortality, may be regarded as contributing to our blessedness.

Perhaps the original application of the Savior's language, though it has a deep and wide meaning, was to the bereaved—those who were mourning the loss or sickness of dear objects of love, and that to them his gospel of life and immortality would open springs of living comfort. Such would eagerly seek his doctrine, finding in its spirituality the sympathy needed, and be ready to follow him, while the gay and the prosperous would give little or no heed to his teachings—and therefore the sorrowing could be pronounced happy, as the issues of that sorrow were seen by him.

We take our Lord's words in their full meaning and broad application, as conveying a spiritual truth; and in showing how that truth is connected with the development of our better nature, we aim to demonstrate the benevolent mission of sorrow.

'The true sorrow of humanity,' says an old writer, 'consists in this;—not that the mind of man fails; but that the course and demands of action and life so rarely correspond with the dignity and intensity of human desires; and hence, that which is slow to languish, is too easily turned aside and abused.' Or as another has quaintly remarked, 'There dwells, in every man, a passionate longing for a better world, which he tries to assuage by earthly pleasures, as the women in India put snakes in their bosoms for coolness; but ours know into the heart, and it perishes, with its feverish thirst unslaked.' Man does not recognize the true intent and purpose of his deep desire for happiness, why there is such a contrariety between the mind and the outer world, and he flies over earth, vainly seeking the satisfaction he pants for, till his wings droop in weariness, when they should be bathing in the sunlight and gaining strength in the pure and free air of heaven. He prepares himself to live for time and this world; and when disappointment or death comes, there arises a sorrow such as angels deem only becoming a being who has no knowledge of an immortal destiny. Sorrow clears away many of the clouds that have obscured his vision; he is brought from the Imaginary to the Real—from life as he would have it, to life as it is. Who will not say there is blessedness in mourning, when it awakens man to the consciousness that this is not his home—that here the race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong—and no continued order of things which can insure him that as is to-day, so to-morrow will be? Men do not learn this lesson soon enough; not till after the world has often time had the best strength of their days, and has chilled their affections. And from this flows most of our sorrows; for this ignorance and blindness leads to the giving up of the heart to perishing things, preventing the influences of the better world from acting upon our tempers, passions and affections, and sanctifying them to our best good; for while they are unsanctified by trust in heaven and deep and holy thoughts of eternity, they are without their true balance, and their best traits are hidden. Hence wild passion's excess, the low and groveling feelings of selfishness, the ill placed attachment, and the long and dark train of miseries springing from want of sympathy with and from our kind.

'Heaven lies about us in our infancy!
Shades of the prison house begin to close
Upon the growing boy,
But he beholds the light, and whence it flows,
He sees it in his joy;
The youth, who daily farther from the East
Must travel, still is nature's priest,
And by the vision splendid
Is on his way attended;
At length the man perceives it die away,
And fade into the light of common day.'

Sorrow must perform the mission of bringing the soul back to the heaven that is around us in our infancy—to such a love of heaven as we then had for our home, to such a confidence in God as we then had in our mother, to such an eager and passionate longing for the things of eternity as we had then for the future, and to such a trust in a surrounding and protecting love as we had then fixed in the friends around us. When the heart is thus brought back from the world and the things which disappoint and betray, the new creation is commenced—the old heavens and earth begin to pass away and the new to be unfolded—and we are amid a world of light and beauty which has religious associations that make spiritual types of every thing; and though it has no audible voices, it has a language the most impressive, because the language of deep thought and feeling. There is all this—and experience alone can tell how much more—in the apostolical description of the effects of the spirit of adoption in the heart, summing them up in one phrase, 'a new creature.' Blessed are they who mourn, for thus are they comforted.

O many have found sorrow for the dead the parent of a living and joyous faith! While the beloved was around them, earth was all sufficient; they rejoiced in the smiles of love, and revelled in the romance of life; they dreamed not of heaven, for they had a heaven of their own. But the great teacher—death—came to one, and the language of the other heart was:

'If I had thought thou couldst have died,
I might not weep for thee;
But I forgot when by thy side,
That thou couldst mortal be;
It never through my mind had past,
That time would e'er be o'er,
When I on thee should look my last,
And thou should smile no more.

I do not think, where'er thou art,
Thou hast forgotten me;
And I perhaps may soothe this heart,
In thinking still of thee!
Yet there was round thee such a dawn
Of light ne'er seen before,
As fancy never could have drawn,
And never can restore.'

The heart that mourns the departure of such a loved one, and the glorious light so brightly beaming once around its path, cannot be soothed by thoughts of the value of the loss. The memories of the past, the dear relations of life broken, the tender associations connected with a thousand things, the remembrances of looks, smiles, tones, and words, that have hallowed hours and scenes, make the tears well up from their deepest fountains. Those drops as they fall, ease their hearts, and they feel it a luxury to weep; but there is no blessedness till the rays of immortality's sun are reflected upon them, changing them into a bow of immortal promise. And how often in those hours, suddenly as when during a summer shower the sun darts out its light, spanning the heavens with the glorious bow, does the consciousness burst on the soul that for them in the purpose of God's grace, there is all the heart can desire—heaven, re-union, eternal love!

Perhaps death never comes more suddenly to any than to the mother as she bows in gladness over the child of her heart, who has ever scarce known of sickness, but who is suddenly touched with the blight of disease, and ere the smile has fairly left its cheek, death's dews rest upon its brow. If she was ever reminded that children sometimes die, she turned only to read more searchingly the signs of promise of life and long continuing health in her own. It seemed to her wrong to think hers could die, though many passed away from homes around, as ray after ray of pleasant light. And when the face of her dear one is changed, it completely overwhelms, for she was utterly unprepared. And to comfort her there is placed in her hands, 'The Mourner Comforted,'¹ and she turns and turns till her eye is attracted to an article entitled, 'Consolations in the Death of Infants.' 'Ah!' says she, 'here my heart will find comfort!' and she reads. But O who can describe the effects of ice floods of horror which roll over her affections as she reads this cold passage: 'Indeed' (as though it were a matter of surprise!) 'some have thought that all infants dying baptized are certainly saved. And a very learned and accurate person has lately contended for the salvation of all infants, whether of christian or heathens; and that by the addition of the whole infant world, the number of the saved will be greater than that of the damned. But I doubt we cannot easily be certain of this, how desirable soever it may appear to be true, and that it is saying more than we have sufficient ground in the Scriptures to support.' The writer adds that it is a very agreeable thought if it could be made good, but thinks 'we should not be wise above what is written, or pretend to greater certainty in the matter than we have sufficient means to come at.' This is the way the mourner is comforted by Episcopal teachers! 'Miserable comforters are ye all.' Denying even the hope of salvation to the mother for the infant dead! O mockery of the religion of him who blessed little children! Blessed are they that mourn, when the bereavement makes them test the hollowness of such doctrines, and leads them to the Resurrection and Life—to the truth as it is in Jesus, not man.

Again;—how many have thus been taught that 'it is for others rather than ourselves, that the fond heart requires an hereafter.' He that has lived out all love, who has none to whom the affections are bound, may rejoice in the nothingness of scepticism, and be glad to doubt the reality of a future life. O he is desolate indeed! But not so with him who feels that doubt or disbelief tells him that, as a certain writer has said, 'those he has loved with all the passion, the devotion, the watchful sanctity of the weak human heart, are to exist no more! When after long years of desertion and widowhood on earth, there is to be no hope of re-union in the Invisible beyond the stars; when the torch, not of life only, but of love, is to be quenched in the dark fountain; and the grave, that we would fain hope is the great restorer of broken ties, is but the dumb seal of hopeless, utter, inexorable separation! And it is this thought, this sentiment, which makes religion out of wo, and teacheth belief to the mourning heart, that in the gladness of united affections felt not the necessity of a heaven! This has been often God's way to wake the worldling, to rouse the slumbering wanderer, and teach the unbeliever the necessity of religion.

And O, thank God! how many by mourning have been made to give that candid and prayerful attention to the evidences of our faith which insured belief, but which for years they scorned to give! The child passed the infantine age of unaccountability, died; the unbelieving father or mother has departed; the dear brother or sister is no more on the earth; or a friend, loved as the apple of the eye, has gone down to the chambers of death; and an awful uncertainty rests on their fate—for the doctrines of men marked them as the unregenerated, and perhaps they were of the sensual and ungodly. They stand by the grave and think! O God of love! what thoughts run like liquid fire through the brain; they see them arraigned before the bar of a 'Justice turned to Wrath,'¹ and

'God in the grasp
Of his almighty strength, takes them upraised,
And throws them down, into the yawning pit
Of bottomless perdition, ruined, damned,
Fast bound in chains of darkness evermore!'

And what is the effect of that vision? The heart forgives the dead—it asks no vengeance for any wrong done; it sorrows that error and vice ever darkened their fame. Is it satisfied with the fate awarded by the fancy of their doctrine? Can it find comfort therein? No! no! every compassionate feeling of the human soul rises up in rebellion against it, or reason totters and the brain maddens with the overwhelming weight! The hour of the death of loved ones—loved though sinful—has convinced many of the hollowness of all the pretensions of all doctrines antagonist to ours to the qualities of a comforter to the bereaved heart, and they have come through sorrow to our faith, as the sceptic comes to christianity. We may talk of the utter and eternal misery of the felon on the gallows who died in his hardness of heart, and not be moved; but there are those to whom such language will sound more withering than did the death sentence in the criminal's ear. We can converse calmly of others' griefs, but our own we feel; and when the priest, who by his intellect, not his heart, has pronounced the eternal ban upon many a wretch dying in guilt, finds at last his own son—precious though disobedient, dear though vile—is one of the same, the heart of the man conquers the intellect of the priest, and he cannot pronounce the anathema, no more than David could take his heart from Absalom.

Reason gives comfort when the good and faithful die. Many are the volumes put forth for mourners full of consolations for those who mourn the departure of virtuous friends; but when those who have been led away by the foes of goodness die robbed of all spiritual beauty, the heart that mourns for them can find therein no comfort—nothing to say—'David was comforted concerning Amnon;' but there comes from them many a tone that jars terribly the chords by which we feel, made peculiarly susceptible by grief. They come to the gospel. They read with eyes from which scales seemed to have been removed by tears. They see in Christ a tenderness they never saw before, and he becomes unto them the resurrection and life of the world. They learn the extent of resurrection grace, and that the voice of scripture answers the questions of the heart—How are the dead raised up? Shall sin be destroyed? Shall the loved be redeemed? Joy beams into the heart. Happy they rise from their grief, with a confidence, a trust, a spiritual and all-pervading comfort, they never knew before. Christ is in them the hope of glory, not only for self, but for all loved—the whole race. 'Heaven would be hell, if loved ones were not there!' says the poet Percival; and it is true. Heaven is heaven, because we trust loved ones are there, sanctified and pure, and that we with them shall praise Redeeming Grace.

The application of our theme is very far from being exhausted. There is blessedness in sorrow when it wakes up feelings of love and sympathy for others; when it makes us dissatisfied with ourselves and inspires effort for improvement, and whenever it leads to a higher estimation of our spiritual nature and to more constant and true devotedness to its relations. So should it be with us—always seeking out and applying the lesson the Spirit would teach us by our sorrows:

'How little of ourselves we know
Before a grief the heart has felt;

The lessons that we learn of woe
May brace the mind as well as melt.

The energies too stern for mirth,
The reach of thought, the strength of will,
'Mid cloud and tempest have their birth,
Though blight and blast their course fulfill.

Love's perfect triumph never crowned
The hope unchequered by a pang,
The gaudiest wreaths with thorns are bound,
And Sappho wept before she sang.

'Tis only when it mourns and fears,
The loaded spirit feels forgiven;
And through the mist of falling tears,
We catch the clearest glimpse of heaven.'

The Calls of Death.

BY MRS. L. J. B. CASE.

'I AM content to die, but Oh, not now!'

MRS. NORTON.

I HEAR thee, Angel! Thou hast called me long
With varied summons to the peaceful tomb;
But on my soul the hold of earth was strong,
And I recoiled from the unanswering gloom,
And prayed, amid familiar scenes a longer time to roam.

It came when youth and hope were beating high,
Soft as the breath of summer on the air,
But life's young pilgrim could not bear to die
While earth was glad, and all around was fair;
The beaming eye had known no tear, the heart no throb of care.

It came again, and life was not the same,
But Oh, so slight had been the change, my heart
Still shuddered at the dread and awful name
Of him whose sure, and stern, remorseless dart
Doth from the blessed bonds of love the trembling spirit part.

Once more it came, when year on year had fled,
And clouds had gathered in life's morning sky,
And Memory pondered o'er the changed, the dead;
Still Hope was near with bright and trustful eye,
And sang her joyous song till earth looked all too fair to die.

It cometh now, nor to my Father's will
Yet bows the spirit, for another gleam,
The last and best, is shining brightly still,
And calmer, purer, steadier far, its beam,
Than aught which yet hath shed a charm on life's dark-gliding stream.

And yet a little longer I would stay
Beneath the influence of that tender light,
For in the radiance of its lovely ray,
Once more, upon my time-corrected sight,
Life hath put on a deeper joy, and earth again is bright.

Yet Oh, my Father, if thy high behest Command that soon my dust to dust be given,
Spare to the last this lingering gleam of rest,
And let my life go out like summer even,
With soft and glorious beauty clad, till melting into heaven.

DEATH. What a vacuum is caused in a family by the death of a fond parent, or child, and how grave seems the vacant seat! Our mother, earth, has received another of her own.

Hungering and Thirsting after Righteousness

BY REV. T. C. ADAM.

[THIS article is the concluding portion of a sermon which we listened to in Boston, some weeks since, and which contained so much consolation and encouragement, that we could not forbear a request for its publication. If there are any among our readers, as doubtless there are, whose minds and hearts have been distrustful of spiritual progress, who have felt, and suffered from, the weakness of a willing spirit, we commend to them a careful perusal of the excellent counsel which follows. Constantly tempted as we are, weak and faltering in the path of light, beset by reproaches and misgivings of conscience, we can nowhere find so great a source of comfort and encouragement as in the words of our Savior: 'Blessed are they who hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled.'

Where conscience is the paramount principle of character, the course of the spirit is continually upward and onward—continually far-reaching into the sublime glories of the heavenly kingdom; yet how often, even in its highest and strongest flights, does it pause almost in despair at the illimitable height above it, and at the awful proximity of the earth beneath. How great and constant need has it, therefore, of an assuring voice—a voice from below that shall go upward, from above that shall invite, and soothe, and encourage. God's blessing be upon these words of our brother, and make them gracious ministers of peace and encouragement to all those 'who hunger and thirst after righteousness.'] s. c. e.

WE would now notice a doubt or difficulty which we know has troubled, perplexed, and discouraged many a one who has set out, with all sincerity and earnestness of purpose, in pursuit of righteousness—moral excellence, ever-increasing goodness. Their experience so little authorizes them to think that they shall ever be filled or satisfied, that in an hour of despondency and forgetfulness of the pleasures they have already tasted on the way, they have put, or been ready to put the question, Will those who hunger and thirst after righteousness, indeed and very truth, ever be satisfied? According to the explanation we have already given of the beatitudes, asserting, namely, that the promises annexed should not be considered as arbitrary rewards, but as the natural and inevitable consequences of the character, conduct, or disposition referred to in each particular instance—according to this explanation, Jesus himself answers this question. His language properly interpreted says: Those who seek the dominion of conscience, right, uprightness, righteousness within them, with the strong, vehement, and not to be denied craving of hunger and thirst, such will be satisfied—it is the natural consequence of this condition of their mind, that they will ultimately attain the object of their desire, and that, meanwhile, they should be making gradual approximations towards it: If then we doubt not the words of Jesus, the question is answered.

But this, we are well aware, may not be entirely satisfactory to such as may be discouraged or perplexed as above stated; to such as may be disposed to put the above-named question. If we guess aright, the source of doubt or hesitation from which such questions usually originate, there needs some other answer to set the mind at rest. The source from which such difficulties, such questions usually spring, then, we suspect to be this—a consciousness of some desire after increasing goodness or righteousness—some sincere, earnest, though, perhaps, but feebly-influential desire—and at the same time an oppressive dread that the person is approaching no nearer to it—a melancholy consciousness that the object is far from being realized, the inward craving far, far from being filled or satisfied. We appeal to every one who has taken any steps in a divine life, in an emendatory self-discipline, if he has not found that, just as he has made advances in the divine life, his conscience has become more sensitive, —more quick-sighted to detect, more authoritative to condemn, all remaining unrighteousnesses or departures from the law of right; if it has not frequently appeared to him that the more he or she strived and struggled after righteousness, and perfection in goodness, the greater seemed his or her remoteness from the object—the greater the distance to be travelled over, or the work to be done, ere the object could be obtained. This is a strange, a perplexing fact, a seeming paradox, and I question if it can be made intelligible except to those who have felt it in their own experience. But, nevertheless, it is a fact that the more righteous and perfect we become, the more sensible are we of, and the more poignantly do we lament our remaining unrighteousnesses and imperfections. Blessed are they who have discovered this in their own experience—blessed and happy has Jesus pronounced them when he said, 'Blessed are they that mourn,—mourn over their remaining evils, wrong-doings, unrighteousnesses, imperfections, for according to an established law of heaven, such godly sorrow if accompanied with corresponding and consistent labors and exertions, will lead to reformation—such persons, if consistent, will labor, will continue the work of sanctification, until all these evils and imperfections are eradicated or overcome, and then will they be comforted. Now we suspect that the question we have named originated in this increasing nicety of conscience—in a feeling that notwithstanding that there is not wanting a desire of betterness—of increasing goodness and righteousness, and notwithstanding that something may actually have been done towards the realization of this desire, yet that the goal or bourne seems far remote, and that the work to be done increases in extent in proportion as an entrance is made upon it.

If originating in such a consciousness, those who have such doubts or perplexities might be thus addressed:—Be not discouraged, even should the work to be done seem to be only increasing and enlarging upon your hands; for it is well with you—it is an omen of good when your experience is such. There are quite a number of considerations which should and would tend to keep you from yielding to hopelessness and despair of ever attaining the object of pursuit, if you would only think of them. A few of these—by no means all—may be here suggested to you.

Recollect then, in the first place, that it is a law of God's moral administration that the farther we advance in goodness, the more cognizant of remaining evils and imperfections our conscience or moral sense becomes. If the ground yet to be gone over—the work yet to be done, therefore, appears to you greater, in a certain sense, than when you first commenced it, it is a good sign—a sign that you are walking in the right path, and that God is carrying you forward from one degree unto another of righteousness, moral excellence, and perfection.

Again; Consider that something analogous to this increasing sensibility of conscience to the great extent of goodness yet unattained, even by the best of us, takes place in other departments of human desire and pursuit. Who was ever satisfied with riches, or possessions of this world? Who was ever satisfied to the full with wisdom, learning or knowledge? Take the latter case as one in many respects analogous to your own. Look around you, and as a general law you will find the most ignorant and illiterate the most self-conceited of their attainments—the most obstinate and inflexible in their judgments—the least open to reasonable argument or conviction, and the least desirous of more knowledge. Somewhat like this was the case with you while your attainments in goodness were small; you were better satisfied with yourself, in one sense at least, than you are now when your attainments are greater. You were less sensible of the heights and the attainments in virtue yet before you, and less desirous of reaching them. Somewhat similar, too, is the case of many a youthful student. When he goes for the first year to high-school or college he returns generally very self-conceited, and proud of his great proficiency—of his great attainments in science or literature. His eyes are not yet open to the immeasurable fields of knowledge and of literature yet before him—yet unexplored by him. A second year generally makes him less proud, less self-conceited, more sensible of his deficiencies, and of the immensity of the ground yet to be gone over ere he become perfect or even greatly proficient in knowledge. A third year makes him still more so, and a fourth; and if he devotes his whole life to making attainments in only one department of science, he will, as a general rule, be less conceited and even less satisfied with his attainments at the end of a long life, than he was the first year of his collegiate course.

A circumstance related of Sir Isaac Newton well illustrates this; and as it has been of service to some who have suffered under the pressure of the very fears and discouragements we are here attempting to remove in you, we would beg your attention to it, in the hope that it may bring encouragement with it to you also. You know that this man devoted almost a whole life to making researches and advances in one department of human knowledge, and that he succeeded in making such discoveries as carried human science and human vision much farther than any one had done before him. And yet notwithstanding all the sciences he had mastered, and all the advances, discoveries, and improvements in knowledge he himself had made, he was not vain, nor self-inflated; he was humble as a little child, and thus, or somewhat to the same purpose, expressed his feelings: 'I feel,' said he,

'as if I had only begun to explore the great field of knowledge; I feel as if not even ankle-deep in the great ocean of truth; as if I had been, all my life, only picking up shells on the shore of that illimitable ocean which yet lies before me.' Such, we may well presume, would be your language in regard to moral excellence or righteousness, even were you to make as signal attainments in virtue and all moral excellence as Sir Isaac Newton made in science, and a knowledge of the physical laws of the universe.

But we must confine ourselves to the brief suggestion of one other source of encouragement in the pursuit of moral goodness and righteousness. It is this. You are destined to be progressive beings, never perfect, but always, except when indolent, inactive, or positively vicious, making progress toward perfection. It is essential to this condition of gradual and ever-increasing progress and improvement that your desires—your ideal, should ever keep in advance of the actual,—of present attainments. Were it not so, you can easily perceive the consequences. You would inevitably stand idle and inactive for want of an object of desire to stimulate you to exertion. You may, therefore, be well assured that it will always, at least after the greatest attainments in this life, be with you as now it is; you will never be filled or satisfied in the sense of obtaining a feeling that you have already attained, either were already perfect; but as Paul said, so may you, 'This one thing I do, forgetting the things that are behind, and reaching forth unto those that are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high destiny of mankind which God has set forth in the sinless perfection of our great Exemplar and pattern—the man Christ Jesus.' Paul adds, 'As many as be perfect, (that is, would be perfect) be ye thus minded;' and they are the world over: they are always forgetting or lightly esteeming the attainments and the progress already made, in comparison, at least, with what remains yet to be accomplished. And so it is with all who are disposed, in some of their moods of mind, to put such a question, to be perplexed by such a difficulty or doubt as we have been endeavoring to answer and remove. So it is with such, and so it ever will be. Perfection and the desire thereof, will ever be ahead of all attainment; and it will ever seem as it does now, as if this bright canopy of perfection were ever elevating itself above our heads away into the heaven of heavens, far above and beyond the reach of all possible, or at least of all ordinary performances.

Be not discouraged, therefore, we would say to those who are ready to faint and falter in their up-ward and on-ward race; hunger and thirst with earnest, urgent, constant, oft-returning, and unquenchable desire after righteousness, and all moral excellence; you will be satisfied, you will be filled with a feeling, a consciousness of an ever-increasing harmony with God—an ever-increasing likeness to his image—a feeling that God dwells in you and you in him, that you are making progress in the divine life, and becoming more and more partakers of a divine nature;—your holiness will increase and consequently your happiness; you will never indeed be fully satisfied, but you will always be abundantly satisfied, compensated for the progress made. Hunger and thirst, then; occasionally you will be feasted and well satisfied or filled; but it is essential, indispensable to your progress and perfection, that the hunger and thirst should ever and anon be renewed, else never could you arrive at the destined perfection, bliss and beatitude of your moral and spiritual nature.

Let it, then, be the influence, and the effect of these remarks, to make us all renew and corroborate our vows and resolutions to obey the eternal law of gradual progress, and to make it more and more the business of our lives to press onwards to the goal of goodness and perfection.

'Dost thou not feel the empire of the soul
Is great, surpassing all that kings can claim,
 . . . and dost thou not
Feel conscious that thy spirit's strength can sway
A sceptre far too mighty for thee now,
While thou art clothed in mortal vesture here,
That oft entangles and throws down the soul,
And makes a subject of what should be king?'

If so, then will you be false to the nobility and capacities and cravings of your nature, if you do not press on. Hear again the spirit-stirring voice of song:

'There is an everlasting voice echoing
And echoing in my ear,—Press on! press on!
And though I go amid the silent haunts
Of wood and hill, or by the rolling sea,
Or yet amid the busy crowded mart,
I hear the pealing spirit-sound, Press on!
And often when my soul is stirred and roused
To earnest action to obey that voice,
I feel an angel's wings beneath, and seem
To soar above the earth—am lifted up
Away from sensuality, and all
That binds the spirit to the grosser world:—
And blessed is the freedom.'

Press on

Is still the pealing voice within the soul,
The echoing voice of God, who in the depths
Of our mysterious nature, hath prepared

One sacred place that yields response to none,
Save to his spirit-voice; and if at night,
When the still heart has sympathy with stars,
And hears their solemn music, thou wilt hark
To hear the deep—low tones within,—Press on!
Will greet the mystic ear devotion opes.'

'Trust thou that voice, and it will bid
Thy soul have strength to hope for life and joy
Eternal and most pure; a heaven thou'lt have
In thine own heart, and thousand angels there
Will keep thy mind awake to God and good,
And for the goal of goodness thou'lt press on!'

'Original'!

'RIPENED fruit is wholesomer than that which is green.'

I DON'T know why—but so it was—that this short, common-sense saying of 'L. C.' in the Repository for July, should have started me out into the field of meditation, with pen in hand, to think, and write, and then to get printed the subjoined important and 'original' things of intellect. The reader, too, may ask the intent of this small talk. Let him follow on—for he might, perhaps, be in worse company.

When 'L. C.' penned the above shrewd saying, (—it was shrewd where he placed it, although any old grandmother might have said the same in quite a different connection,—) the relative subjects of 'original' and 'selected' matters were in his mind. I desire a word in the same strain—glad indeed that 'L. C.' has so aptly introduced it to the readers of this good paper.

There is at present an unnatural taste in the world of ideal creations, for originality. People get so tired of themselves and of all things common around them, that something new must come up at every convenient or inconvenient season. New school books, orations, sermons, essays, editorial articles, plays, dresses, cooking stoves, and patent medicines are sought. Improvement is the order of the day. Even novelty gets wearied, and seeks relief in itself, in vain.

'Long time ago' was it said, 'there is nothing new under the sun.' The truth of this saying applies to our subject. That which we call originality is in nine cases out of ten, only a repetition of something which has been done, said, sung or written hundreds and thousands of years before. We ape others in thought, word and deed;—we steal with the most unscrupulous grace what has been often stolen before, and swell with the exhilarating idea that we have been original!

But the mania rages. 'Originality' is the watchword. We must have it in the literary world. Swarms of newspaper and magazine writers pretend to it with faces of brass as well as pens of steel. They prose without mercy after the same old fashion; and because the batches are made up into new shapes, they are devoured by the voracious public. Many of our servants who dish out to us our literature, do it with the manifest determination to cram us with 'original.' Selections—good, better, best though they may be, are not the things. Original! give original! And so it comes from the knight of the quill who in the work of catering is 'constantly on hand'—now and then indeed agreeable to the palate, but oft-time 'stale, flat, and unprofitable.' From little penny 'Clippers,' 'Transcripts,' 'Budgets,' 'Posts,' 'Mails,' and 'Expresses,' to huge moving 'Jonathans,' 'Notions,' 'Libraries,' 'Omnibuses,' 'New Worlds,' and 'All Creations,' we are surrounded with 'originals';—so the worldlings think. But they are not all wise.

In the scientific world originality must come up. Phrenology yet puzzles inquirers, and picks their pockets for experiments on their skulls,—it is so original;—and so with animal magnetism—for this is an experiment on skulls in more senses than one. 'Grammar Pierce' chirps and buzzes the science of language by the hour or month, the yard or mile; turning old Lindley Murray topsy-turvy, and playing such 'tricks of authorship' before the gaping multitude, as to make all grammarians in regular standing weep scientific tears, and inspire not a few with desperate resolutions to write original grammars, and 'set up' for themselves. Exact miniature ghosts make their appearance in Daguerreotype. A galvanized man is made to stand, walk and dance. A truly living man has just invented wings for human flight,—soon shall we be in the air! Professor Espy has been to France and obtained letters patent for managing storms, and would draw Boston audiences to hear him lecture, were it not that his science is too airy. It must come nearer, so as to be seen on a stage, like one of Dr. Collyer's magnetized subjects. New music which when played brays 'horrible discord,' comes out in streams to the noise-making world, and is admired because it is 'original,' while those who execute it revile and slander the soul-moving music of the old school.

Wonders are sought. The old and ordinary will not satisfy; notwithstanding the shameful ignorance of the great mass in the very first principles of science. They are still reaching out for a scientific novelty. All this, because 'the schoolmaster is abroad.'

In the religious world the same propensity for originality is seen. Men are not content with plain, simple forcible truth. They want powerful stimulants with it. They seek new and strange dishes thereof.—Bible reading and thinking is not strictly in place with the age; it might have answered fifty years ago. Ministers may now talk about it; but books written in more modern style than that of the Bible should now be read. It hath even been declared from the pulpit that the inimitable account of the sacrifice of Abraham needs improvement, or deserves obliteration.¹ The New Testament is strangely awry. St. Paul was not systematic, and ought to have lived in 1840 or '50—that he might be learned; as Germany was somewhat wild, and Cambridge College had not been erected, when he wrote to the churches! In consideration of these things, and about fifty thousand more which may not now be particularized, certain of our fashionably religious congregations require a ministry fitted for the age of 'originality,'—not a ministry of deep, clear thought—but of the high, the distant, the soft and hazy,—not of pointed, logical, doctrinal reasoning, (horror!) but of new words and phrases, polished sentences, pearly interrogations, golden exclamation points, and diamond periods. And it would often add to the beauty and originality of a sermon, if it could be preached from a text not in that antiquated volume, the Bible, but from Xenophon's Hiero, Cicero's Tusculan Questions, Seneca's Morals, Bulwer's Ernest Maltravers, or Emerson's Essays. Glory to originality! What wonders will it not effect for the world of religious reformers; and how will it render null and void such sayings as these from an old fashioned missionary; 'Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the rudiments of this world, and not after Christ. But I fear, lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty, so your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ.'

But I will desist—or I shall be annihilated by the crowd which I see coming in search of 'something new.' Nevertheless, before I close, permit me to say, that I am a friend to progress

¹ See Rev. Mr. Parker's Ordination Sermon, about which so much vaporing has been witnessed.

—have no fears of innovation—shrink not from truth—love not antiquity for its own sake—would have manners modernized if substance be not changed,—and have no great horror in the thought that humanity should be whimsical;—yet against one thing I do protest, and that is the rabid taste for 'originality' now prevalent, while there is at the same time prevalent such consummate ignorance of what has been already said, sung, written and done on 'this terrestrial ball.' 'Why Weepest Thou?'

BY MISS M. A. DODD.

UPON the resurrection morn
Of Him who died to save,
A tearful woman was the first
To seek his silent grave;
When o'er that lone deserted spot
The mourner came to bow,
She heard his well known voice exclaim,
'Mary! why weepest thou?'

'Forget thy grief, and haste to those
Who now lament for me,
And tell them that their risen Lord
Thine eyes were blest to see;
Say that the Master they have loved,
To each his blessing gives:
And be thou joyful in the thought,
That thy Redeemer lives.'

Sad is my spirit and cast down,
Disquieted my soul;
The rushing torrent of my tears,
I can no more control:
While unresisting, to the storm
Of passion wild, I bow,
I hear my Savior softly say,
'Mary, why weepest thou?'

'Let no vain grief thy peace destroy,
Thy dearest hopes shall die;
They fade before thy vision here,
To beam again on high.
When prone to murmur at the ills,
Which must thy portion be,
Look to the fatal cross whereon
Thy Savior died for thee.'

Rebuked, dear Jesus, at thy feet
My passion I resign,
Let my own heart forget its pain,
While I remember thine:
Thy thorny crown, thy taunting foes,
And wounded side I see;
What are my sufferings to those
Of Him who died for me?

Lord, soon thy lesson is forgot,
Thoughtless I turn away,
And fix my love, my joy, my hope,
On idols formed of clay.
Alas! the dark insatiate grave,
Is opening for them now;
But there again my Savior speaks,
'Mary, why weepest thou?'

* John 20th.

'Remember while thy tears flow fast
Above the silent sod,
Nothing thou lovest there remains,
The spirit is with God!
Have I not told you many times;
And shall my word be vain;
That as I triumphed over death,
So shall they live again?'

Lord, I believe! thy soothing words
My faith, my hope increase;
Like oil upon the tossing waves,
They hush my soul to peace:
A peace, a hope, so deep, so sweet,
Which nothing earthly gives:
I will be joyful in the thought,
That my Redeemer lives.

The Summer Rain.

'WAFTED up
The stealing cloud with soft gray blinds the sky,
And in its vapory mantle, onward steps
The summer shower; over the shivering grass
It merrily dances, rings its tinkling bells
Upon the dimpling stream, and moving on,
It treads upon the leaves with pattering feet
And softly murmured music.'

SHELLEY.

THE rain is falling—the vegetable world has waited long and anxiously, and has not been disappointed. It comes invisibly. I exert the utmost powers of vision and cannot see the falling streams or drops; but I hear it as it falls upon the roof and stirs the leaves of the trees and plants; and as I hear it, I think of the beating of my own heart, that, unseen, sends the vital element through a thousand avenues. The rain is the blood of the material world. Sent out by the pulsations of the great heart—expansive force, it circulates through the whole wide range of the body, and every portion of the indescribable vastness, receives benefit from it. I love the rain when thus it comes—so gently, so musically, so free from the associations that rise in the mind when the wind is strong, the descending streams are heavy, and the trees bending and bowing, like a multitude when a long line of honorable guests are passing, and to whom respect must be, at least, outwardly paid. Now I can almost see the flowers distending their little throats to drink in the blessing—the twigs spreading out their leaves to catch it, and the grazing animals in the pasturage bend their necks and receive it. Even the travelers seem to love to be beneath the shower, and the little children open wide their palms to catch the drops, while they turn their faces to the sky and laugh merrily as the rain falls upon them, making them wink, and bathing their heated brows. The maiden, the housewife, and the aged dame, bear out the flower pots into the yard, where the rain may water the favorite plants, and they stand each at the window or door to see the small crystals dance on the leaves or rest in liquid brightness in the folds of the flowers. 'Blessed rain!' exclaims the sick one in her chamber, as the curtain is put aside and the cool air comes in, refreshing as the voice of love after mingling with the clashing throng. The world without looks brighter to her gaze. The dazzling paleness of the leaves has departed, and the softly glistening green is grateful to her sight, while the fragrance of the sweet briar rushes in and fills her room. A new life steals over her frame, more cheerful thoughts engage her mind, and she feels more hope than she has known for many a weary day. The farmer rejoices in the reviving gift, and rapidly looks from part to part of his fields to see how much is received by them all, and then gazes up as he thinks of the distant lot and his neighbors' fields, to see how far the showering clouds extend.

The scene in the city is pleasant far beyond description. There the warnings of the gathering clouds are little heeded, and when the rain comes, it comes to make a thousand say, 'What a sudden shower!' The tradesmen who believe in show—in gaining customers through tempting the sight, run to take in their finery, while the store that has seen but few persons to buy, is now filled with many to seek shelter. The workmen leave their benches, the clerks put their pens across the ear or between the lips, and the trader forgets his bargains, to rush to the doors and enjoy the cool air and the rain. This is the time for jests and jokes. The hurrying of the travelers, the dripping dresses of the fashionables, the slips and falls of unlucky pedestrians, and the scrambles of the fruit dealers and the haberdashers, afford infinite amusement to the bystanders. There's music too in the shower here—as the water pours down through the tin spouts, dashes on the signs and shades, and rushes along through the streets, down the grates of the tunnel. And what is more musical and beautiful than the falling of the rain on the quiet waters of the harbor! Millions of drops, every one sparkling like a diamond and rebounding from the surface, and with a whispering sound sink into the bosom of the deep, as though they felt they should be as well off there as in the cloud, and were telling each other so. And there on the wharf, by that good old pump from which we have drank a thousand times, the hand the cup—stands the drivers of the watering-machines, feeling completely 'cut out' by the shower, yet patting their horses and thinking of release from labor.

'The rain is over and gone.' And though at a sixteen mile remove from the ever loved city, I see the beautiful and joyous display on the wharves, as hundreds of sails are spread and the merry shouts and songs of the sailors are heard on every side, while the waters reflect the gorgeous and infinitely varied clouds floating in beauty above. The streets are no longer dusty, and are filled with hurrying travelers eager to make up lost time, while the traders hasten to arrange again the attractive show—yet all of them pause in their flight, and labor to admire the circling bow, that tells them to remember God and his promises amid the cares of busy life.

Around me here the scene is beautiful as there. The window of my study is opposite a pleasant street, at the head of which two noble trees hide a doctor's and a parson's mansion from my sight. The irregular range of white and dark houses on both sides, are washed clean and bright, and the tree that here and there protrudes itself, nods in sympathy with my praise and love of the shower. The grass on the banks is greener than it has been for weeks, and the spots where the scorching sun has withered every blade, shine with golden beauty. The chapel where a faith far different from mine is advocated—has more charms than of late, as it glistens in the light and the running drops cleanse the glass of the windows. Would that like effects could be wrought upon those who are wont to gather within its walls, by the doctrine that drops like the rain, and distils as the dew—as the small rain upon the tender herb, and as the showers upon the grass. But the broad stones in front glisten to smile me into hope, and the beautifully cultivated and fruitful gardens on either side, cheer me to labor, as they demonstrate what effort can do even in reference to the material. The clouds float over my elevated position in every variety of form and hue, and a smile rests on every thing within sight. Blessed be the summer shower! agent as it is of so much good, waking up joy in so many hearts. I wait for another visitation of the angel of the rain, when the earth shall again be ready to echo her pattering feet.

Evening Twilight.

'Tis in that hour when twilight throws
Its mellow light o'er every thing,
When mountain top and valley glows,
And birds their evening vesper sing ;

'Tis when the western clouds are spread
In graceful forms along the sky,
And gold and crimson, blue and red,
Are blended, all in harmony ;

'Tis then the stormy passions cease,
And cares are hushed within the breast ;
A thousand voices whisper peace,
And anguish leaves the heart to rest.

'Tis then the spirit soars in praise ;
Then gushes from the heart its prayer ;
For while the evening twilight stays
We feel—we know that God is there.

Love and Absence.

'THE love that might,
By absence be extinguished quite.'

CAN this be love—that true genuine love, which hath its dwelling deep in the inmost recesses of the human heart, and like the warm blood that there ebbs and flows, giving life and animation to every nerve and muscle—pervades every faculty of the mind—is mixed with every thought, and affects every impulse of the soul? No! 'tis but its counterfeit! Where the heart has really bestowed its warmest esteem and affection, (and we believe the first to be necessary to the last,) absence will not diminish that attachment—it will rather gather strength from that very circumstance, even as the force of the cataract is increased by its height from the stream.

How delightful it is to indulge in thoughts of the dear and the absent. The little failings to which all are now or less subject, are forgotten, and we think only of those amiable qualities that so much endear them to us. Memory loves to recall and dwell upon each kind word, look, and tone, and we fancy we again behold their pleasant faces, and return the warm pressure of their hands. We seem indeed to commune with them in spirit, and we appreciate them better, and love them more. We could not forget if we would! The endeavor to do so would counteract itself. Give me no lethean draught! For although I might thus lose the remembrance of much that is painful, I would not even on these conditions be deprived of thoughts of the past—the loved and the absent. Pure and hallowed are the feelings that spring from such reflections. It is this that gives a refinement to friendship, and melts the heart into a tenderness it never knew before.

Absence is truly the test of friendship—by it alone we can form an adequate conception of the strength and power of the ties that bind us to those we love. And absence alone can tell us whether we are the subjects of regard to others. And painful though it be, to experience the bitter disappointment, that our 'heart's wealth has been poured on dust,' let us not shrink from the discovery. Better, far better is it, to know we have been deceived, than still to confide in a regard which is of so little worth, as to be diminished by absence.

Does the tender mother with her little family gathered around her cheerful hearth at night, forget her boy, long absent as a sailor on the deep? No! dearly as she loves those who are now clinging so fondly about her, her thoughts are most with him who is not there! And when she supplicates her Father which is in heaven, on behalf of her dear ones, her warm and heartfelt prayers for that absent son, dwell longest upon her lips. And here we are reminded of the affecting parable of the prodigal son. See that aged parent with trembling steps, and tears of joy flowing from his eyes—hastening with outstretched arms to welcome the long absent wanderer! He has not forgotten him—but he has forgotten all else—he has forgotten his desertion of him in his old age, the squandering of his substance, his misspent life! Beautiful and touching illustration of our heavenly Father's love to his erring and wayward children! His brother is jealous on account of the rejoicing manifested by his father, and how pathetic is the language of the latter, when in the fullness of his heart, he thus replies to the remonstrance, 'son, thou art ever with me—this thy brother was dead and is alive again; he is lost and is found.'

'As a fish will sometimes gather force, and, with a longing, perhaps, for the brightness of upper air, leap from its prescribed element, and glitter a moment among the birds, so will there be found men whose souls revolt against destiny, and make a fiery pluck at things above them. But, like the fish, who drops, panting, with dry scales, backward, the aspiring man oftenest regrets the native element he has left; and, with the failure of his unnatural effort, drops back, content, to obscurity.'

Romance of Woman. No. 2.

It is hoped the title we have given to a short series of poems upon historical themes, of which the following was intended to be the commencement, will not suggest any association with 'RECORDS OF WOMAN;' for we are fully sensible of the immeasurable distance at which our best efforts must lie below those of her who stands at the very head of female poets. Suggested by her 'Records,' this series may have been, but is chiefly intended as a sequel, or, more properly, a companion to a former series, called the 'POETRY OF WOMAN!'

THE TOMB OF CECILIA METELLA.

BUT who was she, the lady of the dead
Tombed in a palace? BYRON.

THE obscurity which veils the history and character of her whose ashes it once contained, renders it, to one at all given to vain imaginings, more eloquent than if it were the concomitant of a most interesting and elaborate chronicle.

TUCKERMAN'S SKETCH BOOK.

JE suis entré dans le tombeau de Cecilia-Metella, et je m'y suis assis sur l'herbe. Ces fleurs qui, dans le coin d'un tombeau, dans l'ombre, pour ainsi dire, de la mort, faisaient briller leur couleurs; cet essaim d'abeilles réfugiées entre deux rangs de briques; le miel qu'elles compoient là, ce doux bourdonnement de leur vol léger, qui s'écchappait du silence et venait distraire ma pensée; ces azur des eieux, formant au-dessus de ma tête une voûte magnifique, que des nuages d'argent et de pourpre peignaient tour à tour en fuyant; le nom de Cecilia-Metella, qui peut-être fut belle et sensible, et sans doute fut malheureuse; le souvenir de Crassas, l'image d'un mari désolé, qui tâche, en amoncelant des pierres, d'éterniser sa douleur; . . . tout cela et mille autres impressions que je ne saurais, ni démêler, ni nommer, jetèrent peu à peu mon âme dans une rêverie délicieuse.

DUPATY'S LETTRES SUR L'ITALIE.

IN beauty stands it 'mid the wrecks of power,
'Neath the soft splendor of Italian skies—
A crumbling monument, a round old tower—
A question of the past with no replies.

The ivy clings around it like a thing
That loves decay, and beautifies its work;
And birds of joyous song and radiant wing,
And murmuring bees among its ruins lurk.

The very flowers have tracked the secret way,
That they might blossom on Metella's grave;
And their rich perfume, shed above the clay,
Is the best incense that the dust could crave.

Resting unknown beneath the ivied tower,
How many a wandering footstep turns to thee;
Turns from the wrecks of Roman pride and power,
To muse on thee and on thy mystery.

Thou'st lived, Metella, thou hast loved and died;
A common history; nor need we more
To name thy name with reverence and pride—
Thou wert a woman, and thy lot is o'er.

In early childhood by Egeria's fount,
Where oft high converse Numa held of old,
And o'er the gorgeous Palatinean mount,
Perchance thou hast often wandered uncontrolled.

By Tiber's banks, o'er Roma's proud old hills,
And thro' the verdant plains around them spread,
'Mid blushing flowers, and softly glancing rills,
Perchance by maiden dreams thou'st oft been led.

Enough of fame to thee that thou wert born
Of pure patrician blood—a Roman's wife;
That thou the home of Crassus didst adorn,
Brightening the stream of his luxurious life.

And he hath loved thee, he for thee hath grieved;
And centuries have passed since o'er thy dust,
He raised this 'stern round tower,' and thus believed
To keep thy name in everlasting trust.

Still stand in beauty, with thine ivy crowned,
Tomb that a husband's love hath sanctified!
For this, Metella, art thou still renowned,
Tho' all we know is—thou hast lived and died!

The Fruit of the Spirit;

OR, THE CHRISTIAN GRACES.

CHAPTER X. TEMPERANCE.

'Tis to thy rules, O temperance! that we owe
All pleasures, which from health and strength may flow;
Vigor of body, purity of mind,
Unclouded reason, sentiments refined.'

WE are soon to part, patient reader, for I have but one more Grace to present to your notice; but though the last, it is not the least in importance; for it is the province of Temperance to preside over all the others, to guard them from the excesses which change virtues to vices, and make unsightly branches show themselves where once was a beautifully healthy growth and great promise of fruitfulness. By temperance we are not to understand that reference is made solely to one kind of indulgence that poisons the health of body and mind, ruins the happiness of home, distracts society, and spreads ruin and desolation on every side, and against the suppression of which so many strong and powerful measures are adopted and carried out; but we are to understand the restraints which the christian law of happiness requires us to put upon all our desires, that they all may be controlled in harmony with each other and moral excellence; and hence the maxim is correct, that 'restraint is the golden rule of enjoyment.'

All the passions of our being are good, rightly developed and directed; but the best may be prevented by intemperate indulgence. To those whose influence is felt at least throughout the little community of home, I would fain present this Grace in all its attractive powers. I would clothe it in the beautiful garments of an angel, that it might hover near them day and night. It would touch their eyelids with the first beams of the morning sun, and bid them rise with the grateful orisons swelling in their hearts for the thousand sources of enjoyment and usefulness opened to them. It would disperse listlessness and check the uprising of vain and foolish desires; and would close the lips when anger or calumny would defile them. It would so guide them that they might pass through scenes of mirth and gaiety as the wise travelers of old passed through the valley of Baca—using not its enlivening draughts to excess, but only as means of refreshment and invigoration, to strengthen and bless.

While my thoughts dwell on this virtue, I am reminded of an incident and conversation that occurred some time since, while I was traveling in a stage coach through one of our beautiful New England villages. It was toward the close of an autumn afternoon; the whole day had been spent within the narrow limits of the coach; but the tediousness of many a long mile was forgotten when its termination found us still amid the rich and glorious scenes of Indian summer, and the sad thoughts occasioned by parting with friends, were rendered less sad by the cheerful countenances and animated conversation of our fellow travelers. They were five in number;—a communicative and sensible old lady in sable robes, whose kindliness of heart was manifested many times during our journey by the proffer of her snuff-box, smelling bottle, or fan, on the first appearance of indisposition in any of the company; an intelligent looking lad, her grandson; a middle aged gentleman, with free, frank, and courteous manners; and two young ladies, modest, unaffected and polite. From each and all—from the good old lady to the youngest one—whose greatest worldly care for the present seemed the protection of a delicate geranium from the elbow of the gentleman who in his earnestness in conversation would often forget its existence,—there were expressions of thought and feeling which have never escaped my mind; and as I thought of the sweet intercourse I had enjoyed with loved ones whom I had left that morning, and felt the happy influence even of the society of strangers, I could not but make mine the language of the author of 'Hyperion'—'Shall I thank God for the green summer, and the mild air, and the flowers, and the stars, and all that makes this world so beautiful, and not for the good and beautiful beings I have known in it? Has not their presence been sweeter to me than flowers? Are they not higher and holier than the stars? Are they not more to me than all things else?'

It was, as I have said, nearly sunset, and we had arrived at the last village in our route. It was situated on a plain, and as we ascended to it from a high hill the scene was perfectly enchanting. The light and shade on the lawns and meadows—the mingling of many hues on the thick foliage that almost screened the villagers homes from sight, all gaining additional lustre from the golden rays of the autumn suns, formed a camera obscura-like picture as we caught glimpses of tiny forms in the distance, and to our ears ascended the busy hum, mingled with the schoolboy's whistle, the cricket's chirp, and the rippling music of the mimic cascade. But the ardor of our admiration was damped even on our entrance into this little Eden, for the first dwelling that met our eyes was a large neglected looking tenement, with shattered panes and broken blinds, and before its door lay a prostrate sign that bore evidence that the building had once been the stranger's home, but the wretched and bewildered beings who emerged from it, too plainly showed that it now made strangers at home. A cool and sparkling fountain near the door—the only relieving sight—attracted our weary animals, and the postilion drew up near it. We would fain have closed our eyes at the sight of the unholy objects before us, had not a little girl, rushing into the door and crying bitterly, attracted us, and fastened our attention there. She seized the hand of one who had just entered, and almost drew him in his benumbed state to the door. He resisted her, and reached forward his hand for the proffered glass. She looked wildly into the face of the tender and exclaimed, 'O do not give him more! poor mother is sick and alone, while Willy and Charley are crying for bread. Give me that fourpence.'

'Go off, child—your father can take care of himself,' said the man; and the young creature, whose strength was exhausted by the effort, finding it wholly unavailing, came sobbing down the steps. As she passed by the coach, the gentleman of our party questioned her, and she simply and earnestly told the story of her father's downfall, her desolate home, and sick mother. Her tender and artless eulogy on that mother drew tears from our eyes. A sum was dropped into her hands, and as she clapped them exultingly together, she cast a stealthy glance up toward the door of the house, and whispered, 'He'll find it.' Just then the jingle of the bells of the baker was heard, and quick as thought, off she ran, as her keen appetite well understood the signal. Our horses were soon on their way, and as we passed the child, she smilingly held up her little shawl filled with the needful for her suffering home.

'The poor little creature makes great count of what is small,' said the eldest young lady whom the gentleman had familiarly called Isabel.

'Ah yes,' said he, 'she has need of that now, though once her home yielded her every comfort.'

'Then you know her father, do you not?' we observed.

'Yes,' was the reply. 'He removed here a few years ago from the town of my residence, and a sad move it was for him; for his downward course has been a melancholy proof of the effects of first yielding to the tempter.' 'Tis true, my son,' said he, addressing the lad, 'as one of our country's most able writers has remarked, "The lover of social pleasures little dreams that the glass, which animates conversation, will ere long be drunk in solitude, and will sink him too low for the intercourse in which he now delights. Intemperance comes with a noiseless step, and binds its first cords with a touch too light to be felt."'

'Was he free from the spoiler's art when he first came here?' asked Isabel.

'Yes, he was always a happy, cheerful being,' was the answer, 'easily yielding to the excitement of amusement; but the society by which he was surrounded, had ever exercised a good influence over him; and not until his removal here, to become gardener at the residence of an opulent and luxurious gentleman, had he ever been known to indulge in stimulants. Ah, poor fellow, I do blame him for his weakness in exercising so little control over himself, and neglecting duty and reason; but more do I blame the reckless intemperance of the man who first bewildered him by the splendor and dazzle of luxurious banquets, where the sparkling wine flowed freely; and still more I blame him who, because of the intemperate love of gain, wilfully robs his family of bread, and offers no resistance to his weakened nerves so long as he has a penny to add to the avaricious purse.'

'Ah,' said the old lady, who by no means had been an uninterested observer of the scene, 'Ah, there is a vast deal more intemperance in the world than merely the use of intoxicating drinks, and though it does not rob the face of its fairness, and the form of its grace and erectness, it does steal away the best feelings and affections of the heart. O my young friends,' she added, with much affection in her look and tones, 'in the course of my long life I have traced the downfall of many a promising son and daughter, to the want of proper control over their tastes and propensities.'

'It is true,' said the gentleman, after a pause, 'and as the love of excitement seems inherent in our natures and is so early manifested, those to whom the charge of the young is committed, cannot be too cautious that this passion is directed to pure and virtuous pursuits, and healthily indulged. There is the taste for reading, for instance, wherein the bent of the mind is so early discovered; when rightly directed, it is a life long blessing, bringing us into communion with the best minds; but when left to the judgment of the young, untaught and imaginative, it often generates the bitterest curse.'

'The certainty of that,' said the young lady with the geranium, 'was forced upon me when I recently visited an interesting friend of mine. I remembered her as a thoughtful, studious girl, who would often steal from the amusements of her schoolmates, that she might enjoy herself in that which was more congenial to her taste. Her mother was kind and indulgent, but possessed of rather an indolent mind, and had never given a thought to the character of her daughter's reading, yet priding herself with the idea that her daughter would one day be a learned lady, because 'she read so much.' Books of fiction, giving false ideas of life and high wrought pictures of the affections, early engrossed her attention and vitiated her taste; and now, she who gave promise of early talent and usefulness, is the personification of affectation and sentimentality.'

'And perhaps,' added the gentleman, 'she will be led into what she considers a romantic attachment, will make her home miserable, and the end will be like the scene we have witnessed to-day.'

'The love of the beautiful and the power of imitateness,' he continued, 'are other traits which can be made productive of the greatest happiness or misery. When rightly directed, they impart elegance and grace to the humblest home, and throw around it those thousand little charms which would otherwise be wanting, giving life and vigor to the whole outer and inner world; but when wrongly influenced and overpowering to our better judgment, and permitted to gratify the lower propensities of vanity and selfishness, their effects are often as fatal to the peace and prosperity of home, as many indulgences that appear far more blameable.'

'Yes,' said the old lady, 'many a poor, wretched parent can trace the line of her misfortune back to the time when she coveted the gay dress, or rich piece of furniture, of her more prosperous neighbor, and permitted the thoughts of it to revolve in her mind until she persuaded herself it was actually necessary that she should have it.'

'The fondness for amusements and over indulgence in their accompanying luxuries,' said our intelligent looking Isabel, 'too often proves to be the "joy that in the end hath heaviness;" for the faculties and vigor of body and mind will soon yield to their enervating power. I have a friend who would set no limits to the gratification of this taste, excusing herself with the plea that it was perfectly innocent and harmless. She had a brother whose careless and intemperate habits caused her much sorrow and mortification; she had time after time plead with him to resist, but in vain. One evening, just before her departure to a ball, she had been more than ever earnest, when somewhat excited, her brother exclaimed, 'Ellen, what is the use of all this! You must practise what you preach, ere I'll follow you. Here you've been a whole week employing all your powers to complete that splendid dress. You will spend the most of the night at the ball, will return wearied and sick, and will scarcely make an effort to arouse yourself until another ball calls you to study out another fashion. Now I advise you never to tell me of talent wasted, and of time misspent, again, until you direct your own to a little more advantage.' The appeal forced conviction to her mind, and since that time she has been a different being.

'And yet,' said the geranium holder, with a slight blush, 'you do not join in the indiscriminate condemnation of the amusement of dancing and its gaieties?'

'By no means,' answered Isabel, with animation. 'The Jews celebrated their sacred festivals with dancing, and I think it a pleasant and healthy excitement when rightly attended to. I often recall the remark of Mrs. Hamilton in that portion of her letters on Education which treats of Religion. She says—"Let me not be laughed at for the confession, and I shall freely acknowledge that I at this moment look back with infinite pleasure to the delightful period, when, with the simplicity of infant innocence, I poured out my little soul in grateful thanks to the Almighty for the happiness enjoyed at a dancing school ball.' 'And she speaks also,' added Isabel, 'of the benefit produced to her mind from the powerful association of felicity with the Divine favor.'

'A singular confession,' said the gentleman, 'but one worthy of being remembered.'

'I'm sure I can make one like it,' said the more confident geranium holder.

'And so can I,' added Isabel, 'but I question if any such religious feelings are awakened by the fashionable and promiscuous balls now so common.'

Just as she ended the coach stopped at the Post Office of the village in which our journey was to terminate. Two men stood before the door engaged in high dispute. We should not have imagined from their menacing looks and angry tones that Religion was the subject, had not a few remarks met our ears which decided the case.

'There,' said our gentleman, 'is another species of Intemperance—the intemperance of speech. Those men will extol the light of reason, independence of mind, and the value of discussion. Yet if one sees proper to differ in opinion from the other, he is in danger of being called a fool, a heretic, or a blinded soul; which he returns with no gentler speech, or greater consideration. Each one is certain that all the light and knowledge belongs to himself, or his sect, and the rest are wrong. Ah! tis thus that our holy religion becomes a jest and a bye word to the thoughtless and indifferent. The zealous partizans, unmindful of the legitimate effects of christianity, become the harsh and unspiritual, and furnish themselves with the weapons of opposition, brandishing them to display their skill at every opportunity, and manifestly for their own glory. Thus they clearly prove that their hearts have received none of the spirit of the religion they laud.'

As the gentleman paused, our friend Isabel—who had apparently waited until the last moment, that she might lose none of his remarks—arose and modestly thanking us for the pleasure of her ride, took leave, saying to the gentleman as she descended from the steps—'You must call to-morrow, Doctor you know not how mother has improved under your care.'

'There,' said he, as soon as the door closed and the coach again moved on—'There is a perfect model of Temperance,—so good an illustration of our general theme that I cannot let it pass without notice, and I am glad for this reason that we are all bound to the extreme part of the town. In Isabel's short life she has known the extremes of affluence and penury; but so equally balanced are all her feelings and desires, that it has produced no jar in the nice harmony of her noble mind. When surrounded by the blandishments of elegant society and the allurements of luxurious habits and customs, her pure mind yielded not to their temptations, and she early felt that the abundance around her did not release her from obligations to her fellow beings, and that happiness consisted in yielding her powers to the service of God and his children.

She sought the law of right to direct her every thought and act, and strictly obeying its injunctions, a beautiful agreement was produced in her mental, moral, and physical constitution. She may pass through changes and trials, but her well disciplined mind will discover in them her clearer title to an inheritance above. Since her change of circumstances, her virtues have shown out with more strength and beauty than ever; for she has proved the support and comfort of a declining mother, and the hope and joy of a disappointed father.

'Does she reside here?' asked one.

The country it was thought might be beneficial to her mother's health, and during this summer she has boarded here—her daughter defraying the expenses and adding to her comfort in many ways by the proceeds of a school she has procured here; she appropriates none of her earnings to herself, save what is absolutely necessary. She has just returned from a visit to her father, for his employment will not allow him to also dwell here, and she knows he needs her society sometimes. She will soon return to the city with her mother, and the prudence she has exercised has enabled her father to procure a pleasant winter residence for them.

Here the halting of our horses at the hotel put an end to the conversation, and as I was the only one to tarry there over night, I bid farewell to my pleasant companions with feelings of regret, commending the young schoolmistress to the gentleman's care. And as the carriage passed away, I could not help thinking in my heart that he who will exert himself as the Doctor had to interest and improve and make pleasant the time to stage-coach travelers, and remove the restraints, coldness, and often rudeness to which they are liable—is a public benefactor.

Dew and Holiness.

'THE fervent heat of yesterday's sun had almost parched the face and exhausted the sweets of nature. But what a sovereign restorative are these cooling distillations of the night! How they gladden and invigorate the languishing herbs! Sprinkled with these reviving drops, their verdure deepens, their bloom is new-flushed; their fragrance, faint or intermitted, becomes potent and copious.' HERVEY.

I HAVE been meditating on the phenomena of the dew so welcome to drooping plant and flower, and often winning our admiration by its loveliness. I have consulted the scriptures for the sacred associations therewith, as is my custom when considering any part of the natural world, and these associations I find to be eloquent indeed. I notice that Moses in his last blessings on the tribes, thanked God for 'the precious things of heaven, for the dew;' and as he did this he doubtless thought of the good bestowed by the ministry of the dew, which caused him in his sublime song to liken the effects of truth to the distilling of the dew—as the small rain upon the tender herb,—divinely fitted to impart new life and increase the fruitfulness. It was because of this, that God in the time of need promised to be as the dew unto Israel; and because of this also, brotherly love is likened to dew. Transient virtue or goodness is also compared to dew, but not for the reasons just mentioned, but because it soon passes away; or rather it is compared to the early dew which promises much in the warm climate where it is ever grateful, but which is suddenly suspended by the action of winds or clouds.

The subject has thus become pleasant to me—may it be so to the reader; and I cannot put it from me for another till I have traced out a spiritual analogy between holiness and the phenomena of dew. This is not an employment of mere fancy, for it is of the greatest consequence for us to connect spiritual things with the natural world that is ever before us and attracting our attention by some of its great variety. We can do thus, and in doing thus we shall surround ourselves with sacred teachers, while by hallowed associations the beautiful in nature is made more lovely and attractive.

First, then, of the origin, or formation of dew. During the day the moisture of the earth rises in invisible vapor and hangs suspended in the air; when the coolness of night comes on, this vapor is condensed and falls to the earth in small drops called dew. Some portion of dew is formed by the vapor being condensed ere it rises into the air from the surface of the earth, and jewels the grass and flowers sometimes with minute pearls ere the sun departs. The deposition of dew is always most abundant when the night is cloudless, and where there is no protection from the atmosphere. 'Whatever interferes, in any way, with the process of radiation of heat from the earth's surface, has a great effect on the deposition of dew. Hence the radiation of heat, and consequently the deposition of dew, are obviated by the slightest covering or shelter, as by thin matting, or even muslin; by the neighborhood of buildings, and innumerable other impediments near the surface, and matters interposed at a great distance from the earth's surface.' 'A knowledge of this has enabled gardeners to preserve plants from frost, that otherwise must have perished; and in the early settlement of the western counties of Maine, the formation of artificial clouds as they may be termed, by the condensation at evening of the immense volumes of smoke that arose from the lands that were being cleared of timber, was found to be an effectual safeguard to such late crops of corn as were endangered by frosts. Indeed it is found that the cooling of the earth necessary to the deposition of dew rarely takes place while the thinnest strata of vapor is visible in the atmosphere. Young plants in the garden may be preserved from frost by spreading over them anything however flimsy that will prevent the radiation of the earth, as a simple mat, or a box with a milinet or muslin covering, or even a linen cloth, provided that the covering does not touch or rest upon the plants. Vegetables or trees growing near walls, houses, or high fences, are sometimes saved by the partial check these afford to radiation; and every farmer who plants his orchard, knows that corn or potatoes planted under the trees will remain green long after those around them have been killed. In this case the spreading top or foliage of the tree intercepts the radiated heat and returns a part of it to the earth by the electric currents that exist in all living vegetables.

'The rapidity with which dew forms about sundown, may be considered a pretty sure criterion of the degree of cold which will prevail during the night; and of course the necessity of precaution, or otherwise, may be determined on in season to save such plants as require protection. The formation of ice in warm climates furnishes a curious proof of the radiation of heat.

In Bengal and principally in the vicinity of Calcutta, some 300 or 400 persons, previous to the introduction of New England ice by Yankee enterprise, found a constant and profitable employment during the summer months, in the manufacture of ice, for the use of European residents. Broad, shallow unglazed earthen pans, were placed on dry straw, and when water was poured into them, ice of the thickness of half an inch was sometimes formed in a night; and those nights, in which dew was deposited most copiously, were always found to produce the thickest ice, while clouds or wind interrupted it entirely.'

Thus we perceive that dew is formed wherever the process is not impeded, from every part of the earth. The vapors that rise, rise from all the varieties of moisture that exist, from the putrid pool where poisonous insects lurk, as well as from the pure waters that bathe the roots of sweetest flowers. From all, the transformation can be made, by which that which had no beauty becomes as beautiful as pearls resting on the brow of loveliness, yea, more so. So with man and holiness. From all the varieties of human characters; from the most morally putrid, as well as from those whose affections have always run pure and sweet, the laws of spiritual transformation can produce holiness, beautiful and fruitful as the dew. They have done so. They are doing so. The divine influence is ever operative; and converts to Christ are multiplying as the drops of dew on the clear, cool summer night. The pearly globes which rested this morning on the flower beneath my window, in which the light was swimming like gold fish in the glass, were perhaps yesterday a part of earth-defiled moisture utterly devoid of beauty; but the sunbeam, like an angel pitying the impure, did not shrink from kissing it and winning it to rise from its low estate. It rose—became changed, and lo! as a sinful spirit from the baptism of truth, it again mingles with the things of earth with sweet charms. Beautiful types of spiritual transformations, will the dew ever be to my sight; and to God shall my prayer be, as oft as I see the morning light giving beautiful hues to the crystal drops,—

'O may thy Spirit in my spirit shine;
As shines a sunbeam in a drop of dew.'

2. Dew is formed by the action of natural laws, and according as the laws are permitted to act, the effect is produced. So with spiritual laws, man, and holiness. All effects are produced by laws in matter and mind, and it is only thus that they can be produced. But some seem wholly to disregard this fact in reference to the outward and inward world, and therefore they are ever aiming at effects blindly, wasting much of their strength in unphilosophical speculation and effort. Man loves too well the devices of self-will, never giving enough solemn thought to the query: 'Should it be according to thy mind?' Should the infinite concerns of the universe be all made to contribute to working out thine impulses? Rather, O man! seek to make God's mind thine, and then thou mayest have thy will and be innocent. We must work with God, if we desire real good. We must work with, not against his laws, else we shall war without victory, and spend our strength for nought. In all departments of human effort this maxim will hold good; therefore, in the highest efforts, those made to gain holiness, we must obey the laws that govern these. It is not when the winds of excitement are around, and the clouds of mysticism obscure the clear stars of faith and hope, that the dews of holiness are best and most abundantly distilled upon the heart, reviving its drooping powers and filling it with fragrance to breathe out unto heaven. O no! We are never to forget that we are creatures of reason when holiness is our aim or object; we must not mistake excited feelings for firm convictions, nor impulses for deliberate promptings to do right. 'My speech shall distil as the dew,' is the voice of religion to the soul. The 'still small voice' comes nearest and most powerfully to the heart; and the angel of strength draws nigh to him who at the evening is alone, as Jesus was, to commune with messengers from heaven. They come in our thoughtful hours to incline us to review the past; to think over the relations we have held in life; to question our desires, examine our passions, and test the purity of our affections, and contrast therewith the demands of God's law of duty, excellence and happiness. They come to waken anew and more powerfully our aspirations after good; to incite us to stronger purposes and more determinate aims. They come to spread before us the great gain of holiness, and promise us most abundant reward for all sacrifices made in the cause of progress. Heavenly thought is distilled upon the soul like dew, cooling the feverish desires, and imparting new life to what was faint and drooping. These we need, and that greatly too; but they are not to be received but by the action of the spiritual laws. If we place impediments in the way, we must be without the dew of holiness; dew that is never dangerous to any plants that are worthy of our care or of being preserved. Emerson hath said true, 'A little consideration of what takes place around us every day, would show us that a higher law, than that of our will, regulates events; that our painful labors are very unnecessary, and altogether fruitless; that only in our easy, simple, spontaneous action are we strong, and by contenting ourselves with obedience, we become divine. Belief and love—a believing love will relieve us of a vast load of care. O my brothers, God exists. There is a soul at the centre of nature, and over the will of every man, so that none of us can wrong the universe. It has so infused its strong enchantment into nature, that we prosper when we accept its advice. The whole course of things goes to teach us faith. We need only obey. There is guidance for each of us, and by lowly listening we shall hear the right word.'

3. The dew is formed and distilled upon the earth in secrecy and silentness. We see not the wonder working operation of the transforming laws, and as invisibly, so silently they effect their object. We feel the falling drops, and when they find a resting place, they make themselves manifest,

"till they infuse
Deep into nature's breast, the spirit of her hues."

So is it with man and holiness. All is silent and invisible. There are no voices heard speaking to the soul, and when the spiritual transformation is going on most powerfully, the ear can catch no sound, all is still as the movements of worlds in space. The affections and passions are moulded into beautiful harmony, as it was said of the building of the temple; all was still, 'so that there was neither hammer, nor axe, nor any tool of iron heard in the house while it was in building.' It is not the noisy, ostentatious, and bustling professor who grows the fastest in real holiness, who subdues most continuously and effectually the enslaving passions, and manifests most to the eye of Omniscience an increasing worthiness as a disciple of Jesus. 'The kingdom of heaven cometh not with observation.' For although when christianity first appeared it produced no little commotion, yet this commotion was not the spirit of christianity. Its author was the Prince of peace, and the great blessing he proposed to confer was peace. Hence he likened the progress of the sovereignty of his truth over man and its growth in the soul, to the working of heaven and the growing of the mustard tree. There is nothing stable born amid convulsions; and if needed convulsions come, they are but as the breaking of the earth with the plough, that preparation may be made to sow seed. In peace all the virtues best prosper; conscience is heard more distinctly when she utters her monitions; and the mind is not by confusion deprived of the right use of its powers. Thus in silentness, as the dews are formed, the affections are rightly fashioned, and the wonderful work of the spiritual creation is carried on, and the supremacy given to holiness.

4. The beauty of the dew is universally admired. I never met a person who had so little of the love of the beautiful as not to love the dew, as it reposed in many hued transparency on the flower—stealing in amid the leaves of the rose—nestling far down in the cup of the petunia—washing the dust from the violet—brightening every hue of the thousand children of Flora—trembling on the vine leaves and on the grapes, and hanging circles of jewels around many a drooping branch and twig. In every form the dew is pleased to take, it is beautiful, whether it be the minute drops that vanish as soon as they touch the grass blade, or those that linger long after the sun is up. Wherever we see the dew, it is beautiful, when faintly discerned at twilight, or when the stars mirror their dim rays in the crystal globes, or when the moonbeams are full and clear, or when they catch the first glimpses of the morning light. How I have loved to pour out the glassy drops into my hand from the flower cup, and watch the varying beauty as they danced on the flesh, and seemed to smile and frown as I bore them to the light and then to the shade! And to see them as they rest on the grass, or tasseled corn, or feathery grain, when the slanting moonbeams fall there—how beautiful! Or when beneath the same light, they repose on the golden fruit of the orchard, and roll, when the gathering is too great, into the lap of the curled leaves, providing nectar for the birds, who at morn eagerly stretch out their necks and open their bills from the branch beneath, to catch the cool drink as it falls. When with wonderful ingenuity they shake the twig above the nest in spring time, it is a pleasant sight to see the dew fall into the open mouths of the young, stilling their cries, and causing the delighted parent to give forth his sweetest song with a clear throat. The dew is always beautiful, in all its forms and wherever it shows itself; and so is holiness. In all its forms and manifestations, holiness proves its claims to be ranked among the loveliest of human attractions. It belongs to the diviner beauties; and it is a proof of the goodness of our nature that we are able to appreciate this order of loveliness, and as oft as we behold its brighter manifestations, to desire its possession. The beauty of the dew is pureness reflecting heaven's light; and what is the beauty of holiness but purity of soul reflecting the heavenly light of love and truth; therefore, O maiden, if thou wouldst be lovely, seek purity of heart by giving all thy powers to christian truth, that it may transform every affection into angel beauty, and make thee lovely in holiness—'the ornament of the beloved of God.' The beauty of holiness will give charms to the countenance it can borrow from no other source—charms that will endure—charms which will make the presence of the immortal to be confessed. O I have heard woman mourn departing beauty; crying out against destiny and wishing to die young, lest human love should be outlived, and there should be no tenderness in the eye that gazes upon her. Sad picture is it thus to see woman lament! Man has called her an angel, and she has so truly believed it as to forget to seek an angel's dowry and make her spirit a sister to the angels. Had she sought thus to make herself, she would ever feel young, for angels never grow old, and her beauty would be unfading and fadeless. Calm, steady progression would be the glory of her life, and she would never be left to mourn over flowers planted in youth, but no longer flowering, and to weep in weakness like those who have fed

'Too much upon the lotus fruits
Imagination yields,—fruits which unfit
The palate for the more substantial food
Of our own land—reality.'

5. We should speak of the fertility of dew, for in the East this quality makes it the object of great love and value. 'The dew of heaven' was promised as a signal favor, and it was often the life of the vegetables in that hot climate. The abundance of dew often bestowed may be in some degree imagined by a reference to the account of Gideon's fleece, where we are told of his wringing out at morning 'a bowl-ful of water.' As dew supplied the want of rain, and was essential to the fruitfulness of vegetative life, it became an eloquent metaphor for the richest blessings; and a fearful curse was in the invocation, 'Ye mourn-

tains of Gilboa, let there be no dew upon you! When the prophet speaks of the deliverance of the people from captivity, he draws a striking figure from the dew when he says, 'Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust; for thy dew is as the dew of herbs;' i. e. the dew of the dawn, bright, betokening the approach of day, and thus fruitful with hope. And O is not holiness fruitful as the dew in the East? Verily, it is; and if the anxious heart earnestly prayed for the blessing of the dew upon his land, much more should we plead for the blessings of holiness upon our hearts, that they may be fruitful to the praise and glory of God. Our joy should be to hold fast to the precious promises of love divine, and by cleansing ourselves from all vileness, to perfect holiness in the fear of God. Ah! we must be fruitful indeed in good ere we can perfect holiness; but our duty is, and our joy should be, to aim to that end, using all the aids granted us by the merciful and helping Spirit. Then shall we be fruitful in blessings unto others, and our reward will be great. 'Herein,' said Jesus, 'is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples.' 'The fruits of righteousness are, by Jesus Christ, unto the praise and glory of God,' saith Paul; and he saith also, that 'the fruit of the Spirit is in all goodness, and righteousness, and truth.'

I must leave my theme, for I have dwelt far longer upon it than I intended to; yet the time and thought have not been illy expended if one mind shall thereby be led to think deeply and to profit on the origin, beauty, and fruitfulness of true holiness, which alone can beget in the soul that sympathy with divine things by which God is seen in his works, adored in his providence, and glorified for the redemption he hath purposed in himself for all mankind—

When his Spirit shall in their spirits shine,
As shines a sunbeam in a drop of dew."

A Vision.

THE cool eve of a summer's day;
I wandered where the waters play;
The moon's soft light around me lay,
The green boughs o'er me hung.
I always loved that little nook,
And nestled down beside the brook,
Upon its shining face to look,
And shadows o'er it flung.

The blossoms round sweet perfume threw,
From lips all wet with evening dew;
The fire-flies danced as if they knew
No one around them wept.

I thought of pure and holy things,
'Till lulled by lays my brooklet sings,
And fanned by some kind seraph's wings,
I dropped my lids and slept.

I dreamed of all things wild and free,
And angel forms there came to me,
Of those who shared my childhood's glee,
Who still live in my heart.
But one there came, a being bright,
Whose soul long since had taken flight,
Which shadowed o'er my spirit's light,—
She of me seemed a part.

As she drew near her earthly goal,
Her whispers fell upon my soul,
Softer than ocean's softest roll
E'er sounds to mermaid's ear.
She clasped me as in days of yore,
And bade me weep for her no more,
For she was happier on that shore,
Where friends part not as here.

She told me of the spirit's home;
And O, I longed with her to roam
Beyond the blue and 'starlit dome,'
And dwell in angel bower;
I even strove to spread the wing,
To search for joys earth cannot bring,
But found I was a mortal thing
Without one angel power.

'Adieu! adieu!' she sweetly said,—
'I must away to mother's bed,
To still the throb of her aching head,
For God has willed it so.
Adieu! adieu! I'll e'er be nigh
To soothe your pain and dry the eye,
And I will come when thou must die,
With thee to heaven go.'

She spread her wings to the balmy breeze,
And soon was lost 'mid darkling trees,
While I was left on bended knees,
Musing on all she'd spoke;
'Till filled with joy, that one so pure
Should stoop to earth my ills to cure,
'Twas more than sleep could long endure,
And suddenly I woke.

My little brook was babbling still,
The brilliant flies yet danced at will,
The same light rested on the hill,
As did an hour before;
I sought my home and bowering vine,
But still those eyes looked into mine,
Those soft white arms would round me twine,
I did not wish for more.

Though years have passed since that blest eve,
I ne'er have felt lost joys to grieve,
Or rising wish this world to leave,
But her bright form would come;
To teach me of the bliss above,
Where all unveiled is God's free love,
And joy shall all our pulses move,
Our own eternal home.

The Rose of Sharon.

'THE ROSE OF SHARON: a Religious Souvenir for 1842. Edited by Miss Sarah C. Edgerton. Boston: A. Tompkins and B. B. Mussey. 1842.' pp. 302.

IN our notices of the forth-coming of this work, we have fully expressed our opinion of it, which we need not here repeat. Our peculiar relations to the editor and the work, must be our apology for not attempting anything like an elaborate review of it, as we might not be regarded as a sufficiently unprejudiced judge. Yet we may be allowed to say that we are fully persuaded the volume is worthy of the patronage of all the friends of religious literature—of all who rejoice to sustain a work of the character which has been accorded to the former volumes of this by the candid.

The first qualities that attract the attention are the binding and plates, which are fully equal, if not superior to last year's. We think we may safely say, that an improvement in the plates will be perceived by all, and they are certainly of an interesting character and beautifully executed. They are four in number besides the frontispiece, which is one extra, or more than the previous volumes contained.

The opening article is by one who is well worthy to lead—Mrs. L. J. B. Case, and is entitled, 'Therida; a tale of the Northmen.' We regard this article in all respects equal, at least, to any that has ever appeared in the 'Rose;' and it must deeply gratify every one who loves to greet a polished composition and a story of strong and high wrought interest. We shall not attempt an abridgment of it. We cannot do it justice.

Next comes an admirable poem by T. B. Thayer, entitled, 'The Son of God.' This poem far exceeds any we have ever met with from its author's pen, and eloquent it certainly is. We should like to present the whole, but must content ourself with quoting a stanza or two to give an idea of the measure and loftiness of thought. Our author, with a majestic movement, describes the night of error that hung over the world ere our Savior's advent—then the Birth—then the Preacher and Worker of Miracles—then the Death—and then comes the finale:—

'He sleeps within the sepulchre; and, over hill and plain,
The angel of the night has spread his shadowy wings again.
O, will he wake from out that sleep? The world is hushed in fear,
And, half unconscious, waits to see if God will yet appear.

The long-expected hour has come, the hour of second birth;
But hark! that voice amid the heavens! that thunder-tramp on earth!

The mountains reel from out their place! the valleys quake with fright!

O God! these, these thy heralds are! thou comest in thy might!

Pale Death turns paler still before thy terrible array,
And in his hurried flight he casts his broken chains away!
The Grave, betrayed, with trembling hand, unbolts its iron door;
And lo! O God, thy Son comes forth, and lives for evermore!

Then peal again the triumph-hymn along the earth and sky;
Sublime the truth that stands revealed, MAN CANNOT WHOLLY DIE!
But in the glorious spirit world, redeemed from sin and strife,
From God's own hand he shall receive the crown of endless life!

We are next presented with 'Our Metropolis,' by J. G. Adams. This is an interesting contribution, and will be read with pleasure. Boston deserves the commendations he has pronounced upon her, and those who read this article will learn why to us Boston is the beloved city—city of our birth and pride.

Next in order, we are presented with a pretty poem by Mrs. C. M. Sawyer—'The Spring where the Willow Tree grows.' The scene is thus described in the opening verse:

'I know a green lane that leads down to a spring,
Where all the long summer the bob-o'-links sing.
Across it a willow its long branches throws,
Beneath whose cool shadows 't is sweet to repose.
The bright, yellow cowslips grow thick on each side,
And fresh-water cresses are rocked on its tide.
Long years have gone by since I sat on that spot,
A fond, dreamy girl, but 't is not yet forgot!
O softly and sweetly and gently it flows,
That spring on whose margin the willow-tree grows!

Here is a tribute we are glad to greet, 'Barney Hill,' by H. Ballou 2d. It is a beautiful descriptive poem, pleasant and musical.

Next is a poem to accompany the plate of 'Ruth and Boaz,' by S. C. E.

And here is an article of which, we suppose, we cannot be allowed to say anything, because it is 'The Knitting Society,' by Mrs. E. A. Bacon. Yet we must say of the subject, that it is a New England Sketch, and those who have read the 'Christian Graces' in the Repository, may know what to expect in reference to style, &c.

'Tale of an Invalid,' by one who never writes ill—Mrs. J. H. Scott. This poem will not permit us to take a leaf as a specimen of the flower.

'The Ideal of a True Life,' a fragment of an unwritten lecture, by Horace Greeley, one of the most vigorous and the best writers in the country. We have but one fault to find with this article and that is—it is too small a fragment.

'Night Studies of the Artist,' a Poem, by Miss S. C. Edgerton. The subject of this poem was drawn from the life of Blake the artist, who lived in an ideal world most of his time, possessing a strange power to call into his presence the forms of the great and the good of history, so that he sketched them on the canvas, as though he had real sitters. The poem is a fine one, of deep interest.

'The Greek Maiden,' by Miss M. A. Dodd. This is most certainly an excellent composition—a tale of great interest, and must engage the sympathies of every reader of sensibility. It bears us back to the time of the apostle Paul's labors in Athens, and when trials unknown to our age met the determinate christian. The article is highly creditable to the author—who always interests her readers.

Here is a poem for which we must find a place in our pages next month, 'The Death of Murray,' by Mrs. L. J. B. Case.

'Burns,' by A. B. Grosh. This is the longest article in the book. It is a vindication of the poet from the unjust charges too often made against him. Much, very much has of late been written upon 'Burns,' and the theme is still a fruitful one. With the editor of the New Yorker we say, 'That Burns erred, we know and feel; but let us do justice to the sincerity of his penitence, and compassionate the strength of impulse that led to the wrong.'

'What's done we partly may compute,
But know not what's resisted.'

After all our regret for his infirmities, we must take him as he was, for he could not have been Robert Burns, the child of song, of impulse, and of tenderness, the pious, sensitive, and independent man, struggling with adversity, his fine spirit wrought to desperation by the pressure of poverty and a hard, unsympathising destiny, had he not been endowed as he was, mentally and morally.

Here comes next a rich poem on 'Twilight,' by Mrs. S. Broughton. The whole is like the first verse, sweetly musical:

'The sun's last rays are on the stream,
And brightly in the mellow beam,
The tiny, crested wavelets flow,
With murmuring music, soft and low,
As when the Peril of the deep
Within their choral chambers sweep,
With silvery touch, their breathing shells,
Or zephyrs ring the wildflower bells,
When night her silent watch has set,
And stars in ether-halls are met.'

Another very beautiful poem, rich in description and holy thought, 'Filial Love,' by S. C. E. And then, by the same, comes an admirable tale entitled 'Rosalie.' We are confident that the tender beauty of this article will be confessed by all who read it with sympathy for wonder working love, manifesting itself as strongly in the sister as in any other relation in life.

And here is our own contribution, 'Acted Poetry,' then another poem by Mrs. Sawyer, 'Let me die Young,' and a sketch by S. C. E., 'The Stolen Boy.' The next we give entire, 'Casual Counsel,' by H. Greely:

"What readest thou there, my fair-haired boy,
With eye so soft and blue?
What spell has chilled the tide of joy,
Which late thy veins ran through?"
Up looked he from that page of fear,
(Such dread our race inherits,)
And spoke the title, low but clear,
"The World of Evil Spirits."

"Hand me the book, my gentle friend,
And let me o'er it glance,
Whilst thou a patient hearing lend
To what I may advance.
'Spirits of Evil,'—ah, my child!
They are of fearful might:
'T is well thou seek'st to shun their guile.—
Be sure thou seek'st aright!

"Devils!—Ah yes, in this world of woe,
They throng each trodden street,
By day, by night—where the lonely go,
Or where the joyous meet;
But dread them not in shapes like this,—
Absurd,—grotesque,—abhorred;
Ah no! they revel in forms of bliss,
And shine at the sparkling board!

"In glossy suit,—perchance of black,—
The Devil is oft arrayed;
While the dapper boot on his sinister foot
Does honor to Crispin's trade.
Ah! not by outward shape of fear
Is the cunning Devil shown;
But the gamester's wile or the scoffer's sneer
Shall make his presence known.

"Witches! Ah yes, they too, abound;
But ne'er in a garb like this;
They rather in silks than rags are found,
And betray, as of old, with a kiss.
When the witch looks out from a wanton's eye,
Or up from the ruby bowl,
Then, if thou wouldst not to Virtue die,
Stand firm in thy strength of soul!

"Ghosts! Ah, my child! dread spectres they
That tell of our wasted powers;
The short-lived elves of Folly's day;
The ghosts of our murdered hours—
Of friendship broken, love estranged,
Of all that our hearts condemn;
Of Good repelled to Evil changed—
Beware, my boy! of them!"

'The Forest Grave,' by Mrs. J. H. Scott. A tender poem, full of that sacred melancholy which gives a touching sweetness to nearly all Mrs. Scott's writings.

'The Mysterious Tell Tale,' by C. F. Le Fevre.

This is a reminiscence of the fancies of a childhood, when the discovered rogue wonders how his guardians know so much of secret matters. It is a pleasant article.

'The Recluse,' by Miss S. C. E. This we must find room for, that our readers may feel what we would say.

'T is the rich hour of sunset. Through the pane
Of the old cloistral window streams the tide
Of glorifying light, which for a dower
The dying day leaves to the earth it loves.
The scented jasmine hangs its starry flowers
Around the antique casement, where the light
Enters with noiseless step, and with the touch
Of its own beautiful lip imparts a seal
Of love to youth's fair brow,—a brow
As pure as though wild thought had never dwelt Within its regal palace.

There she knelt
With her fair hands clasped on the Book of Life,
And a small jeweled crucifix upraised
Devoutly, as it might have been by one
Whose hands had touched the wounds, the bleeding wounds
In the Redeemer's side. O beautiful
In younger days had been that dimpled face,
Now turned with a serener loveliness
Toward Heaven, which ever seems so near and bright
To a grief-chastened heart. The royal blood
Of France throbbed in her pulses, and had lent
Its softest blush to her round delicate cheek,
And to her merry lip the brightest hue
Of its too passionate crimson. She had moved
In princely courts, and been the cynosure
Of eyes that worshiped with an eloquence Lips dared not utter. Even a monarch's heart
Had felt the witchery of her smiles, and laid
Its love, like a voluptuous incense, at the shrine
Of her too dazzling beauty.

But it passed,—
All passed, and she is here; more blest, I deem,
Than in her gayer hours, though grief hath laid
Its surgeon hand upon her heart, and left
Some aching wounds. O truly blest alone
Are they, who by the wondrous deeds of Time,
Gentle or stern, have learned the holy peace
Which dwells with God. Who have been taught to seek
A deeper love from Him; a love more pure
And firm than that which lives in human hearts,
And throws a transient glory o'er the earth.

What now to her are courtly splendors? What
The lulling voice of flattery and love?
She has a hope in heaven, and earth's wild lights
Wax dim before its glory. Peace with her
Makes its abiding home; and though the world,
With its consuming pleasures comes not here,
Yet the gray cloistral wall hath not shut out
The cry of human suffering. Its low tones
Thrill through her silent heart, and she has learned
How sweet it is to comfort and to bless.
O say not they are sad to whom earth leaves
The humblest usefulness. There is no joy
In life like doing good to those who need.'

'The Schoolmates,' a prose article by Mrs. N. T. Munroe. This we know will be admired, for it is one of Mrs. Munroe's most finished compositions, full of interest, and rich suggestive thoughts. We cannot select any portion without injury to the whole, and must therefore refer our readers to the book itself; which reference we trust our brief notices will hasten them to make.

The volume closes well with a very excellent poem by E. H. Chapin, entitled 'The Beautiful.' Read this passage on Flowers:

'The Flowers are beautiful, on the hills,
Out in green paths by shadowed rills,
In woodlands sweet, where fountains flow,
In bright fair places that young hearts know.
In nooks of the desert, on mountains high,
They gladden the traveler's weary eye,
And meet him, wherever his footsteps roam,
With a smile of love and a breath of home.
Mystic, they stand in the morning's light,
As if angels had shed them abroad by night;
Rooted in earth, looking up to the sky,
Like hopes in the soul, of its destiny.
They clamber free by the rich man's door,
They stoop to the touch of the lowliest poor,
And at childhood's laugh and childhood's eye,
They thrill, as with pulses of sympathy.
At the altar, they bloom in the bride's bright hair,
At the grave, they are wreathed by the mourner there,
And gently above the dead they lie,
Like earnest of immortality.'

Read also the conclusion:

'Thou by whose fiat all beings have life,
And each, in its season, with beauty is rife,
The glories beneath, the glories above,
Interpreters are of thy Wisdom and Love.
May we read them,—their pages are glowing and free,—
And learn from them lessons of Duty and Thee!
May our spirits be pure, their innermost strings
In harmony tuned to all beautiful things,
Bringing forth evermore in the depths of the soul,
In order and light, like the planets that roll,
The thoughts and affections that in them should be;
The love for mankind and the service of Thee,
The efforts and labors of Duty, sublime,
All of them beautiful, each in its time!'

We hope these brief notices will serve to incline the reader to believe that the 'Rose' for 1842 is really worthy of attention, and that it will be an ornament on the table and a pleasant intellectual companion. Minds of a different taste and judgment than ours, would select other portions of the volume as specimens of its beauties, so that the reader of this article must by no means imagine that we culled anything like the most of the gems. We look for an extensive sale of the work, and shall be glad to greet it wherever we mingle in social life. And wherever we do meet it, we shall think we have found one indication, at least, of good taste. B.

Summer's Departure.

'The summer's the season that's dearest to me.'

MARY HOWIT.

My heart is sad, for summer is departing! Summer, in which my soul luxuriates amid the beautiful of the verdant creation, and I feel that ten thousand pulses of gladness answer every joyous beat of my heart. Summer is my delight. It has to me more images of glory and blessedness than all the other seasons combined; and fewer thoughts of human wretchedness are in my mind than at any other portion of the year. When a fine warm day comes in the winter, how exultingly does the heart exclaim, 'What a beautiful day for the poor!' It is so all through the summer with me—it is all one bright day for the poor. The little ones can sit out in the open air and play by the running and musical streams—chase the bright winged insects and be charmed by the birds—flee to the woods and pluck the berries and easily satisfy their wants; but in winter they must be to bed early and rise late, and remain for weary days caged in uncomfortable homes.

How glad I was yesterday, when I passed by a small cottage, to see the sight I there saw—thy smiles, O summer! gave it all its beauty. It was past sunset, and the father had returned from his work and sat on the cottage threshold, with a child at either knee, one telling him of the pleasant day at school and the ramble after school hours, and the other relating the wonders he had discovered among the flowers and the birds, and each asking a multitude of questions. The weariness of the day's hard labor was all forgotten as there he conversed with those fresh hearts, and answered their queries. The good dame was near by, leaning over his shoulder, with a hand on either side of the door, full of joy as she watched the little tottering form that was driving the straggling chicken to the covert, scaring it with his laughter and shouts. The father looked forward into the little garden before him, and rejoiced in the growing things he saw there; and as he turned his head and looked up to his wife, I could not but think he was uttering some expression of thankfulness for her care and diligence in his absence. He rose to enter the cultivated plat of ground as I passed, and I could not but recall Mary Howit's poem on the poor man's garden, and went on saying to myself,

'Ah, yes the poor man's garden!
It is great joy to me,
This little, precious piece of ground
Before his door to see.

* * * * *
All day upon some weary task
He toiled with good will;
And back he comes, at set of sun,
His garden-plot to till.

* * * * *
And there is his potato-bed,
All well-grown, strong, and green;
How could a rich man's heart leap up
At anything so mean!

But he, the poor man, sees his crop,
And a thankful man is he,
For he thinks all through the winter
How rich his board will be!

And how his merry little ones
Beside the fire will stand,
Each with a large potato
In a round and rosy hand.

* * * * *
And there, on Sabbath evenings,
Until the stars are out,
With a little one in either hand,
He walketh all about.'

He walketh, methinks, with a calm aspect—an aspect that reproves my murmuring that summer is departing. I will heed the lesson, and look out upon the beauty before me without shadowing thoughts, learning holy instructions from what must soon pass away. It tells me of opportunities for improvement and for doing good, which are now around me, but will soon be gone. It reminds me of the sacred injunction, 'Let them that love the Lord be as the sun, when he goeth forth in his might'—to bring to maturity the fruitfulness of spring. Our love of the Lord can best be shown by maturing the good desires and sacred affections of our hearts, that they may produce abundant fruit; by giving full growth to the virtuous principles sown in our early being, and increasing in excellence as those should on whom is bestowed the best of ripening influences from on high. Thus shall we be as the sun when he goeth forth in his might—in his full power and strength. And then will our

'Free spirits, innocently gay,
Enjoy the most that innocence can give,
Those wholesome sweets that border virtue's way—
Those cooling fruits, that we may taste and live.'

Summer is departing! O I grieve to bid it farewell, for with it goes so many symbols and types of heavenly things. But it must depart, for the high ordinance of heaven cannot be defeated; and soon the luxuriance that now delights will vanish. It has fulfilled its mission, and wherefore should it be delayed? I will bow as I have bowed when the beautiful young have passed in their loveliness from earth. I know not whither the beauties—the hues and glories of summer vanish to; but I feel that heaven is the home of the departed loveliness of our friends. No winter comes to them.

* They walk with God,
High in salvation, and the climes of bliss.' n.

How much better it is to go round among the destitute, the sick and the infirm, and assist by our aid and counsels, than to spend our means in debauchery and idleness.

Sermons in Stones.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

STERN, bold and mysterious, on the mountain-tops and in the river-beds, by the glens of the 'elf-folk,' and in the caverns of the sea, rise up the world-old rocks in the pride of their antediluvian years. They are the historians of another and a younger world; of nations buried beneath the ruins of time, physical change and centuried ignorance, where the lamp of science can illuminate only here and there wild fragmentary vestiges of a strange existence, in which the animated tribes were of forms whose giant symmetry is forever jointed with the past, and where vegetation had yet learned only the simpler rules of her Doric sculpture.

While the earth was yet 'without form and void,' 'the Spirit of Elohim moved upon the face of the waters.' What the immediate results of its operations might be, the inspired historian has not affirmed, but the rocks in their auto-biographies have recorded themselves as the product of Divine genesis, and more ancient than any principle of created life. Masses of primordial strata, thrown up by those passion-fires which for nearly sixty centuries have been burning in the bosom of the earth, stand around us as witnesses of an original formation, whose elements could have been borrowed from no anterior decay, and consequently must have come forth as they now exist, natural compounds from the creative Spirit of God.

Wonderful, grand old rocks! what giant caskets are ye of poetry and mystery! And you, ye later offspring of the fallen monarchs of the wood, ye deluge-born masses of transmuted life petrified while the very hearts were beating in their cells; what oracles are ye of the unwritten and fathomless sublimities of God! What chronicles of life, and death, and by-gone worlds are involved in your sealed and flinty tomes! The stone-grown bones of the huge mastodon, the Goliath of beasts, lie entombed in your magnificent sepulchres. There, too, sleep the mammoth palm and the club-moss seventy feet in height! The degenerate lichens which seek a precarious existence upon our walls, may look upon the fossil-bones of their royal ancestors, and exclaim in truth, 'There were giants in those days!'

Neither are ye voiceless, ye sentinels of the past! The traveler by the Orinoco, and the wanderer amongst the rocks of the Thebiad, testify that when the earliest smile of the returning sun rests upon your bosoms, voices of melody come forth like the breaking of the chords of a lyre. So, also, spake the statue of Memnon, that miracle of old, whom science has degraded to a senseless block, speaking not as the oracle of the gods, but upon the simplest principle of philosophy.

And you, ye timeworn Sagas of those who bowed the knee to the gods of Calhalla! By our river-sides have ye stood for centuries, bearing witness to the emprise of those who came from 'the dark Norse mountains,' and sung the songs of the Scalds by our wilderness shore 'long time ago!' The spirit of Odin is upon you, but a mightier than Odin shall be discerned in your decaying sculpture, even Jehovah, and 'his hand-writing upon the wall!'

Nor may we pass idly by the 'black stone' of the Caaba, on which the pilgrim Moslem imprints seven kisses in testimony of his devotion to the renowned prophet of Allah. In every age and in every clime the human heart clings to some tangible witness of the Divine; and whether it be the silver-circled stone of the Caaba or the simple passion-flower that luxuriates beneath the tropic sun, the war-cry of Mohammed is written upon leaf and tablet, and finds an echo in every heart, 'There is no God but God!'

Proud old rocks! strewn over the plains and mountain-tops of our great world, ye are preaching to us of the past in voices manifold and strange. From your shapeless masses the artist has wrought out his glorious dreams, has given human beauty, and the expression of a soul to the senseless grain of the block, has sculptured you into delicate flowers and voluptuous fruits, and given to you forms of grace and godlike majesty. He has set you above the consecrated spots of the past, and made you the ostensible oracles of the future. Oh many voices have ye, wild old rocks, whether standing in crumbling magnificence by the shores of the proud old Nile, or in native and undisturbed solemnity looking down upon the 'cataract monarch' of this newer and happier world.

Solemn preachers, indeed are ye, standing like faithful sentinels above the dust that perishes. Sculptured in columns and classic temples, or simply chiselled with the common Hic-jacet—the only posthumous fame we need—ye point out the resting-places of the loved, and tell us what is 'hallowed ground.' Not monuments of ruin are ye,—no!—but stepping-stones to the eternal world;—land-marks on the way to Heaven! Beneath you lies all of us which can perish—the poor unthinking form which the soul for a little while deigned to make its home, and we love to kneel above the dust, at times, and weep; but ye are pointing us to an imperishable home in the heavens, where no land-mark is needed to tell us of the presence of the loved, for there they shall be with us forevermore, and their monuments shall be the love of God, and the joy of heaven.

The old Grave-yard.

THERE is a spot where well I love to stray,
Though in the haunts of busy men it sleeps,
Like some green island in the restless sea,
Round which the ever-tossing billow sweeps

Within the low enclosure all is peace,
No anxious, rambling cares, disturb the breast;
Life's turmoil, toil, and fever, there must cease,
The weary frame there finds a quiet rest.

No costly monuments of pride are there,
Wealth's gorgeous trappings all are laid aside;
The rose, or lily, watch'd with tender care,
Or simple head-stone, tells the loved have died.

No yew tree casts its gloomy shadows there,
No weeping willow there doth darkly wave,
Wild locusts fling their fragrance on the air,
And their white blossoms strew upon the grave.

Well were ye chosen, gentle wildings, well,
To deck the place where our beloved repose,
For in the alphabet of heaven, ye tell
Of love, that not e'en conquering death subdues.

And yet when life is o'er, its pulses stilled,
I would not that ye lay me there to sleep;
Already, are its sacred precincts filled,
Disturb not, then, a rest so still and deep.

No; rather make my grave 'mid stranger dead,
Than mar the verdure of that holy sod;
What matter where we lay the weary head,
When the soul revels in the smiles of God.

Tribute to the Memory of the Dead.

DIED in Wrentham, on the 14th July, DR. SAMUEL BUGBEE, aged 60.

THE artist of ordinary talent may obtain an accurate portrait of the body, but it is the master only, who has power to make his sheet instinct with the beamings of mind. And when even he would cause the votive canvass to give forth the vivid rays of intellect, and to utter in looks the varied workings of the gifted soul, he finds he has a task before him on which all his powers may be exhausted; and even then he shall acknowledge that he has succeeded in tracing but the shadow which is cast from his subject by the light of life!

So with the one who would portray the character of man. One possessed of but ordinary skill, may, perhaps, present satisfactorily the lineaments of an ordinary mind; but who, save a master, shall be able to describe the workings of a soul of surpassing strength and energy; which, ever active, and ever varying in the emission of its light, with manifest desire to reach every corner of the minds with which it came in contact, seemed to live only to pour the exuberance of its own vivacity over every soul with which it had intercourse in the world.

It will not be expected then, that one who holds the feeble and unpractised pen of the writer, shall attain to any thing like doing full justice to the character of the subject of this notice; nor, indeed will this be attempted, for many other reasons besides his conscious incapacity to accomplish the object. I shall attempt to do little more than to take such notice of the truly gifted and benevolent subject of my remarks, as a brief acquaintance, under circumstances calculated to lead to the inner recesses of the soul, and to disclose there a heart throbbing with philanthropy inspired by the impulses of religious truth, has suggested.

Dr. Bugbee had for many years been a practising physician of great eminence and success, in his native town and county where he also closed his useful life. And in his arduous calling, his labors were almost incessant by night and by day. For beside the constant drafts made upon his superior skill, the warm and generous impulses of a heart sensitive to human suffering, led him with the same cheerful alacrity to the rudest hovel where penury has her abode, and, whence he knew that other compensation than the 'luxury of doing good' was not to be expected, with which he would repair to the mansions of the sick, and suffering rich, where he knew that his pecuniary reward was ample and sure. And from circumstances which will yet be named, together with the peculiar qualities of his mind, he was always enabled to go as a messenger of comfort and peace, even where the inveteracy of disease prevented his going as a messenger of health to the suffering.

It was from his own lips that I received the narration of the principal incidents of his life, especially as influenced by the great subject of religion; to present which to the reader, is the leading object of the writer in this paper. But the circumstances under which they were communicated,—the deep and strong emotion which moved their utterance, together with the strong workings of a masterly mind in unfolding its own career, gave a majesty, and even a sublimity to the scene, which inspired such emotions in my own mind, as I have not the most distant hope of imparting to the mind of the reader.

In the domestic circle, Dr. Bugbee was as the sun in the visible creation, giving life, light, and fruitfulness to all. The power that moved him in the discharge of its various and important duties, was not the fitful glow of fondling passion that moves the grosser mind; but the deep exhaustless fountain of a tender regard, constantly welling up from a heart overflowing with kindness to all. The counsels of a well-stored mind given to deep reflection, and of a vivid intellect quick to perceive the bearings of any subject, constituted the power by which he ruled, or rather swayed the minds of those committed to his parental charge; and a love such as warms the good husband's and father's heart, made his counsels effective and the circle blest. Gladness and joy were ever within their dwelling, save when sickness, or suffering beyond human control, cast a shade over their happy home. With this kind of suffering, however, the family had, in latter years, been painfully familiar. A few years since, they were deprived of a beloved and promising son, who was killed in Boston, by accidentally falling from a window to the pavement below. About four years since, by that dread disease consumption, by whose almost noiseless and unsuspected step, so many are hurried from the joyous scenes of earth, they were deprived of their beloved Harriette Francœur, whose many superior and amiable qualities moulded by the mild influence of the Gospel of Peace, had rendered her not only one of the most valued links in the household chain, but even extorted the confession from a clergyman of an opposite faith, that 'she had lived before her associates an eminent pattern of every virtue.' And more recently their eldest son just entering on the busy scenes of manhood, as a practising physician, for which he had been amply qualified, was by over-exertion in study,—prompted by an ambition to render himself eminently useful in his profession, bereft of reason, and is now a maniac in a retreat for the insane, and (I believe) without prospect of his restoration to his mind.

These afflictions were all borne by the family with christian fortitude and submission;—and by none more so than by the subject of my notice.

It was at the funeral of his cherished daughter before named, that I learned from his lips most of the incidents I record. I had been called to minister the consolations of the gospel to the family in their affliction;—and at the close of the funeral solemnities, when they, in christian trust, had committed the body to the grave, and the pure soul to God, the family were assembled at the request of their respected head, to listen to a recital of the workings of his mind; and to learn from him the rich sources of consolation, and sustaining hope which he found in the christian religion,—and the high estimation in which he held it, as a soother of the sorrows of the afflicted.

I have often thought of this occasion with emotions of peculiar satisfaction. For although I was called there as one whose office it was to impart instruction and solace, yet I was myself the instructed, and I trust was made better by the interview.

It was here I learned from an experienced mind—a mind schooled alternately in the three prominent halting places of the soul, Partialism, Infidelity, and Universalism or christianity, to set even an increased value on the christian religion, as manifesting the grace of God which bringeth salvation to all men.

In youth Dr. Bugbee had been educated in the systems of those who taught the doctrine of unending misery for a part of the intelligent creation of God, as resulting from the DECREE of the Divine Being, according to the orthodoxy of Calvin. To such orthodoxy, however, he always felt a strong repugnance on the ground of its unnatural cruelty. But as his mind, with the increase of years put on that strength and vigor, for which it was distinguished, he turned for the exercise of its religious powers, from human systems, which constituted the prevailing religion of that day, to the works of God, as manifested in creation. He had been religiously taught that the Bible conveyed tidings of endless wretchedness for some of the creatures of God, and that, by positive decree;—he had heard this often, and solemnly asserted, by those professing to be the ministers and expounders of the word, as the doctrine of the Bible;—and he was soon led, as all clear, and unprejudiced minds must be, on due reflection, to discover that that doctrine admitted from the Bible, then God's works, and the word ascribed to him, are at irreconcilable odds.

The voice of nature in the beauty, harmony, and wisdom of creation, speaks eloquently to the soul of the goodness and beneficence of the Creator, both in design and execution. The testimonies to this truth are enstamped on every object; and the soul made keenly susceptible to the impressions of such goodness could not remain unmoved, nor unaffected. True, that which was called religious education, was strong;—but the power of truth to him was stronger. Without even suspecting that the word of God had been misinterpreted to his mind,—that the doctrine which brought discord between the works and word of God, was but an adjunct, which the weakness of human wisdom had fastened to it;—without even dreaming that the ministers of that doctrine, to whom he had been instructed to look up with reverence, as oracles of wisdom, could possibly be in error, he was forced, from evidence which he could not resist, to regard the works of God as true, in evincing the divine goodness—and hence, that which was called his word—being in opposition to them, false. Thus circumstanced he rejected the Bible, and avowed infidelity! The coldness of its death-like hand was on him, and he lived for many years, (I believe nearly twenty) with no ray of light resting on his mind, to lead him in hope beyond the narrow boundaries of earth. But with this he was unsatisfied—he was restless. And he would often feel that if human being were thus bounded, the gift of life were an enigma which he could not solve; and he would mentally exclaim,

Why am I here life's evanescent hour,
The sport of fortune, and the mock of power?
If all beyond be never ending night,
Why urged to drink a moment's fitful light?

He was frequently invited by his friends to listen to the preaching of Methodists, and of other Arminian sects, who held the doctrine of endless misery as resulting not by decree, but by the fallibility of man; in the hope that he might see, in their systems, something to engage his mind. But all to no purpose. In all these he saw, still, the haggard and hideous form of relentless cruelty. To him the God who permits the infinite and endless wretchedness of the dependent being whom he creates, through weakness of the nature given, and the God who decrees the suffering, were one. Nor could he discover a shade of difference in the moral character of the cause, or in the wretchedness of the doom. Still there was the cruel fiend of endless torture! still the contradiction between the works, and so called word of God! and still the scarcely more satisfying alternative of infidelity was adhered to.

But at length, after a lapse of some twenty years thus spent in darkness, light unexpectedly broke upon the Doctor's mind. That doctrine was making progress in community which disencumbers the divine word of that cruel, and abhorrent sentiment which man has added to it; and presents the religion of the Bible, as but the religion of nature shining in the gospel of Jesus, with a freer and a fuller light.

Our venerable father Ballou was invited by some friends, to bear his testimony to the christian doctrine of divine and universal goodness, in the town where the Dr. resided. The minister of the limited faith of that day, became alarmed, and supposing, perhaps in sincerity that his flock was in danger of being exposed to the ravages of a wolf, he determined for once at least, to imitate the good shepherd, and stand for their defence. He determined to attack the preacher of universal grace, in the presence of his people, and scatter his arguments to the winds. And as a sort of aid in his work, Dr. Bugbee, (infidel as he was,) was invited to be present. He attended; and happy indeed to him was the result. Of the issue of the controversy I need scarcely say, that the assailant was repulsed at every point! But truth gained a mightier victory than merely the repulse of an assailant. To use his own words, Dr. Bugbee there heard 'the first common sense sermon to which he had ever listened in his life, and it was like the fructifying shower, to the parched land. It aroused his attention, and he was induced to enter on that field of investigation, which, after long and patient study, and a critical examination of the New Testament, in both the Greek and English, resulted in his full and firm conviction of the truth of the doctrine of universal salvation through Jesus Christ; and the cordial reception, by faith, of that revealed word of God, which, bearing this doctrine to the world, most beautifully harmonizes with His works; and presents His adorable character in the glorious light of a Father, and an everlasting friend of His intelligent creation. That word, thus disencumbered of all that had rendered it repulsive to the reasoning mind, was gladly revered as a guide to duty, and to God. And to use again the Doctor's own language, it presented to his mind the most beautiful, perfect and harmonious system of natural and moral philosophy which it is possible to conceive; as well as the only system of religion worthy the gift of God, or the reception of man.

Having now received by faith that blessed gospel whose radiance not only makes luminous the path of man below, but pours its effulgence on a blissful futurity and immortality for man, Dr. Bugbee was now, not only prepared to live, but to enjoy life: and to impart the joys of his own mind to others. There was no subject on which he more delighted to dwell, than on the great subject of religion. And, at the time to which I have alluded,—in the presence of his family, he drew a contrast of the then condition of his mind, with what it was in the days of his infidelity, truly melting to the soul; and in colors so vivid as must have made an ineffaceable impression on the minds of his family, and left there a conviction of the gospel's worth which will cause them to cling to it as earth's greatest good, even to the last. He had loved his daughter almost to idolatry—for she was worthy. And no one who knew her could believe the language of her father exaggeration when he declared that 'it would have required a stronger effort in her to disoblige a parental wish, than it would in those who had long lived in vice, to become pure.' But that daughter, in all her loveliness, had bowed, in the stern conflict with disease; and the sensitive soul of her father had been called to drink the bitterest cup ever presented to his lips,—she was in the grave! But still, in the calmness and submission of the christian philosopher, he could lift his confiding soul to heaven, and exclaim, 'Father, not my will but thine be done!'—He could present the cup of christian consolation to his weeping family. And while in the act they were feeling the tenderness of his parental regard, he could with all confidence and trust, point them to a better father—a better friend in heaven, and calm their anguished bosoms by a portraiture of His undying love.

Nor were his labors of love confined to his family alone. From the first of his conversion to the truth as it is in Jesus, it was his delight to go with the gospel's balm, (as a companion of his medical exertions) to the sick and suffering; and when professional skill should fail, he could comfort and console with heavenly truth, and aid the spirits of the expiring to depart in peace! Thus in the hour of their need he proved a blessing to many souls. In the busy walks of life, as an advocate of gospel truth by example, by precept, and by argument, he wielded a great power. He was the friend of virtue, because the friend of man. Animated in all the sympathetic emotions of his soul, by his great and exhaustless theme, his mind was constantly alive to everything that could interest and instruct mankind; and his companionable qualities made his society sought and delighted in by many of every faith. His heart always buoyant—always happy, had in its spontaneous overflowings, in conversation as he always drew upon an inexhaustible fund of wit and anecdote for illustration—often reminded me of the constantly gushing fountain, the spouting of whose waters sent their sparkling spray in every direction, like jewels flashing in the sunshine. But when engaged in argument, especially on the great subject of religion, the workings of a giant intellect quick to perceive and powerful to analyze, were seen. And I can think of no more appropriate object by which to represent him, than the gallant ship ploughing its way in majesty through the ocean; before whose progress the glistening waters leaped and danced, in gladdened testimony to its power! while the strongest argument of opposition was as the feeble shallop that chanced to cross its pathway, and instantly driven to the bottom by its unchecked career!

But in the midst of his usefulness he has gone, yet we thank heaven to a peaceful and honored grave! Yes, he whose skill had frequently arrested the progress of disease in others, has himself yielded to its wasting power. His confinement by sickness was but about two weeks; though the disease of which he died (enlargement of the heart) had been secretly undermining his health for a long time, of which he was well aware; but to spare the feelings of his family, he never intimated it until about six months previous to his death, though he then said it had been fastened upon him for eight years. In consequence of the nature of his disease causing tendency of blood to the head, his mind during the few last days of his life, was less active than usual, and he said but little; yet that little always expressed calmness and resignation, and willingness, yea desire to depart. And conscious that his death was near, a short time before his decease, he called his family around him, and made disposal of such of his temporal affairs as called for his advice, with the utmost calmness and composure, and at length departed

'Like him who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.'

We cannot mourn for him. But the living claim our sympathies. The medical fraternity has lost in his death one of its most useful members and brightest ornaments; society a soul whose every wish was ardent for its prosperity; the cause of Universalism one who had known by painful experience, the comparative worthlessness of all other systems of religion, and who from strong conviction of its importance to the well-being of mankind, was wont to advocate it with an ability which few can equal. The poor and the distressed have lost a constant friend, the sick an able medical adviser and christian counsellor, and the world an honest man.

But his family! his wife and children, those who were wont to bask in the smiles of his ardent faithful love! what shall we say to them, and especially the younger portion of them, who have been bereft of a counsellor and guide of surpassing ability and regard, and at a time, too, when they most needed his aid? As the best expression of our sympathy, we can point them to the example of their departed friend,—his cheerful confidence in God, under every trial—his unabated confidence in prospect of death! And for their comfort and peace, we can affectionately urge them to heed what may be regarded as his dying declaration to a beloved daughter, that 'he thanked God that he had reflected on the subject of religion and made up his mind when he was well, and his reasoning powers strong, and did not put it off till he was called to a sick bed;' and we can urge them to profit by its suggestions, that their last moments may like his be those of resignation and hope. And more than this, we can in the soul's confidence commend them to God and the word of his grace, in the full assurance that the time cometh, when in joy such as earth has never witnessed, they shall meet their departed friend, and all whose death they have had occasion to deplore, where the faith which cheered him here shall be lost in gladdening fruition, and the united family of God shall chant the ceaseless praises of redeeming love!

The Physician to his dying Child.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

'Tis a bright land, my child!
Beauty is smiling in its quiet streams;
Its green savannas, too, are softly wild,
And rich as Eden dreams.

The beautiful young flowers
Are blushing in the vales to woo thee forth;
And there is glory in the noontide hours,
And freshness in the earth.

Here are the gay-winged birds,
Whom thou hast loved so well, my gentle boy;
They come around thee warbling gladsome words,
And hymns of love and joy.

Oh Science! I have knelt
Long years before thee, and have made thy shrine
My dwelling-place, till I have almost felt Thy potency divine.

And now when I would woo
Thy gentle aid for one more dear than life,
I find that thou art powerless to subdue
The spoiler in his strife.

Vainly I've culled the leaf
From the wild brookside, and the woodland slope
To bring him healing; naught but silent grief
Sits in the place of hope.

Alas! my own dear child!
The dearest treasure on this life's rough sea;
How have I worshiped till my love grew wild
In dazzling dreams for thee!

I would go delve the ore,
And bid it minister its healing gift;
And every flower should yield its balmy store
Thy drooping form to lift.

But medicine no wealth
Of life's rich currents can restore to thee;
Dry at their fountains are the springs of health
Beside youth's flowering tree!

My gentle-hearted one,
Look forth once more upon this radiant clime;
Thou art so young thou canst not yet have done
With the loved things of time.

Thy mother sets in tears
By the lone fireside of our northern home,
Waiting in solitude, and grief, and fears,
The hour for thee to come.

Thou shalt return, my child;
Thy mother's kiss will meet thy pale, cold cheek;
But sealed will be the lips that would have smiled—
She will not hear thee speak.

The music from her heart
Will die away; the sweet-toned chord be mute,
Which at thy gentle touch could once impart
Strains like some soft-voiced lute.

Yes, thou shalt go, ere long,
To the dear home so loved by thee and me,
Where the wild blue-bird pours his joyous song,
Upon the old elm tree.

Go—but with pulseless breast,
With pallid cheek, and glazed and sunken eye;
Yes, thou shalt go in the home-tomb to rest,
Where I, too, soon shall lie.

God calls thee hence, my son,
And thou shalt go in his bright place to dwell;
I must not murmur;—may his will be done!
Beloved child, farewell!

A Stray Leaf.

'OH! that I had the wings of a dove, that I might flee away and be at rest.'

THERE are few of us who do not often feel a longing like that of the ancient Hebrew—a longing for rest, far away from the tumult of the world. It is not a fit of misanthropy; no cold contempt of the world, nor desire to shun mankind, but a weary feeling, attendant upon spirits oppressed as ours are with sins, and sorrows, and frailties.

We look in vain for abiding beauty, for unsullied purity, for a peace that will not decay. The mark of frailty is upon every earthly thing, and beauty is ever the earliest to pass away. There is no satisfying fountain, 'no continuing city.' The wandering foot finds no bright oasis in all this wilderness-world; hope casts no anchor in all this shoreless sea.

'This is not our rest.' We feel it every day of our lives, be they bright and joyous, or sad and wearisome. Shadows are continually falling along our paths. Loved ones are stricken, and perish at our sides, and all the ties of the heart are powerless to draw them back to life. We yield them because we must. Not blindly, it is true, for most of us have a degree of christian faith; but unwillingly, even when we believe ourselves most resigned.

And is it to be ever thus? Shall we not sometime partake of the 'glorious rest' of God? Revelation and creation alike assure us of this truth, and yet we mourn. It is a beautiful faith, and yet we distrust it. Why should we? Have we not all assurances, even to the oath of the Most High? Perhaps the cause is chiefly ignorance. We cannot weave a picture of perfect purity and felicity, without making it so glorious as to seem illusive. We dare not believe so blessed a lot will yet be ours, forgetting that the apostle has declared, that 'eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him.'

Obituaries.

JULIUS DODD. It was not with a mere momentary sorrow that we learned the death of Julius, brother of our esteemed correspondent and friend, Miss Mary Ann Dodd. He was a young man of great promise, and we know in some degree the grief of the hearts that have been wrung by his departure, for we have wept as our sister weeps. We know not the particulars of his death, but do know that he has been called in the morning of life, while many felt they could repose much hope in him. We present our christian sympathies to his relatives, particularly to our sister, praying of the God of all comfort that he would grant them that wisdom whereby they may exercise true submission. We rejoice that the richness of our faith is theirs; and may God grant to our sister holily pleasant thoughts as she recalls the words of Jesus to Martha, and receives them in the highest and most glorious sense, 'Thy brother shall rise again!'

WE wish to record an humble testimonial to the worth of one whose departure has touched many hearts with deep felt grief, who was pleasant in her life and beloved in death, Mrs. SARAH C., wife of Eben. F. Gay, and daughter of Philip Adams, of this city, aged 38 years. It seems but yesterday that we saw her in the full glow of health, promising herself many years of life, and blessing her companion by the diligent performance of the duties of the wife and mother. But, alas! we know not that we are sure of our dearest treasures for a day, or how soon mournful desolation may ruin the beauty and gladness of our homes. She is gone—gone no more, save in visions, to enter the home of which she was the chief joy, and one heart more than others is bereft. To him we tender our sympathies, trusting that he may find strength to sustain the trial. May the pleasant memories of the past be dear to him, and speak to him of a world where joy shall be renewed, without fear of parting.

'A man shall be commended according to his wisdom: but he that is of a perverse heart shall be despised. The slothful man roasteth not that which he took in hunting: but the substance of a diligent man is precious. Only by pride cometh contention; but with the well-advised is wisdom. A friend loveth at all times, and a brother is born for adversity.'

Pearls.

Do NOT imagine, reader, that I give this name to the thoughts or ideas to be offered to you, but read on, and you will know the meaning of the caption.—A Presbyterian clergyman by the name of Frame, in North Salem, N. Y., in answer to a respectful letter requesting information where in the Bible could be found the record of a law with death temporal, spiritual and eternal, as its penalty,—ends with the remark—‘I think it my duty to regard the injunction of Him whom I profess to serve, “not to cast pearls before swine!”’ As though a fellow immortal asking for theological information, could be a swine, and proof of the truth of endless misery a pearl! It is in this way that sacred writ is made in common talk to point a jest—to become deprived of its hallowing power by base associations. Does this theological Frame imagine that he really serves Christ when he thus acts? Does he dream that he has thus obeyed the spirit of his Master’s injunction? It is an easy matter to call a fellow being a swine, much easier than it is to prove that the arguments used to support the doctrine of endless torment are pearls; and the attempt to palm them off as such, only show show men can mistake paste for pearl. We know but of one analogy which such arguments can have to pearls, and that is—pearls are excrescences on oysters under the deep waters of warm latitudes—the effects of disease, and it is so with the usual proofs used in support of endless misery; they are the result of disease, while reason has been long buried under the deep and dark waters of mysticism. The divers after the pearl oysters, or shell fish of the oyster kind, find it a perilous business, and are often destroyed by sharks; similar is the fate of those who plunge into the depths of mysticism, to cut off of the rocks of error the clinging shells and basket them. How many find it perilous indeed, and alas! how many have been destroyed! But the unbasketing is like the review of what the pearl diver sometimes brings up—a mockery of hope, no pearls, but a mass of putrifying shells.

Again; pearls in themselves have no value—they belong not to the essentials of life—we can live without them. So with the doctrines of endless misery. Pearls appear beautiful only when pleasure wings the hours, and the glad soul thinks but little of the deep sympathies and highest wants of his being; and so, if ever, it is with these doctrines. When distress and stern anguish come, and the soul is asking for the bread of life, that soul is, when presented with these doctrines, like the traveler in the desert, as, a-hungry and weary, he began to despair, when lo! in the distance he saw a bag on the sands—he leaped to possess it, hoping that it would prove a bag dropped from some caravan that would not miss the food it contained—but alas! he threw it from him with disappointment, and exclaimed—‘Oh! it is only pearls!’ Pearls are the food of pride—of ostentatious aristocracy, and it is so with these aristocratical doctrines; they please pride, the pride that trusts it shall possess a lofty seat.

But when we come to consider the beauty of pearls, how sweetly they rest on the fair, intellectual brow of loveliness, and the value men have set upon them because of their beauty,—then all analogy fails. The doctrines of death eternal have no beauty—they are not in harmony with any order of loveliness, and men have no reason to regard them as valuable. They can be worn only on the brow of despair; for their presence in the hall of rejoicing would be as the taking away of a garment in cold weather, and as vinegar upon nitre. They are all mockery; and if men lament that Linnæus’ discovery of how artificial pearls might be produced from the common river muscle, is lost, never having been published; we must regret with deeper sorrow that the art of making artificial theological pearls should be so well preserved and so frequently and widely published.

In the use made by Mr. Frame, as above, of the Savior’s words, we do but have an illustration of an almost unpardonable presumption of Presbyterian preachers. They make a great ado about the Catholics and the presumption of the priests of Catholicism, while they claim a like infallibility, and treat those who differ from them with the same dogmatism. What but this kind of spirit would have dictated such a letter as we have referred to? That the force of the man’s bigotry may be seen, let us refer to the original connection of the words quoted, and see what kind of character he presumes to make a Universalist, asking his attention as a religious enquirer. The passage occurs in the sermon on the Mount, and reads: ‘Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet, and turn AGAIN and rend you.’ To what kind of characters did Jesus refer? Certainly to the most abandoned and outrageous of all; for what others could be likened to hungry swine disappointed in the food thrown to them, and madly turning to rend those who threw it?

But we leave the subject with merely remarking on the moral. Our Lord would teach us to exercise judiciousness in attempting to exert a religious influence. There are, indeed, no times or circumstances that can forbid a man exerting the religious influence of a holy conversation and demeanor, but there are times and circumstances which will not permit him to assume the character of a religious teacher direct—when he will thus but cast pearls before swine—will throw out religious sentiments and instruction while those who hear are utterly unfitted to consider them. Our Savior gave many examples of this judicious conduct; he never forced his teaching on any, and was, as we should be, discriminating in his choice of times and places. These remarks, however, must not be understood as recommending an effeminate course—a fearfulness and timidity that are at variance with christian boldness; for boldness, tempered with respect for mind, is highly necessary in this non-heroic age. Spiritual Joy.

CONSIDER first the sources of spiritual joy. These are abundant—they are the streams of that river that makes glad the city of our God. They are found in all the truths knowledge brings to us—the true idea of God, of what makes up the fullness of his paternal name, and the unchangeability of his love. We can also have knowledge of Jesus—the beauty of his life, the glory of his death, the sublimity of his mediatorial reign. We can also have knowledge of man—that our brethren are of like passions, desires, and affections, and have many claims to our love. We can also have knowledge that is power to do good, to fill up the measure of our days with acts honorable to our nature, beneficial to the world, and according with the spirit of Christ. We also can anticipate the end of sin and the grand consummation of the Restitution, believing that the resurrection state knows not a cloud of evil, and that as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly. If we rightly appreciate and improve these sources of spiritual joy, the world will in vain strive to lure us from duty, and our hearts become purified after the likeness of our Master's.

The superiority of spiritual joy. It claims kindred with the enjoyments of angels, seraphim, yea, with the happiness of God. It is the exercise of our best feelings and superior faculties. It has no power to taint, to leave a sting behind, to produce heaviness. It comes with the same freshness to the aged christian as when in the morning of life he answered the call of God for his heart. As through life we feel it a pleasant thing for the eyes to behold the familiar sun, so is spiritual joy ever new, ever sweet.

The strength of spiritual joy. 'The joy of the Lord is your strength,' was the ancient assurance to a desponding people. 'It is,' rightly observes a writer, 'the spring of our greatest efficiency for good; the great mover and inciter of the soul to holy action and achievement; the sustainer also of our energies in accomplishing our benevolent undertakings; what, above all things, keeps the mind going cheerfully forward in its spiritual efforts and adventures, and bears it on without fainting or weariness, to a successful issue of its struggles and conflicts.' Most true this language, for as the pleasure of his pursuit leads the ambitious to new labors, so does spiritual joy strengthen for new efforts and victories. And who has not understood something of the great strength of spiritual joy, when he has marked the spirit of rejoicing that is confessed in the most painful narratives of the Apostles, and that could cause the uttering of the exhortation: 'Rejoice evermore!' to the persecuted and afflicted Thessalonians.

The need of spiritual joy. There are hours when all other sources of joy are dry, when earth loses its richness and the heavens their brightness and beauty, and the heart must commune with itself. Then if the evanescent enjoyments of sense have engrossed all our attention, if we have cherished no sympathy with the things of the spirit, and know not by experience that the kingdom of God is joy, righteousness and peace in the Holy Ghost, we are poor—wretched indeed. Outer splendor will but mock us, the voice of mirth fall harshly on our ear, and the heart feel a bitterness that sickens the soul. We need to treasure up the riches of spiritual joy, that we may be rich within when the outer world becomes poor to us, when sunshine and beauty do but remind us of lost jewels of love, and there is naught so pleasant as the hopes of heaven.

The effects of spiritual joy upon character. In one word these are summed up—heavenly-mindedness. It weans us from a too fond attachment to earth, and sets our supreme—our strongest affections on things above. And in thus assimilating our minds to the mind of Christ, it softens all that is harsh in the character, it removes every unkind affection, it refines the passions, and sanctifies all the feelings. We should find no joy in the pursuits of false ambition, in envying the gifts or successes of others, in indulgence in harsh and unkind judgments, but we should be free from all the evils of unholy emulation and selfishness, wearing the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God, who rightly values all things, of great price. It leads to communion with God, the effects of which are well described by the poet:

'When one that holds communion with the skies,
Has filled his urn where these pure waters rise,
And once more mingles with us meaner things,
'Tis even as if an angel shook his wings;
Immortal fragrance fills the circuit wide,
That tells us whence his treasures are supplied;
So, when a ship, well freighted with the stores
The sun matures on India's spicy shores,
Has dropped her anchor and her canvas furled
In some safe haven of our western world,
'T were vain enquiry to what port she went,—
The gale informs us laden with the scent.'

The fullness of spiritual joy. 'These things have I spoken unto you that your joy might be full.' Gospel joy has a fullness to the true and devoted believer which is unspeakable—which words cannot convey an adequate idea of—it must be felt to be known; for the gospel presents to his contemplation the same vision that made the spirit of Jesus exceeding joyful, when he meditates on final results. None can know the fullness of joy who anticipate a less beautiful and harmonious end of Christ's mission, and if they will but hear it, there is a spirit voice issuing from this vacuity telling them they have not yet known the Comforter, and that they need a Paul to perfect that which is lacking in their faith. Then will they be enabled to anticipate the glorious era when 'the ransomed of the Lord'—and Christ gave himself a ransom for all—'shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads; they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away.'

Our subject needs no commendation—it commends itself to all, and let it be rightly appreciated. We need much communion with our Master's sufferings and our Master's joys, that we may remember the varied aspect of life, enjoy the good and bear the ill, and have the visitations of the strengthening angel in the darkest hour of grief or agony. Then will religion assume her own cheerfulness. Then will gloom and austerity be left in the cloister, while christianity walks forth in pleasantness, kindling rapture in the eye of all who greet her as a familiar; entering the social circle to enliven fraternal feelings; going amid the home band uniting its members closer in love, drawing with a soft step to the side of the weary sick to impart patience; coming near the mourner to dry the hopeless tears by promises of re-union; and approaching the dying and lighting up a smile on the features of expiring mortality by its truths of the Resurrection and the Life.

Dirge.

THOUGH dews are nighly on thy pillow shed
From the pure founts on high,
Sleep! and the flowers will bloom upon thy head,
And thy meek, dove-like eye
Heed not the beauty all around thee spread!

Who mourns that thou hast early gone to rest—
Thou of the broken heart?
All care is lifted from thy silent breast,
Relieved, redeemed thou art,
Go with the loved, the loving, and the blest!

Go where no disappointment leaves its blight,
No darkness wraps the soul!
Far from this land of pale, uncertain light,
Range thou without control
In realms that know no tempest, tears, or night!

We mourn not, though our hopes are in the dust,
Since thou, so loved, art free,—
Blending thy songs with anthems of the just,
Which soothe and solace thee,
And give thee back thy faith, and hope, and trust.

Sights from a Toll-House.

A Fragment.

As I LOOK out from this window, methinks Time is a bridge over which all must pass, as they come up from the depths of the unknown and unfathomable, destined for eternity. Toll-houses are more plenty than lamp posts, and hard-fisted keepers, exacting to the utmost, are stationed at them, though now and then a tender-hearted one is met with, who can pity a bare head and naked feet, and leave the price of the bread-loaf in the poor child-passenger's hand. Some hurry over the bridge ere a single gate can be opened! Fortunate beings! One laugh, one cry, and the immortals have another in their bands. Others linger awhile, and all the toll gatherers seem to gather around them at once, as if fearful that they would miss some of the gates; while others take the journey leisurely, with a nod for every fellow traveler, a jest and song for all, and a ready purse to pay the toll. The young and the old, the rich and the poor, the healthy and the sick, the keen-sighted and the blind, the deaf and the dumb, the strong and the lame, the busy and the idler, the honest plodder and the pickpocket and swindler, the reveller and the mourner,—all have feet on the same bridge, and all are passing! and all must pay many tolls! Thought and feeling make the currency of the bridge—gold, silver and copper. Every coin bears the stamp of the one heart, but how differently is it paid out! Some are perpetually defrauding the toll keepers, slipping past on their knees unseen, or rushing by with lightning speed, but they cheat themselves. For what is the worth of hoarded gold, laying idle and dim in the chest! Others are too lavish, waiting not for their change, and soon find themselves at a loss how to pass on! Others journey by borrowing, and a beggarly set they are! Others flatter themselves that all they pay is but loans, to be repaid, with tremendous compound interest, when they have passed the whole bridge and entered the eternal city, utterly thoughtless of what they should pay for the lights that have cheered them, the healthy breezes they have enjoyed, and the beauties and comforts with which they have been surrounded.

To ———

FAREWELL! farewell! the sails are spread,
The signal's flying over head,
And we at length must part;
I—to my home by the nook's soft vale,
And thou—borne by the fav'ring gale,
To the city's busy mart.

And shall I 'mid the dazzling throng
Of beauty fair, and gifted song,
Like morning twilight fade,
When bright Aurora cleaves the sky,
And flow'rets 'neath his flashing eye,
Sparkle on hill and glade?

Can the song's sweet and soothing power,
And winter's social fireside hour,
Like rainbow hues decay?
O, no! in vain we strive to bind
In Lethean chains the springing mind,
Or memory's current stay.

The sun will set, and flow'rets fade,
And over earth the sombre shade
Of gloomy night be spread;
But friendship's steady, fadeless ray,
Shines brightest when fond hopes decay,
And summer friends are fled.

When night returns, and busy thought
Flies back to scenes with memories fraught,
Of friends, and blissful hours;
'Twill pluck the sting from falsehood's dart,
To think there beats one faithful heart,
Still true—though fortune lowers.

Farewell! farewell! the sails are spread,
The signal's flying over head,
And we at length must part;
But not for aye; we'll meet again,
If not on earth—a festive train,
In heaven; be still, my heart!

The Love of the Dead.

BY WILLIS GAYLORD CLARK.

NOTHING but limited and erroneous views of the life present and to come, we conceive, can prevent reflecting intelligences from taking that true observation which merges both into one. Intervals there are indeed between separation and reunion, but how brief at the longest—how checkered at the best! That is a beautiful sentiment of GOETHE, where he compares our little round of being to a summer residence at a watering place: 'When we first arrive, we form friendships with those who have already spent some time there, and must soon be gone. The loss is painful; but we connect ourselves with the second generation of visitors, with whom we spend some time, and become dearly intimate; but these also depart, and we are left alone with a third set, who arrive just as we are preparing for our departure.' In this view of human life there is nothing to displace the idea of earthly communion with those who are absent. It is a curious truth, that when two friends part, they are as if were dead to each other, until they meet again. Letters may be interchanged, but the present of the one is not the present of the other; and what gloomy events may happen between! So that in this respect to be out of sight, in the estimation of affection, is as it were to be out of the world. How little real difference then is there between absence in a world of peril or transitory continuance, and death indeed!—save only that absence is probation, and death is not. It is a trite simile, perhaps, that in this world we are like ships on the ocean, each steering alone, amid the strife of elements; and in the far forward distance shadowed before us are the dim outlines of the land of death. Some reach it soonest; but thither all are bound; and their state is fixed, immutable, eternal. No change comes there, to the dwellers in that Land of the Blest, with its waters of crystal, beyond the shadow, 'where the bright islands of refreshment lie.'

'No darkness there divides the sway
'Twixt startling dawn and dazzling day;
But gloriously serene
Are the interminable plains;
One fixed, eternal sunset reigns
O'er the wide, silent scene.'

These two emblems of the progress to that gate where, ere they pass, all who enter must 'pay down their symbol of mortality,' express the source and goal of life, sublunarily considered. Slowly, one after another, the race of mankind are passing away. There are sad partings and sweet remembrances. Let the first be viewed as merely separations for a season; a friendly severance of the holiest ties, in hope of quick renewal. Above all, O thou that readest, if thou art a mourner, be faithful to the injunctions of the dead! In that diversified book of Southey's, 'The Doctor,' he describes the tranquil pleasures of a bereaved husband. They were 'to keep everything in the same state as when the wife was living. Nothing was to be neglected that she used to do, or that she would have done. The flowers were tended as carefully as if she were still to enjoy their fragrance and their beauty; and the birds who came in winter for crumbs were fed as duly for her sake, as they formerly were by her hands.' This calm communion of the present and the absent becomes religion, hope, fidelity; enduring tenderness beyond the stern frigidity of time: and well may each one of that retrospective brotherhood, large always in the world, who have loved and lost the lovely, and have, with theirs, to meet the world's encounters, thus greet adoptedly the dear departed:

'The love where death has set his seal
Nor age can chill, nor rival steal,
Nor falsehood disavow;
And what were worse, thou canst not see
The wrongs that fall on thine or me.'

'For me,' says the eloquent Sir Thomas Browne, 'I count this world, not as an inn, but as an hospital; where our fathers find their graves in our short memories, and sadly tell us how soon we shall be buried in our survivors.' How comfortable a thing is it then to remember the dead, knowing that it is but for a season, and then union will come! Thus, with him who mourns the absence of a consort or sister,

'The idea of her life shall sweetly creep
Into his study of imagination;
And every lovely organ of her life
Shall come apparelled in more precious habit,
More moving delicate, and full of life,
Than when she lived indeed.'

Obituary.

MISS ABIGAIL JOHNSON.

GOD, in the exercise of his limitless love, is continually adding to the attractions of heaven; and by varying our circumstances, he places us in different positions to view and appreciate those attractions. It is for this that he calls the beloved and pleasant spirit from our presence; and happy are we if we yield our affections to the heavenward influences. One hath been taken from the circle of my peculiar loves whose excellences were confessed by many, and whose loss will be felt by a large community. I speak of Miss Abigail Johnson, of Haverhill, Ms. who departed this life on Sunday morning, Aug. 29th, aged 33 years. Her disease was a rapid consumption; and so speedily did it accomplish the fatal work, that it is very difficult to realize that she is gone—that never more shall we meet her in the home of warm affections, in the social circle of friends, in the house of God, and around the table of the holy communion! But it is so—her spiritual presence only can now bless us. And O it will bless us indeed! for one so ready to do for others, so full of the best affections, must ever be remembered. She was a faithful daughter, a good sister, and a steadfast friend. How truly she was all these, let the hearts that deeply mourn her departure, testify. In the chamber of sickness she was a ministering friend of great capabilities, and indeed on all occasions of trial and difficulty she had an uncommon talent of making herself useful.

But we have not only the most pleasant memories of her when she was in health, but also of her sickness and death. Never was a heart more full of faith in the God of eternity. She bade me 'tell every body' that her faith grew stronger and stronger; that it was inexpressibly precious to her; that it made her happy, unspeakably so. She told me that the remembrances of her many conversations on religious subjects, gave her the richest comfort, and made her spirit strong. Her trust was in God, and her faith unwavering in the good issues which he will bring out of all evil.

May her excellences be ours, and O when the close of life draws near, may our hearts be as full of faith and hope as was her heart. The God of all comfort give of his grace unto all who feel her loss, and strengthen their confidence in the reunions and the bliss of the eternal state. B.

The Society of Woman.

No society is more profitable, because none more refining and provocative of virtue, than that of refined and sensible women. God enshrined peculiar goodness in the form of woman, that her beauty might win, her gentle voice invite, and the desire of her favor persuade men's sterner souls to leave the paths of sinful strife for the ways of pleasantness and peace. But when woman falls from her blest eminence, and sinks the guardian and the cherisher of pure and rational enjoyments into the vain coquette, and flattered idolater of idle fashion, she is unworthy of an honorable man's love, or a sensible man's admiration. Beauty is then but at best

— 'A pretty plaything,
Dear deceit.' —

We honor the chivalrous deference which is paid in our land to women. It proves that our men know how to respect virtue and pure affection, and that our women are worthy of such respect. Yet women should be something more than mere women to win us to their society. To be our companions, they should be fitted to be our friends; to rule our hearts they should be deserving the approbation of our minds. There are many such, and that there are not many more, is rather the fault of our own sex than their own; and a man dishonors them as well as disgraces himself, when he sees circle for idle pastime, and not for the improvement of his mind and the elevation of his heart. Merchant's Magazine.

Our Book and Memoranda Table.

THE ROSE OF SHARON, for 1842, is now ready for delivery to subscribers and others. The article on the present volume will give the reader an idea why we have pronounced the work excellent and worthy of attention.

Persons at a distance who have friends intending to be present at the meeting of the Convention in New York, can obtain the work by sending by those friends.

Those who hold prospectuses with subscribers' names, will please make returns immediately.

Mr. TOMPKINS, the publisher, will be in New York at the Convention, and will be glad to receive orders for Books, &c.

'THE FRUIT OF THE SPIRIT: Or, the Christian Graces.' The series of sketches published in our columns under the above title, is just published in book form. They are done up in neat style, as are all the volumes put forth by our publisher. Our peculiar relations to the authoress, forbid our speaking what we otherwise should feel bound to say respecting the book; but our readers know what its characteristics will be; and may we not believe that they will recommend it to the attention of their friends?

'The Christian Graces' make a volume of 151 full pages, and is afforded at 37 1-2 cts.

'THE ORIGIN OF EVIL: an Essay addressed to the American Clergy. By a Layman. Boston: J. N. Bang, 40 Cornhill, 1841.' Thus reads the title page of a very neatly printed, large duodecimo pamphlet, of 31 pages. We have not had time to read it, and by glancing through it we cannot get hold of the object of the writer, other than that he is willing to give more praise to the American Clergy than to all other, and would make them believe that they can effect a reform much needed, and which politicians cannot effect. We shall hand the Essay to a friend, and it may be that he will append to this record an opinion of it. For sale at this office.

A PUZZLE. We are sometimes very illy satisfied with the results of study, and are so at this present writing, for we can get no satisfaction from a long study of the question, —How is it that some of our editors are very anxious for the extensive circulation of the denominational periodicals, and yet notice and praise every month the 'Lady's Book,' while the 'Ladies' Repository' is forgotten? Perhaps the 'Lady's Book' best promotes the cause of Universalism! Perhaps it does not make much odds whether or not the 'Repository' is noticed as other denominational weeklies notice monthlies; and it may be that it is not worthy of this courtesy. Be this as it may, we will work on, and rejoice in the favor of our patrons, gratefully acknowledging any record of our existence and activity.

STEPHENS' TRAVELS IN CENTRAL AMERICA. This is really a splendid work—necessarily so, from the magnificent materiel in hand. The exploration of eight ruined cities, whose founders perished centuries ago, leaving no trace of themselves but their crumbling habitations, their desolate altars, and their perishing idols, has furnished our traveler with rich themes for the exercise of his descriptive talents. His picturing is exceedingly vivid—the scenes lie all spread out before you, almost as definite as in the drawings of Mr. Catherwood, seventy-eight of which are engraved for these volumes.

Stephens has an inimitable tact in making the commonest incident interesting. He never indulges in broad humor, but by his quiet pleasantries, and his curious mingling of the ludicrous with the serious, he contrives to keep a smile upon the faces of his readers, even when there is more reason, perhaps, that they should be sad. He goes through the world like a laughing philosopher—yet pitiful where need is, making the follies, rather than the misfortunes of men, a source of useful amusement.

Stephens does not pretend to be either a scientific or a philosophical traveler; but noting things as they are, and describing them so plainly and distinctly that the commonest mind can understand and perceive them, he is furnishing materiel for the investigations of others, without impeding their speculations by any theories of his own. The antiquities of Central America, probably furnish the richest fund for problems and speculations of any subject ever before laid open to the historian. We do believe that time, the great elucidator of all mysteries, will yet bring to light the key of these great hieroglyphics; and that thus the historian shall add a new era to the annals of American greatness, extending farther back into the past than even the days when the Scalds were here, and sung their songs on the shores of sunny Wineland. How this will be brought about we venture not to predict, but less, doubtless, by speculative theories than by sober, practical research.

SAWYER'S REVIEW OF HATFIELD. Hatfield, a Presbyterian Minister in New York city, published last spring, a work which he entitled 'Universalism as it Is,' made up of the most reckless comments on garbled extracts from Universalists' writings; as though sarcasm and ridicule were the mightiest weapons for truth, and every paragraph written in our papers 'law and gospel' with all Universalists. Br. Sawyer has reviewed his neighbor's work, and he has done it manfully—calling a lie by no soft name to blunt the shaft of truth, and unmasking the absurdities of Hatfield with consummate skill. We love mild and gentle talk, tender and delicate treatment of diseases; but we love also the strong and thrilling utterance that alone hath a power to make some feel. When the necessity comes for speaking 'as the tempest speaks—sterner and stronger,' we love to see the necessity met, and can rejoice as we hear the mighty tones. Hatfield is one of that large class of opponents of Universalists and Universalism, who take all the learning and decency to themselves, and are ready to deny all upright and honorable principles to those they oppose. It is God's will that they should ridicule his truth, and we desire to submit. We see in it good—we see opportunities for calling attention to the doctrine of our faith that might not otherwise be given—and we see how by this warfare Universalism will be tried at every point, and at every point found impregnable. 'Rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for him; fret not thyself because of him who prospereth in his way, because of the man who bringeth wicked devices to pass.

The Review by Br. Sawyer has been published in numbers in the Christian Messenger, but we are glad to state that the Nos. are to be collected and published in book form. The volume will be out in Sept. inst.—ready at the time of the meeting of the General Convention in New York. Let those who want an able work, send for the Review by friends going to that meeting. The work will doubtless be on sale at our office soon after it is issued.

WESTERN POETS AND OURSELF. Lately, while looking over some papers, our attention was attracted by an article entitled—'The Great West; by Rev. George Rogers.' We read on a while, rejoicing in sympathy with the writer, when lo! a paragraph made a sensation not very pleasant we are sure. The writer, after speaking of the change effected in the West by the zealous efforts of brethren willing to bear trial and labor, proceeds to express his opinion that Eastern editors do not take notice enough of Western productions, though he does not impute 'any designed contempt' towards them; and then comes down upon us with the most serious charge—we say 'most serious,' because he opens the paragraph with—'But seriously,' as though, if what he has said be regarded as a light matter, what he is about to write cannot be! Hear him:—'But seriously—I have greatly wondered that the "Ladies Repository," which has many readers in the west, and which, more than all others of our papers, might be expected to stretch out the hand, and afford the cheer of encouragement to female votaries of the muse amongst us, in whatsoever part of our heritage residing—I have wondered, I say, that of all the beautiful effusions from female pens, of which the "Star in the West" contains so many, the "Repository" has never found one which was deemed worthy of being transferred to its pages! Of these productions, too, some have been so beautiful as to have been honored with a place in literary journals in the west, having no connection with our cause, nor friendship with our doctrines. But more on this topic in a future number.'

We complain of the charge contained in that paragraph—

1. Because Br. R. in conversation with us while he was at the east, commended the Repository highly and hinted not at the neglect as above, which would have been better than a public rebuke. 2. He does not take into consideration the fact that our work is devoted to articles written for its pages and rarely selects poetry. 3. We have spoken in our notices in the highest terms of the contributors of the western denominational papers, as our pages will bear witness. 4. We usually have several—sometimes quite a number of poetic articles—left over each month, and the fulness of our supply thus prevents selections. 5. We presume that our large number of subscribers at the west are better pleased with articles new to them than selections from their own papers of the same class. That we have never selected and published a poem from the 'Star in the West,' is no reason for any one to presume that we have never found one 'worthy of being transferred to the pages of the Repository.' Ere Br. Rogers gives more, as he promises, on this peculiar topic, it might be well for him to consult the pages of the Repository, and contrast what has therein been said to encourage the talented females in our denomination to literary effort, with what other periodicals contain—if any thing more than mere notices to correspondents can be found. Our pages are open to the sisters of the west as fully as to those of the east, north or south; and we should be happy to introduce any of them to our readers with our best bow—though Br. R.'s article may impress them with a belief that that would be a poor one. 'The Star in the West' is a good letter of introduction, but they need not attend to that ceremony, but send direct.

PECK'S DOGGRELL. We learn by the Philadelphia 'Nazarene,' that the miserable doggrell published in this city in 1823, without any publisher's name, has recently been issued in Philadelphia. It is not, as Br. Cook has styled it, 'a new thing,' but an old one, and more miserable than old. It was here printed in a pamphlet with Haynes' Sermon—worthy companions; though we marvelled that, out of courtesy to his worthy associate, the rhymster did not give a different color than 'black' to the Devil, and describe him as grey. But seriously, it is a mournful fact that there are thousands whose passion to oppose Universalism can be fed by such low trash as Peck's 'Descant on the Universal Plan.'

THE GOSPEL HARMONIST. We perceive, by a notice in the 'Trumpet,' that Br. Whittemore is about publishing a new collection of Music with the above title. It is a new book of Church Music, in the editing of which he states he has been 'assisted by several of the Musical Literati of Boston.' We have no doubt of its being an excellent collection—excellent as the 'Songs of Zion,' which work was very popular. The new work will contain upwards of 360 tunes, over 150 of which have never before been published. In this variety will be found metres adapted to all the hymns in Streeter's and Ballou 2d's Collections of Hymns and anthems, voluntaries, &c. &c. 350 pages, $9 a dozen.

MINIATURE PORTRAIT OF ANDREW JACKSON. We acknowledge the receipt of an elegantly engraved Portrait of Ex-President Jackson, which we regard as a good likeness. It is one of a series published by Nathaniel Dearborn, of this city.

COMPANION for Dearborn's Map of Boston and Vicinity. In our last we made mention of a finely executed and neatly published Map, drawn by A. Lewis, and engraved by N. Dearborn. We now have before us a Companion for that Map, which is a pamphlet of the same miniature, or pocket size, containing 'Historical and geographical remarks, collected from the best authorities,' on each the 86 towns mentioned on the Map of Boston and Vicinity. This as well as the Map, will be found very convenient.

THE NOTICE in our LAST of L. E. L., should have been signed S. C. E. The signature was on our proof.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS. The editor has not been able to give his personal attention to all the proofs of this No. and some corrections may not be made which he might see cause to make.

We are glad to announce the receipt of an article from Mrs. S. Broughton, entitled 'Night Musings,' which shall be given next month; and it is with great satisfaction that we state we have the promise of a continuance of her favors. We know that this announcement will be highly gratifying to our readers.

In our next will also appear an Essay on 'The Indestructibility of the Mental Impressions; or the future identity of Man;' by Rev. L. Willis, who will accept our thanks for his favor.

Also,—'Sketches from Life, No. 1. Old Isabelle'—by a new female contributor, with whose present favors we are highly pleased. A fine article entitled 'A Thought,' from one whom we are glad has not forgotten us and the golden memories of the past,—Rev. D. J. Mandel. Will he think of us often, and give us as acceptable proofs as the present one, that he does so kindly think? He can thus do us good service. 'The Bride,' a Poem by 'L. Concord.' 'To my Æolian Harp,' and 'The Boquet,' by Ione.

OLD MATTHEW.

Allegretto.

In si-lence Mat-thew lay and eyed The spring be--neath the tree,

And thus the dear old man re-plied, The grey haired man of glee,

"Down to the vale this wa-ter steers, How mer-ri--ly it goes, it goes, 'Twill mur-mur on a thou-sand years, And flow as now it flows.

"And here on this delightful day,
I cannot choose but think,
How oft a vigorous man I lay,
Beside this fountain's brink.

My eyes are dim with childish tears,
My heart is idly, idly stirred;
For the same sound is in my ears,
Which in those days I heard."

CHAPTER IV. MEEKNESS.

'BLESSED are the meek ; for they shall inherit the earth.'

THE declaration of our Lord concerning meekness, though but the announcement of a literal truth, has a poetical interest when associated with the use of a similar aphorism among the Jews. When the Israelites came forth from Egypt, their imaginations were vivid in setting forth the promised land as possessed of every desirable good, and no language or imagery was too bold to describe its richness and beauty. There was the clime they panted for ; the land that flowed with milk and honey, and that was luxuriantly fruitful. Through it ran the bright river, the leaping brooks, and the sparkling waters of the fountains, so peculiarly gladdening to the oriental eye. It was, to their minds, a perfect contrast to Egypt ; and though in reality, a most beautiful country, yet it was dressed in a thousand imaginative charms by the associations of the peculiar blessings they anticipated to receive there from the hand of God, elevating them to a high dignity as a nation, and giving them conquest and power in return for the subjection and weakness they had long endured. But that land was afar. An immense travel must be completed ere it could be reached, and what trials, hardships, and perils, must be met ! To cheer the pilgrims through the whole, like the gathering and animating shout of the battle host, was the promise to 'inherit the land'—or, in the strong language of the spies, 'the place where there is no want of anything that is in the earth.'

From thence was derived a proverb in common use—to inherit or possess the earth, signified the enjoyment of life and the best of blessings to the utmost. Thus the Psalmist sang : 'The meek shall inherit the earth, and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace.' The promise of richest good was, as in our motto, anciently connected with Meekness, because of the absolute necessity of exercising this virtue in order to bear and rightly forbear under the perplexing and trying circumstances of the wilderness journey. Other than a meek spirit would but murmur and complain, be self-willed against God and man, and would arraign before the wisdom of an hour the counsels and plans of the eternal Mind. Therefore there is great emphasis in the language of the sacred historian : 'The man Moses was very meek, above all the men that were upon the face of the earth ;' and were he not, the history of that perilous journey would be even more dark and mournful than it is. The meek alone could promise themselves the joy of entering to possess the land ; and as they went, they were the only ones who could inherit what joy came in their way, and keep ever in mind the true significance of the cloud by day and pillar of fire by night.

When captivity came upon the Jews, this apt proverb was connected with every thought of promise of return, and to every mind it was an eloquent maxim, so intimately blended was it with their nation's history. When, therefore, our Lord uttered this beatitude, it went down deep into their hearts, and conscience must have witnessed to them how much adverse to the spirit blessed was the general feeling of the nation, and how like their fathers in the wilderness they were.

The discernment of Jesus saw plainly their political condition. He knew the days of the Jewish commonwealth were numbered, and that Roman usurpation would soon complete its triumph. And when the people heard from his lips the declaration which he made, again their hopes died away, and their ambitious projects received no aid—they felt that he was not the Messiah they were ready to hail.

Jesus spake not only to them, but to all to whom his words should come: 'The meek shall inherit the earth.' We need this truth engraven as it were upon the palms of our hands, as anciently the oriental bore on his palm the picture of the city he loved, or the God he served, and was hourly reminded of his duty thereunto, as the eye glanced upon the hand. We need, as much as the great multitude, to feel and to act upon the truth, that meekness—the opposite of arrogance, haughtiness, and resentment—is a grace of character, and temper of mind, essential to a right enjoyment of life. This is the sentiment of our Lord's aphorism. He intended to convey the idea that to the meek would be given the best means of improvement and the richest enjoyment of life, recalling a truth too long forgotten or unheeded. Here, then, is something which commends itself to our attention, for if thousands have vainly tried for the possession of the philosopher's stone, which was supposed to have the property of changing all things into gold, much more should we strive for the attainment of that which will enable us to draw the most satisfaction from the sources of earthly happiness. We may promise ourselves good in giving thoughtful attention to consider Meekness—its characteristics, its connection with man's moral and religious relations, and its advantages and worth.

What, then, are the Characteristics of Meekness? Many apply the term to individuals of no energy or force of character—to those who have but little propensity to resist the encroachments of others, and who are harmless creatures because of an entire want of any natural vigor of mind and activity. Not so is the correct application of the term. We have quoted the historian's tribute to Moses' character—that he was meek in a higher degree than any one of his time; yet who had more energy and force of character than he? Who had more determination of soul, vigor of mind and action, and straight forward devotedness to right? Without these energetic qualities what could he have done with the strange and mighty host over whom he was placed? How would he, how could he, have preserved even a remnant of them, or have had patience with their ingratitude, self-will, and grossness of heart? Meekness is not a mere negative quality. It is not to be applied to the human character as we apply it to an animal, for it is not a mere animal quality, but the product of fixed religious principles, aided by a deep love of moral excellence and reverential fear of God. It is one of the two virtues or graces made essential by our Savior to the enjoyment of rest to the soul, and is always made prominent among the characteristics of the christian.

One of the best analyzers of our language defines this virtue thus: 'Meekness as a natural temper, sinks into meanness and servility; but when as an acquired temper, built upon principle and moulded into a habit of the mind, it is the grand distinctive characteristic of the religion we profess. Here is a wise distinction made; for as a natural temper, we may speak of a meek horse, or a meek dog, or as Thomson of the lamb:

'How meek, how patient, the mild creature lies,
What softness in its melancholy face,
What dumb-complaining innocence appears!'

But not so with respect to the virtue. Virtue is not passive, it is active; for what is virtue? Among the numerous definitions the best is—'Virtue is voluntary obedience to a law felt to be obligatory.' There is a moulding and forming power to be brought into action. Great energy will be required by many before they can be graced with meekness. It is an acquired virtue; but its possession will amply repay all sacrifices, all strugglings with self, all the preparations needed; and without it the world will take knowledge of us that we have not been with Christ Jesus. Meekness then, is that disposition of heart, and the result of a discipline of mind, which prevents a man from being easily provoked, and enables him to put from him all desire of revenging injuries; while in reference to the moral government of God and the spiritual truths of his Son's kingdom, it guards against that destructive self-will, and pride of mind, that rise up against submission and humble trust. The necessity of this excellence of character must be readily perceived, for what is the source of more trouble and vexation in society, than a temper easily provoked—taking fire, so to speak, at a word or look, a remark half understood, a suspicious smile, or the trifles that are hourly occurring, and which, like bubbles on the ocean, should be permitted to live their brief moment and then disappear. So also with Revenge—the eye for an eye and tooth for a tooth principle. What a demon in any of its many forms is Revenge! Great virtues relate to small matters and make each important; and so with great vices. The same passion that has led to the devastation of a kingdom and the destruction of a nation, has vented itself upon the most trivial occasions, whenever its magnifying eye has caught sight of a wrong. Though at first, like many a subtle poison, its satisfaction may be sweet, yet, like the action of the poison, it leaves its deadly power within the breast. No man was ever yet satisfied with revenge. The fiercest have known moments when the voice of condemnation has been heard; and if there is one solemn lesson learned by history, it is, that revenge has been the prominent passion in every cruel and dark work of destruction. Evil for evil, is the motto on desolation's banner; and till it is disjoined from the policies of families, communities, and nations, the golden era of peace will never come. We must teach the wolf to lie down with the lamb in our own breasts, and there the lion, the leopard, and the kid, to dwell together in peace; or before their wrestlings can hurt others, they will destroy our own inward peace. If a man would have peace and harmony in his home, he must strive to have all, great and small, strong and weak, obedient to the law of kindness. It is so with true tranquillity of mind and the family of the passions.

Meekness, not only preserves the man from easy provocation, and enables him to act discreetly, cautiously, and satisfactorily to himself, in respect to injuries and wrongs, but as it leads to prudence towards man, it also contributes to submission towards God. Self-will and pride of mind have led more from the foundation of religious trust than any other cause, and made men presume to look with unshrinking eye into those things where angels dare not gaze. Their language never is, 'Not as I will, but as thou wilt!' And frequently might Elihu's query be put to them, 'Should it be according to thy mind?' They can see easily how the world might be altered for the better; what is deficient in revelation; what aids christianity needs from worldly policy; and how the Deity's plans might be sooner accomplished! The presumption of man is awful, surrounded as he is with teachers to remind him of his ignorance, short-sightedness, and frailty. Often he would be equal with God, not content without scanning every link and rivet that connect the chain of the eternal providences of Jehovah! But what is his reward? To live in perpetual doubt—to look upon the stars without the divine telescope, and tread the earth with an uncertain step, knowing there is and must be in the vast range of intelligence much that cannot be grasped by the mind placed on this obscure point in the universe, yet ever reaching forward to fathom out the unknown and unknowable. Miserable has been the state of many such; in their hours of deep reflection giving speech to thought, and thus, as did Hume, venting their feelings,—'I am affrighted and confounded with that forlorn solitude, in which I am placed by my philosophy. When I look abroad, I foresee on every side, dispute, contradiction, and distraction. When I turn my eye inward, I find nothing but doubt and ignorance. Where am I, or what? From what causes do I derive my existence, and to what condition shall I return? I am confounded with these questions, and begin to fancy myself in the most deplorable condition imaginable, environed with the deepest darkness.'

What kind of philosophy is that which amid this universe of witnesses of God's presence, isolates man and places him in a forlorn solitude? What philosophy is that which gives no answer to the questions that have been asked by every thoughtful mind, and which are tremendous in their consequences—From whence, for what, and to what tending, is man? Questions of art and science, literature and taste, government and policy, sink into insignificance before these. They embrace our whole being. They present the great controversy—Did man spring from the earth—is he the sport of chance and tending to nothingness in the grave—body, soul, and spirit? or is he a child of God, under a wise and benevolent moral government, and heir of a glorious immortality? What are all other questions to these? As the importance of rushlights are to the need of the sun. And what is that philosophy worth that steps in to answer these questions, and leaves its expounder and apostle 'environed with the deepest darkness'? It is like all God-less wisdom—sensual, vain, and perishable! It can tell nothing of the inner world of the human soul and its Author; it deals with the human and outward deceitfully, and knows nothing of the Divine and Invisible. O what a persuasion to the mind and heart to lay aside all the superfluities of unholiness and malice, and receive with meekness the ingrafted word which is able to save the soul—to deliver it from deceitful philosophy, from the enemies of its spiritual peace, and from all that obscures its vision to the divinity within and around us. O blessed meekness! Happy are the meek! for they inherit the earth—they are led to the river of life, they drink of its living streams and bathe in its placid waters, and gather fruit from that tree whose leaves are for the healing of the nations.

“Happy the meek,” he said,
Whose doctrine is divine;
’Tis they alone the earth possess,
And they are wholly mine.”

The apostle Peter has written of Meekness as a peculiarly valuable and beautiful ornament to woman. It is so. With her gentle nature, her loves, hopes, and fears, and with her many offices of kindness and devotion, what is she without Meekness? As the dew changed to frost, is to the flower; or as the sunlight robbed of its warmth by the winds, is to the seed embosomed in the earth; for all her deeds of outward pity, tenderness, and love, must be wanting in the warmth which meekness gives. As meekness departs from woman, her chief beauty fades; her manners and speech partake of sensoriousness and imprudence; and instead of being like a star in the mild blue heavens, attractive and pleasing as a type of gentleness and love, she is like a wandering meteor, now fair and lovely, anon awful in its fiery course, and soon again assuming a more pleasant aspect, but ere long rushing along in its eccentric whirls and flashes, startling and fearful. Herein lies a chief source of domestic infelicity; and the connection of meekness with the preservation of home-joy is, perhaps, more intimate than we are apt to imagine. Woman too much forgets that the busy and restless spirit of man has much to contend with, amid the elements of the world of art and trade, to vex, disturb, and unsettle, that she has not in the retreat of her duties. All have their cares and trials, else all would not be pupils in the great school of Virtue; none are entirely exempt from causes of vexation and trouble; but is there not less to awaken from repose the harsher feelings of our nature amid domestic cares, than amid the outer world of perpetual strife for the mastery, interest, and self? If woman has not meekness, she cannot very strongly insist on man’s possessing it, though we are aware there is greater necessity for it. Fire against fire, is no action that is likely to promise the preservation of the exposed from injury, and if one will not do his duty to quench it, another cannot find an excuse in that for adding fuel to the flame. For the want of meekness, how many have known by an unhappy experience—

‘Alas! how light a cause may move
Dissension between hearts that love;
Hearts that the world in vain had tried,
And sorrow but more closely tied;
That stood the storm, when waves were rough,
Yet in a sunny hour fall off,
Like ships that have gone down at sea,
When heaven was all tranquillity.’

The poet has here a beautiful and impressive sentiment; for is it not strange how much outward evil, calumny, slander, or wrongs, companions will resist for each other, or together, and yet how little they will bear from each other. They will lift up their arm in all the strength of love’s majesty to ward an evil from the other’s head, but by words and looks will wring that one’s heart with anguish.

Ah, how much we have all to learn before we shall be meek as our Lord was meek. When he saw his disciples, oftener in their hearts than actions, contending ‘Who shall be greatest?’ like an army united against a common foe, but quarreling among themselves, how well by the emblematic language of washing their feet, did he teach them to be meek and humble! And as we see him there kneeling in their midst to the lowly work, what a beautiful comment have we on his own words—‘The greatest among you shall be your servant!’ Contrast John desiring to call down fire from heaven upon the inhospitable Samaritans, with the John exhibited in the Epistles so full of love, and the beauty of meekness is seen—how it adorns with a gem of living and glorious lustre the brow that wears it. Call up the mental pictures and study them.

If, then, we would have the best aid to the true improvement of life and its blessings, the world we live in and the happiness of our domestic and social relations,—if we would have a daily beauty to linger around our path and the best security against dissension and strife,—if we would possess that temper of mind that leads to the right study of the divine in nature and revelation, and to the possession of a confidence and trust in God and the joys of futurity, we must give our hearts to Meekness—christian Meekness, the parent of all the gentle virtues and the very sister of wisdom.

To my Æolian Harp.

DID an angel pause on his glittering wing,
And send his rich breath o'er thy trembling string!
Could aught that is earthly such sounds have made,
That dare with resistless strength invade,
The holy of holies—the depths within,
Where none but our Maker may enter in?

Oh, hush! for a breath can stay the hand,
Of the unseen one from the minstrel band,
Who deigns o'er thy quivering chords to sweep,
Till we turn in our solemn joy to weep,
And pause if its fluttering wing may show
Of the land which our spirits burn to know!

It hath passed, for its holy task is done;
Our deathless souls it hath wooed and won!
To the city which needs not the sun by day,
Or the moon by night on its domes to play,
Where the streams rejoice with the voice of song,
And the gush of music is sweet and strong!
Away! on the wings of the tuneful blast!
Hush, hush! for the thrilling strain is past! IONE.

Rural Rambles. No. 2.

A VISIT TO THE COTTAGE.

'COME, dear A.! 'tis a beautiful morning; the air seems fragrance itself, loaded as it is with the sweet perfumes of the roses and a thousand flowering shrubs;—put on your hat and take an early ramble with me. There is nothing so invigorating to the spirits, I think, as a walk taken in the early morning, when the air is fresh and pure, and the fragrance of the flowers which lie glistening with dewy gems, and the songs of the birds come to our eager senses, inviting us to join in the praise of our Creator's munificence.'

Of course, I gladly complied with the solicitations of Caroline, and we were soon habited in our light hats and 'kerchiefs, and on our way down the lane which led to the 'white cottage-glen,' which I had often expressed a desire to visit. This lane was a beautiful summer walk, shaded by large, old trees;—on either side interspersed with the sweet scented briar-bush, wild-roses, and the pure white blossoms of the thorn-tree, with various other equally beautiful shrubs, forming an agreeable contrast with their taller and more majestic companions. All nature was clothed in light and beauty, and the little birds trilled their joyous notes in melodious concert, as they rose from their grassy nests high in the air and soared away to the bright blue heavens, as in grateful acknowledgment of the kindly care of their Creator.

After a short walk, we emerged from the shade into a grassy glen, beautiful beyond description. 'Now,' said Caro, 'we are almost in sight of the white cottage, but perhaps the hour is too early to admit of our seeing its inmates; yet as Mrs. Wilton and her children are early risers, and not too particular about ceremony, if we find them up, I think we may venture upon a call. There is my friend Ellen this moment! and little Kate is trudging along hold of her hand. They have driven the cow to pasture, and are returning. Let us haste to meet them.'

At this moment Ellen saw my friend Caro, and bounded towards us with little Kate in her arms. Caroline soon made me acquainted with her little favorites, and as soon as Katy had secured the hand of Aunt Caddy, as she called my friend, we proceeded on our way to the cottage.

'There!' suddenly exclaimed Ellen, 'I have forgotten to carry those verses to Mercy Woodward; but I'll not go back now; I'll see Lisa first, and perhaps she'll not care if I don't carry them till I go after the cow to-night.'

'Who is Mercy Woodward, and who is Lisa?' I asked, my interest being thoroughly awakened by those two beautiful children from the cottage.

'Don't oo know thithter Litha?' lisped little Katy, lifting her dark, beautiful eyes to my face in evident astonishment that I could be unacquainted with one she so loved.

'Lisa is your sister, then?' I said, smoothing away the curls which clustered around her forehead.

'Yeth, the ith my thithter.'

'She is my oldest sister,' said Ellen, 'and Mercy Woodward lives with her mother a little ways from where we met, down by the pond in a little wood-colored cottage covered with wood-bine. Perhaps you know where it is, Miss?' she added, looking in my face.

'No, dear, I do not; but perhaps you and Caro will accompany me there, some time; I should like to become better acquainted with your pretty vale and its inhabitants.'

'Thank you for the compliment,' said Ellen, blushing. 'I'm sure we should all be equally well pleased, for Miss Caroline's friends will always find a welcome with us.'

I was pleased with the reply of Ellen, and the manner in which she uttered it, seemed far superior to her years. May I take the liberty to inquire your age my young friend? I asked.

'I am ten,' she answered with a smile.

'And I wath four yearth old, latht May,' said

our little prattler, as her sweet, infantile countenance assumed a look of importance, as she announced her age.

I wish, gentle reader! you could have seen those two beautiful children. Ellen was a tall and finely formed girl, with a complexion fair, yet glowing with health. She had fine, large blue eyes, and fair brown hair; with a countenance so expressive of intellect and good nature, that it could not fail to interest every observer. Little Kate was a beautiful child, with a fine, expansive forehead, round which her dark auburn hair clustered in natural ringlets; her large dark eyes were shaded by long silken fringes, and her sweet bird-like voice touched the deepest springs of my heart, as I listened to the innocent prattlings with which she amused us, as we walked toward the cottage. We soon arrived at the residence of Mrs. Wilton, and it was, indeed, a neat and tastefully arranged little dwelling, painted white, with green blinds, and covered with honey-suckle and wood-bine. Both the exterior and interior of the cottage evinced a degree of refinement and good taste, seldom met with.

Mrs. Wilton gave us a cordial reception, betraying in her manners an acquaintance with the more polished grades of society. But Lisa,—what shall I say of her? She was the most deeply interesting being I ever beheld;—almost fifteen years of age, just verging from the child to womanhood, and with a mild and thoughtful countenance. Of a peculiarly delicate constitution, she was unable to participate in the more laborious duties of the household, and therefore she devoted much of her time to the improvement of her sisters. With a brow as white as alabaster, shaded by her long raven tresses, and her every glance from her fine, black eyes was so touching, that it seemed to penetrate to the tearful recesses of the heart. Her features were somewhat Grecian in their outline, much resembling her mother's, who was an Italian lady of high birth.

Henry Wilton was travelling in Europe and had been long in Italy, for he found, scattered over that classic land much that accorded well with his poetic taste, and formed a rich repast for his highly intellectual powers. He saw the fair Leonore de Valmont, and loved her. Handsome, intellectual and generous, Wilton was well calculated to win the love of the delicate Italian girl, and he soon transplanted the beautiful blush-rose from its fair native home to the ruder soil of his own loved New England. They lived in love and happiness many years, but before little Kate had attained the age of two years, Henry Wilton had been removed to the 'better land.' After her husband's death Mrs. Wilton dismissed her domestic, performing her household duties with the aid of Ellen, hoping by strict economy to retain all her children with her, as the thought of separation from those, her lone, remaining idols, was too painful for her to bear.

The substance of this account I received from Mrs. Wilton at the cottage, and the remainder from Caroline on our return home. I took my leave of the Wiltons with a feeling of interest I had never before experienced; and a year after, when I visited my friend, the walk to the cottage was repeated. I found Mrs. Wilton and her family still there, but there was one bright gem gone from the coronal of her affections. They led me to the church-yard and pointed to a mound covered with sweet flowers which the hand of affection had trained and cherished:—'twas Lisa's grave;—she had left earth with its sorrows and trials, and gone to the spirit land, to meet the loved who had long awaited her, and who now received her as their own.

The Accordant Harp.

It is not often that I dream in a manner worthy to be preserved. Our good brother Thomas is a capital dreamer. He dreams much, and wisely. But I have recently been favored with a very pleasant night vision. It was so agreeable to myself, and left so deep an impression upon my mind, that I have concluded to place the substance of it on paper.

After the studies and toils of the day had passed, I retired to rest; and the spirit of slumber soon wrapped me in the soft embrace of sweet sleep. I found myself in the company of a young man of benevolent feelings, whose parents were decidedly orthodox, and whose mind had been pretty thoroughly disciplined to the belief of modern Calvinism. Yet he was willing to hear what could be said in favor of more benevolent views—for it is worthy of remark that he is very fully developed in the region of benevolence.

By some means or other, the conversation turned upon the subject of the various forms of religious faith under the similitude of a Harp. I know not why a harp should suggest itself to my mind as a proper symbol to illustrate religious sentiments. I never thought of it in my waking hours. But I am a lover of music,—and that may be the reason.

My youthful friend introduced the subject by saying, 'your religious Harp, it seems to me, is not the most excellent—the strings are not in harmonious tune. They do not make good music.' 'Why,' said I, 'you surprise me by that remark, and I am convinced that I can easily show you wherein you are mistaken. Let me try. In the first place, I consider you are wrong in every particular, so far as the harp you have introduced, is concerned.

I am glad you have named a harp, by which to try our religion—you could not have found a better illustration. There were but four strings as I fancied, in the harp before us. The three first strings represented the principal attributes of God, love, wisdom, and power. The fourth Universalism, or the final holiness and happiness of all God's offspring.

'Now,' said I, 'let us see if these four strings are not in perfect harmony with each other. And first—would not the infinite Love of God, lead him to desire the greatest amount of good to all his children?' 'Yes!' was the ready reply—for my young friend was not disposed to quibble at all, but to answer just what reason and benevolence dictated. He was not afraid, if he was in the wrong, to find it out. 'Then,' said I, 'would not the greatest amount of good to the whole family of man, be in the elevation, the purity and bliss of every being in particular?' To this he gave a ready affirmative. 'If then,' I continued, 'the infinite love of God would desire the universal good of man, the next thing to be considered is, would not, or could not the perfect Wisdom of God devise a plan sufficient to effect that good, if carried out? In short,—is not God wise enough so to direct the offices of his own government as will satisfy his benevolent desires?' 'So it would seem,' was his reply. 'Here, then, we find two strings of the harp in harmony. Wisdom accords with Love.'—'Yes.'

'Then has not,' I added, 'the Infinite, power enough to bring to pass all that Love desires, and Wisdom plans?' 'That cannot reasonably be denied,' said he. 'Then this string is also in tune with the other two,' said I. 'Oh yes,' he replied. 'The attributes of God must harmonize; I never supposed them discordant.'

'Now tell me, dear sir,—what but the entire elevation, and glory of man, can vibrate in more perfect harmony with the Love, Wisdom, and Power of God? From what instrument can sweeter music be poured forth than from this? Is there any?' He seemed perplexed somewhat, and hesitated. I continued—'Our harp is not a discordant one, but it is all harmonious. It is a sweet one, and the skillful player can draw forth melting melody, and enrapturing strains from it. It is a harp of joy to the sad. It wakes peace and felicity in the soul of the disconsolate. All the benevolent hearted like music, and are often charmed by its subduing and melting strains. Often will those unaccustomed to such music, steal in where it is wont to be heard, and listen with much pleasure to its kindling harmonies. And these may be heard to say on hearing such music;—'O! that is sweet music—we love such strains—they warm, elevate, and delight our hearts. Would that we could always hear them.'

'Now,' said I to my friend, 'is this not contrary to your first assertion, sweet music? Is there not a perfect harmony between the attributes of God, and universal good? Does not infinite love, wisdom, and power accord with the universal purity, love, and joy of mankind? Would endless curses, hatred, and wo, come up in sweeter tune, and yield happier music to the holy and compassionate soul?'

He surrendered the point, and freely admitted that our harp strings were in harmony, and when well played on, afforded the sweetest and most joyful music to the heart of man.

You know in dreams we are apt to come off conquerors, both in our waking and sleeping hours. It was so in this case. And just as I supposed I had made a convert of my youthful friend, his mother, who had overheard the conversation, burst into the room in a rage—spoiled all our music, and awoke me from a very pleasant dream.

The Bride.

In a snowy satin they decked the bride,
And they wreathed her hair with flowers,
And led her forth in their young heart's pride,
The queen of the festal hours.

And lights were glancing the mirrors along,
And bright forms were flitting by,
And gladness hung on the lip of song,
And gaiety lit the eye.

'Tis fitting ye deck her in spotless white,
For her heart is free from stain,
But it is not meet, on this solemn night,
That ye give to mirth the rein.

She is leaving her childhood's home of glee,
The home of her infant rest,
She goes like a bird from its sheltering tree,
A dove from its parent nest.

The dove may return with a broken wing,
With a bruised and bleeding side;
She may come, a broken-hearted thing,—
That young, and blooming bride.

She is leaving friends that are tried and dear,
To gladden another's home;
And though for the future she has no fear,
Yet the sad'ning thought will come;

That the friends she leaves may be changed or gone,
And the hearts she loves grow cold;
Even now, she misses some cherished one,
From the gathered family fold.

It is mockery to that mother's heart,
The song, and the thoughtless tone,
With the mirth and laughter, she takes no part,
Her spirit is sad and lone.

Then hush the song, and lift up the prayer,
Fervent to heaven above,
For a blessing on the youthful pair,—
For a life of wedded love.

Sketches from Real Life. No. 1.

OLD ISABELLE.

'HER lot is on you—silent tears to weep,
And patient smiles to wear through suffering's hour,

And a true heart of hope, though hope be vain—
Meekly to bear with wrong, to cheer decay,
And oh! to love through all things.'

READER, I bring you no romantic story to call forth your sympathy and awaken your interest, decked out with exaggerated delineations of character, and fictitious representations of wo! but a round unvarnished tale from the sober realities of life; and though many parallel instances may be found, yet few will more strongly serve to illustrate the forbearance of woman, and the ingratitude of man.

Some fifty years since, Isabelle Bourgeois was the prettiest little French girl in the village of D—in Lower Canada, situated on the banks of the Richelieu, a small but beautiful river, taking its rise from Lake Champlain, and emptying itself into the noble St. Lawrence. And D— would to this day have little to boast of that might interest the eye of the passing traveller, were it not for the bright waters of this rapid stream, that serve to give life and animation to a scene that would otherwise be almost insipid from its uniformity. The country around is very level, and cannot boast of that diversity in nature which now surrounds me in mountain and valley, the majestic forest, and the sparkling water-fall.

As I have said, Isabelle was the prettiest girl in the village, and not only was she pretty, but amiable, and like most French girls, gay and lively. She was small, but well-formed, her complexion a clear brown, and her eyes black as night. She was naturally shrewd, and possessed talents, that had they been cultivated, would have shown hers to have been no ordinary mind. But alas! gentle reader, what will you think of my heroine, when I tell you that she could neither read or write? It is probably well known that the Canadians do not enjoy the educational privileges of their more fortunate neighbors the Americans; and what advantages they now possess, limited as they are, are great compared with their opportunities fifty years ago. And it was indeed a rare circumstance, when one in humble life, like Isabelle, had learning enough to read the petite catechism.

Our heroine early lost her father and mother, and was brought up by her aunt, an excellent woman, who labored successfully to instil into her youthful mind, those religious and moral precepts which guided and upheld her through her future life. At the age of seventeen she had scarcely known a care—having been left an orphan so young that she knew no other parent than matante; and no face more truly told of happiness than Isabelle's when all its animated expression was excited by the village dance, the quilting party, or the amusement of hay-making. You smile, my lady readers, but the last employment is not scorned by the Canadian country girls, and with them forms one of the enjoyments of summer. It was no uncommon circumstance for our 'helps' to leave us for a while at this season, as they 'wanted a holiday, and would go out to make hay!' I have often been amused to think how very differently people estimate things in this world. A few years since, after having been for some time confined to the 'pent city,' I came with a dear friend to spend a few days in Vermont; and verily, it was a time to be marked with white stones, when we climbed among the green mountains searching for berries, and tearing our dresses! We were on this occasion invited to a tea-party at a worthy farmer's in the vicinity—and never have I seen a more pleasant specimen of rustic life, than that exhibited by his 'homestead.' Gladly would I have exchanged the pomps and vanities of a town life for a residence in that pretty white cottage shaded by the graceful elm, and ornamented by a profusion of roses and lilacs. After tea we passed through a room in which was a loom, and never before having seen such a phenomenon, I examined it somewhat attentively. On discovering my ignorance, the good lady of the house lifted up her eyes in astonishment, and exclaimed, 'Well I want to know! how can folks enjoy themselves without knowing how to weave!'

But to my tale;—Isabelle had attained the age I have mentioned, when Antoine La Rose and his aged mother came from a distant part of the country to reside in D—. He was many years her senior, but still a very handsome man. His appearance was different from that of her other admirers, for, as is usual with a country belle, she had several. He was very tall and commanding in person, with a fair complexion, full blue eyes, and light brown hair. He had no sooner become acquainted with the young Isabelle, than his eye rested on her with the gaze of admiration; and he soon determined to make the prize his own. But this was no easy matter among so many competitors—some of whom he knew must be more highly approved by la bonne tante than himself. There was Baptiste Langeoin, a steady young farmer, and the richest beau in the place. He had for two years singled out Isabelle from her companions, and now seemed to redouble his attentions; but then all said, though she respected, and treated him as a brother, she did not love him; and all who knew Isabelle's warm heart, knew that she would not marry unless she loved. Then there was Pierre La Blanc, a thriving carpenter, and one of the best young men in the place—he was dying for Isabelle; and folks could not find out whether he would be successful or not; it was thought she liked him better than Baptiste, but the truth was, no one knew anything about the matter. There were also others on the list, but we will not delay our story by describing them.

Now Antoine was an idle kind of fellow, without any fixed employment; sometimes he would 'work out' for a few days, then occasionally he would make a canoe, but his favorite pursuit, in which he spent most of his time, was fishing; and as at this time, most people made it a duty to catch their own fish, it was not a very lucrative business; yet Antoine managed to support himself and his old mother pretty comfortably, for their wants were few. The little cottage in which they lived, containing but two rooms, was not to be compared to the snug stone house on Baptiste's farm, or the commodious frame dwelling that Pierre was even now occupied in building. But Antoine knew something of the female heart, when he said to himself, after turning over the subject in his mind, 'well, I will try and please her, and if she only loves me, she will not mind the house;' and he was right, what woman who really loves, ever would 'mind the house!'

When it was reported a few months afterwards, that Antoine and Isabelle were to be married, many shook their heads, and prophesied that she would bitterly repent of it. Some told her she would have no small task in taking care of his mother, who was childish and very fretful; her reply was 'I love Antoine, and for his sake I shall love his mother too, and I will be a daughter to her, and bear with her if she is old and peevish.' Others said that he was idle, and fond of drink, but poor Isabelle loved her intended husband too well to believe he would ever do anything to make her unhappy, and turned a deaf ear to all these observations. She had however some trouble in overcoming the objections of her aunt, who warmly espoused the cause of the young farmer; and she had reason to do so, for Baptiste was an excellent man, with one of the kindest hearts in the world, and she knew he would do all that an affectionate husband could to render his wife happy. His neat house, and well stocked farm, also had their due weight with the good woman, and very eloquently did she set forth all these advantages to her niece, contrasted with Antoine's poverty, bad habits, and ill temper; but her arguments availed not with Isabelle. 'Ma chère tante' said she, 'do you wish me to be happy?' 'Certainly, I do, my dear child, what other object have I in thus advising you?' Well then, I never can be so if I marry Baptiste; though I regard him as a brother, I can never love him as I do Antoine, and I know I shall be happy with him if he has not a sou—I am young and healthy, I will help him to make money, and perhaps by and by we may be rich, and if we are not, it will make no difference, we shall love each other, and we shall be happy.' There was no resisting such logic as this, and—they were married.

I must now request the kind reader to pass over the next thirty years, and pay a visit with me to 'old Isabelle' as she was when I first knew her. That low white cottage with the apple trees about it, is hers, and there she is, sitting in the door knitting, in her striped woollen jupon, and calico 'short gown.' She is still a fine looking woman, with a bright intelligent eye, but care seems to have furrowed her brow, and all traces of joy seem long since to have taken their departure. Near her sits her husband's mother, who has now numbered a hundred years! Poor old woman, she seems to have outlived all enjoyment—she is almost bent double, and she has lost both her hearing and her sight; how sunken, and how dim are her eyes, and yet she is trying to sew! And there sits Antoine outside the door, on a log, destined, I suppose, ere long to skim over the glad waters of the Richelieu, in the form of a canoe—he has a pipe in his mouth, and on his head he wears the Canadian bonnet rouge. His face is red and bloated, and shows no remnant of the manly beauty of which it once boasted. Discontent and vexation are expressed in his countenance, and to our courteous bon soir, he scarcely deigns a reply. How differently does his wife receive us, as she hands us each a chair, and then hastens to present us with some of her ripest apples, and a glass of delicious milk.

I really wish I could make Isabelle tell her own story, but no—she will not do so—she will not say anything that may attach blame to her husband, and though she is aware that every one knows of his conduct, she seems determined to be silent about it. It seems that for some time after their marriage he behaved pretty well, but at last gave way to idle and dissipated habits, until he became a confirmed sot; and before the expiration of three years the entire support of the family devolved upon his wife. He would smoke and drink as long as rum and tobacco lasted, and then he would take to his net, or line, and fish; and if he had no luck, (or if he had, and could not sell his fish) he would return home in ill humor, which was too often vented on his aged parent and his amiable wife; who seeing that she could no longer depend upon her husband's assistance, exerted her energies to the utmost for the maintenance of the family. It was now the time of the last war, between England and America, (and O kind heaven grant that it may continue to be the last,) and D— being not far distant from 'the lines' that separate Canada from the States, became a military post of some consequence, and was occupied by several regiments of British soldiers; and Isabelle did very well by taking in washing and sewing for the officers, who very liberally remunerated her for her services. She suffered much however from alarm and uneasiness during this season of tumult and confusion—her husband being frequently absent at night, at some drunken frolic—while she and the old woman remained alone and unprotected in their little cottage. Many a night has she been known to watch for him at the window with untiring anxiety until the day broke; and when reeling home, a loathsome and disgusting object, instead of upbraiding him, she would receive him kindly, and hasten to prepare for him as comfortable a meal as their circumstances would permit. Does the reader expect that this 'long-suffering'—this forbearance, at last had its reward, in subduing and reforming the now hardened heart of her husband? Alas! would that I could say so! But truth compels me to relate that year after year saw no change in him for the better—indeed he grew worse, as at times, when under the influence of liquor, and raging with thirst for more, he would extort from her by threats, and if these failed, by personal ill usage, the proceeds of her hard day's labor, to furnish him with the means of indulging again in the maddening draught!

It has often been a subject of wonder to me, that poor Isabelle did not sink under so much suffering; and endured too time after time, without any prospect of improvement. But her spirit seemed to gather strength as her trials increased, and her industry and perseverance was only surpassed by her economy and good management. She formed the plan of laying aside something out of her earnings, as a provision for her old age; and to evade her husband's demands on the small overplus that remained, after providing for their necessities, she prevailed upon one of her neighbors to take charge of her savings, (there was no savings bank in Canada then,) and to allow her a little interest for the same, and by this means, after ten years of unwearied exertion, she saw herself the owner of half an acre of land, and a small house, which she let to a poor, but honest family. And when my acquaintance with her commenced, she was 'saving up' to buy another. At this time the war was over, and Isabelle did not find her business as profitable as formerly; so she went out five, and sometimes six days of the week to 'work out' by the day; and she gained the good will and esteem of her employers, by the interest and faithfulness with which she discharged her duty to them. Well do I remember the first day she came to work at 'the Parsonage' (which, by the by, was the means of my first introduction to her, having been sent by my mother to engage her weekly attendance on the 'washing day,' how pleased we were with the 'nice tidy little French woman,' and how soon the children began to love her, and even the baby would hold out its tiny hands, and cry to go to her. Children are usually correct physiognomists, and seem to have an instinctive perception of goodness in others, as they generally soon manifest an attachment for the kind and benevolent. Yes, dear old Isabelle—many a year has passed over my head since then, and variously checkered has been the scene of my life—the bright undimmed sunshine of prosperity and happiness, and the dark clouds of adversity have been mine. I have sojourned in the icy regions of the North, and in tropic countries, and been dashed about at the mercy of the broad ocean—but never have I forgotten thee and thy trials, nor the kindness with which as a wayward child, thou didst ever treat me.

Antoine's aged mother died when nearly a hundred and ten years old. Could her memory have served her, she might have furnished an interesting account of the incidents of a century! But she had long been a second time a child, and it may easily be imagined what a task devolved upon Isabelle, in the care she required. She was obliged to hire some person to attend to her when absent at work. The poor old creature suffered much from her fears of death, and purgatory—if not of something more dreadful still. I remember trying to comfort her with all the eloquence of which I was capable, by speaking of the goodness of God, which, young and thoughtless as I was, I never could reconcile with the idea of eternal torments for the wicked! But then, I thought it was taught in the scriptures—and sometimes I was afraid that I did not believe the Bible! I thank God that a brighter day has since dawned upon me, and that now I can believe my Bible, and—be happy.

Antoine followed his mother to her last resting place, not long after; and during his long and tedious illness, (he died of a lingering consumption) his wife's cares were lightened, and her days made comparatively happy, by the change which took place in his temper. He manifested much remorse for his mis-spent life; and again and again did he implore his wife's forgiveness, for having so cruelly blighted the hopes of happiness in which she indulged, when with a fond woman's confidence in the object of her affections, and in the bloom of her youth and beauty, she became his, and cheerfully indeed was this granted. The poor creature, with a devotion and forbearance almost more than mortal, had not only borne with him, but actually loved him still! And though tempted by advantageous offers of employment—and by many, strongly urged to leave him, she never for a moment thought of deserting him. I remember one evening, calling at her cottage, and met Antoine coming out, evidently intoxicated, and angry. There was no one in the outer room, but the sound of suppressed sobs from the chamber, assured me that poor Isabelle had just passed through one of her saddest scenes. I could not avoid expressing my indignation at his conduct, and ended by saying 'you have borne this long enough from your ungrateful husband, every one says you have done more than your duty—you must leave him at once, and come and live with us.' 'O no, Miss, I never will leave him,' was her reply, 'what would become of him if I was to do so? why he would die in a ditch, with no one to close his eyes! Poor man, he needs a wife, much more than if he was steady!'

Some time before his death she adopted a little orphan niece, and although for some years she thus added to her cares and expenses, yet having no children of her own, she became as such—and now that Isabelle too, has grown old and blind, Celeste by her good conduct, seems to repay her aunt's kindness to her during the helpless years of her infancy. Isabelle succeeded at last in purchasing another cottage, and the rents of the two, added to what Celeste earns by sewing, and occasional donations from old friends, keep them above want.

Whenever I pay my annual visit to the Parsonage, old Isabelle is generally the first to find it out, and comes leaning on the arm of her niece, to spend the day and talk over old times. The last time I was there, I found a change was in meditation, which I trust will have a happy result. Celeste was soon to be married to a respectable young farmer, who had promised to be kind, and to do all in his power to smooth the last days of one who had suffered so much from the ingratitude of man, and furnished so excellent an example of the forbearance of woman. A Tradition.

THE world knew not the Holy One !

Before strange gods the nations bowed ;
 They worship'd stars, the moon, the sun,
 And rolling thunders in the cloud.
 Egypt and Greece by science blest,—
 The savage horde and mountain clan,—
 The warlike tribe unused to rest,—
 All bowed to objects less than man.

Though sages led the youths among Elysian groves and classic shades,
 And poets tuned their lyres and sung,
 And graces clothed the Grecian maids,—
 Yet idols claimed all homage then ;
 And learning proud and mystery,
 Made willing vassals—slaves of men,
 And firmly chained what would be free.

The son of Terah roamed by night,
 Afar from home, his native cave ;
 He viewed the stars ; each golden light
 Gave thoughts to him profound and grave.
 Bright Venus most he gazed upon ;
 He loved that planet's cheerful smile,
 And said : 'Thou art the Holy One,
 To whom should bow earth, sea and isle.'

But that bright star soon disappeared ;
 It vanished from the path it trod ;
 He saw it fade, and then he feared
 To think it was creation's God.
 He gazed where first it glittered bright,
 And sable darkness filled the space ;
 He saw not then the golden light,
 Nor could he more its pathway trace.

Then next he viewed the silver moon ;
 Her gentle aspect drew his love ;
 He prized her more than earth's best boon,
 And far above Olympian Jove ;
 And said : 'O thou dost reign supreme—
 Thou charmer of the silent night !
 I'll kneel where comes thy smiling beam,
 And praise thy soft and trembling light.'

But soon the moon withdrew from sight ;—
 Her lovely form too sank to rest ;
 And darker grew the shades of night,
 And shadowy curtains vailed the West.
 As changed the star, and thus proved vain
 The thoughts that rose in Abram's mind,
 So changed the moon and all her train,
 And left again the wanderer blind.

In mist and doubt he groped along
 And stood before proud Babylon's wall ;
 He there beheld a kneeling throng—
 Ay, countless forms in homage fall
 Before the glorious orb of day.
 The sun's warm rays made earth all bright,
 As gloom and darkness fled away,
 And golden towers reflect his light.

Then said the son of Terah : 'Now
 My eyes behold what I have sought—
 The God to whom all men should bow—
 The God that earth from chaos brought !'
 But evening came ; the sun had gone,
 And ebon night once more did reign,
 The Tigris smiled not as at morn,
 But flowed unseen along the plain.

Euphrates, with its flowery banks,
 And willow shades, where childhood played,

And gazelles joined in sportive pranks,
 Rolled darkly by each hill and glade,
 And lofty towers that crowned the walls,
 The palace of the Chaldean prince,
 The costly domes and pillared halls,
 Seemed clouds without magnificence.

As Venus and the silver moon,
 Had left him as from home he hied,
 So set the sun of morn and noon,
 And Abram bowed himself and sighed.
 He thought how vain the homage paid
 To star, to moon, to day's bright sun,
 And senseless idols of the shade,
 When lived unseen the Holy One !

And said : 'The Spirit everywhere,
 Is my o'erruling Deity ;
 He rules in heaven, in earth and air,—
 His presence fills infinity.
 Before him will I bow the knee,
 At morn, and noon, and starry night ;
 He was, he is, shall ever be ;
 He reigns in darkness and in light.'

Night Musings.

BY MRS. SARAH BROUGHTON.

SURELY the night is glorious : the beautiful, solemn night ! It is but a little while, and the very soul was wearied and benumbed with the relentless task master, care. Every finer sensibility seemed blunted ; the eye could scarcely discern beauty in the gorgeous tintings of sunset, the ear heard no music in the thousand busy tones that rang upon its wearied sense. But how changed ! We are no longer in the sunny empire of day, when the glad beams danced among the rich green leaves, flinging their silvery radiance, alas, into the solemn glens, and gilding with checkered lustre the many columned aisles of the dim old woodlands, whose stately, moss grown pillars, have listened for centuries to the thrilling, ever varying anthem of the chainless winds. The busy hum of industry is hushed, the strong man has ceased from toil, and now rests powerless as the infant in the similitude of death ; the merry hearted child has left its wild chase among the perfumed blossoms where the painted butterfly led it on from stem to stem, still eluding the giddy grasp of the tiny hand, as pleasure's phantoms fly before the eager vision of folly's children. The mysterious veil of slumber rests upon earth's care worn millions,—the late noisy world is hushed and still, and the few who wake to commune with high and holy thought, find the balm of refreshment stealing over their wearied spirits as they gaze upon the solemn quiet of the scene around them. How dark and frowningly fall the shadows of yon dim old forest, upon whose dew-gemmed leaves the silver moonbeams rest in floods of liquid radiance! How softly falls the mellow light upon the waving grain that sways to the night breeze like the surface of a mirrored lake, and its various changes seem like the shadows of spirit-wings, that hover around us on some errand of mercy.

There is enchantment in the hour. Voices, soft ærial voices are abroad on the wind's fitful pinions; now moaning sadly and low, through the quivering branches, like the sweet, warm gushings of early sympathies; now pealing with wild and thrilling wail through the tossing boughs, echoing along through the greenwood arches, each cadence gathering strength, till its solemn roar overpowers the listening soul with the memory of long past hours; hours when the floodtide of grief whelmed the bleeding heart beneath the anguish-billows, and the shades of despair frowned dimly around the stricken spirit.

Again the tones of the fitful harp swell soft and clear, and the merry tinkle of the chiming rill falls sweetly on the ear. Where are we now? Is this the same dull sphere we dwelt in an hour ago? Ah no. We recline in the bowers of the past. The light breeze fans our youthful tresses as we ramble the flowery lawns with loved ones whose faces shall gladden our pilgrimage no more. Listen. The images so long enshrined in the heart's secret sanctuary are prattling around us, and oh, how the heart strings thrill with pain as the melody of those cherub tones falls with vivid intenseness upon their yearning fibres. The soft curls gleam in silvery beauty on the finely chiselled brows, and the blue eyes flash in their star like radiance. Alas! the warm tears gush, and the beautiful visions are fading away. Chill and dark is the pall that is gathering over those hallowed memories. God of mercy, grant us strength to read aright these mysterious lines in the volume of thy wisdom. Bid the soul look upwards in this sanctifying hour. How calm, how glorious is the limitless dome above us. No discord is there. The myriad worlds that deck the vast realms of space, roll on in mysterious harmony in their appointed circuits, sending their flashing, gem-like rays far down the azure steep, like altar-lights burning ever in the solemn temple of night. What if clouds obscure the view? They belong to earth, and when their darkening folds retire, how brightly glows the signet of the Eternal's promise on the receding gloom. But how much brighter glows the signet of Jehovah's eternal mercy on the black clouds of sin and death. See, through the long, long lapse of almost countless centuries, the pall of impervious gloom rests over human destiny. Death strides with unfaltering step along the pathway of mortals, gathering his victims to the silent charnel, from whose damp vaults no voice has ever greeted the ear of the lonely, bereaved one. The dark frowning banners of oblivion rested on all the heart held dear, and no strong hand had ever rent their gloomy folds, or unbarred the iron portals of the insatiate grave. But let the soul go backward on the wing of thought, bid the spirit-vision look through the dim vistas of the past and gaze upon a scene calm and beautiful as this. The midnight moon is casting her mellow light over Judea's hills, and her lovely vales are filled with radiant splendor. No storm vexes the sleeping waves of Galilee, but the crescent-lamps of heaven are mirrored in its silent depths. The shepherds are quietly watching their flocks on the dewy plains. Suddenly, a soft, sweet strain of unearthly melody floats slowly downward on the stilly air. Again, again with deepening tones, swells the seraphic harmony; the lofty sapphire arches ring with the echos of ten thousand lyres; and lo! on pinions of glory, descend the bright co-horts of heaven's armies; and hark, the silvery trumpet-tones proclaiming to the wondering watchers, 'Fear not; behold I bring you glad tidings of joy which shall be unto all people. For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Savior who is Christ the Lord.' Again, those anthem notes rise full and clear along the cerulean arches, as the dazzling throng plume their golden pinions toward the gates of paradise. And as they wing their way to the far off chambers of the beatific Presence, how sweetly rings the pealing chant, 'Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, and good will toward man.' Shall not the soul rejoice in the glorious bequest then conferred on man. The babe of Bethlehem—the anointed king of spiritual Zion, has descended to the sin-blighted bowers of time, to rend the dark veil of ignorance from the human heart, to purge the mental vision from gross error, to cleanse the degraded soul from the dark plague spot of iniquity; and, opening the portals of glory, to shed upon the gloomy mansions of the grave the ever-glorious light of life and immortality. And is it not in wisdom and mercy, that our loved ones are withdrawn to the spirit mansions ere yet the light of loveliness has faded from lip and brow? Bitter are the tears that must flow when our cherished blossoms in all their transparent loveliness are severed from their parent stem, and transferred to those mysterious, unknown realms beyond the reach of mental vision. Yet in mercy are these trials meted out to us. How would the spirit-vision grow dim if the yearning soul were never wooed to those brighter bowers, by voices whose melody has long since died save on the murmuring cords of memory's lyre. Would not the eye of faith grow obscure, were it never cheered by glances whose radiance is not now of earth, but of a sphere where the light of love is never dim, or veiled by the mist of error. The parting hour must be ever bitter, when the love-glances fade from the glazing eye, and the lips that ever warbled melody grow silent and frigid beneath the wand of the pale king; yet in after-time their remembrance is sweet, and often it elevates the soul above the dull cares of earth, and causes it to commune in spirit with those whom we cannot believe lost, because they were so very dear to us. Love is the brightest link in the chain with which we are bound to one another, and to God. It is indeed the electric spring, whose touch will make every cord to vibrate; and if the wires be tuned by the unerring hand of truth, how exquisite the music that thrills the soul. Even when the dark night of adversity has closed around us, and boding clouds of future ill obscure our whole horizon, how sweetly do their symphonious numbers echo from beyond the gloomy curtain, telling of bowers whose verdure never fades; of living streams whose crystal waves proceeding from the changeless throne of unapproachable Majesty, flow ever onward, flashing in the glorious splendor of truth's unfading beams; of flowers that drooped in this chill sphere, now blushing in immortal hues beside the diamond waves of never failing fountains, whose crystalline depths are shaded by the stainless clusters; whose fragrance is borne on the living air, a sweet offering of praise to the Eternal One.

Do we not look upon death with less dread, when we think how many of our precious jewels he has in his keeping? Would not the night shades of atheism be more likely to shroud the human mind in its rayless gloom, if we were never called to resign the pure, unsullied gems of intellect, before their lustre had been tarnished in the atmosphere of sin? When the anguished heart is bleeding and lacerated, it cannot kiss the chastening rod; but when time has stilled the turbid waters of grief, and the angel of peace has folded his heavenly mantle around the soul, and faith with her sun-lit eye has pointed the aching vision to its far-off home, and wreathed the throbbing brow with the coronal of immortal bloom; how sweet is the song of gratitude that rises from the subdued spirit to Him who spared not his own Son, but gave him as the seal of man's redemption from the grasp of death. Surely thy mission is glorious, thou angel of the solemn night. When thy mystic hand has spread the shadowy veil over the variegated beauty of earth, thou biddest the spirit leave its prison of care and hold communion with high and beautiful thought. The soul with free unfettered pinion claims affinity with angels, and looks with pleasure to that period when dropping the robe of mortality it shall plume its sky-bent wings, and learn to tread the glittering pathway of the stars. The wild-woven numbers of thy mysterious minstrelsy seem but the far off echos of harps whose golden wires are swept by celestial fingers—soft, dying cadences of immortal anthems, whose pealing strains roll ever from the glad throng who surround the dazzling throne of light, where shining ranks of cherubim and seraphim hide their radiant faces beneath their pinions of purple light, as from ten thousand times ten thousand quivering strings they win immortal melody; while far along the dazzling lines of congregated immortals, swells the glad song of Moses and the Lamb, and golden palms, and starry crowns, are cast low before the Ancient of Days; and ascriptions of glory and honor ring over the glorious expanse to the high sapphire arches; and the living incense of grateful praise ascends continually from the golden censers around the eternal mount, where bow the angel, and the archangel.

God is Love.

How much is contained in the three little words 'God is love.' The sun, as it rises in all its glorious splendor and spreads its cheering and enlivening rays on all around, until it reaches its mid-day summit in the heavens, and then sinks lower and lower, until it goes down beneath the dim shades of the western horizon, to give place to the moon, and the lesser orbs of night which are placed on high to cheer this mundane world when the light of day has departed; the flowers which bloom with all their freshness beneath our feet, and scatter their sweet fragrance along our path; the feathered songsters that soar above our heads, cheering us on our lonely way with their sweet notes of melody; all tell us, in a voice too plainly to be mistaken, that 'God is love.'

Our heavenly Father must have been actuated by the holy principle of love, when he planned this beautiful universe in which we live, and adapted everything so fully to satisfy the wants and ensure the happiness of man, when he gave his only-begotten Son to redeem and purify a lost and sinful world, from the thralldom of ignorance, sin and error. That Being who has blessed us with all these riches of his goodness, and of whom it is declared, that not a sparrow falls to the ground without his notice, and who numbers the very hairs of our heads, must certainly be a God of unbounded love.

And has that God made for some of his own dependant offspring, or exposed them to an eternal world of anguish, wretchedness, and wo? Has he placed his children here in this fleeting world to exist for a few short years, and then for sins which lesson life's enjoyments, will he condemn them to endure an eternity of suffering, which cannot produce good to angel, saint, or sinner? No, it is impossible! Impossible for the best of all reasons—'God is love.' The feeble love of earthly parents, or friends, inclines them to have a good end in view in every exercise of severity, and this alone can free any from the charge of cruelty when they cause others to suffer. We should therefore give to God the honor that is due, by ascribing to him no exercise of severity that cannot promise good results. God is love to each mortal, and he will be love to each immortal.

Our Creator has bestowed upon us moral and intellectual powers which may be highly cultivated; yea, they make us capable of infinite progress; and with these he has given us a desire to exist—'a longing after immortality.' He will, in his unchanging love, grant satisfaction to this longing, that our powers to glorify him may be developed to his praise. O thus he will give the highest manifestation that he is the God of love!

Let us learn then the moral of God's love, for love is the spirit of union and joy. Look where love unites all hearts, and see what unalloyed happiness and heavenly bliss reigns there! In whatever family, society, or nation we are placed, where the members are bound together by love, there you will find kindly sympathy and fellow feeling. Was it not a kindred love that was felt by our blessed Savior, when he wept at the grave of Lazarus? Let us make its beauty ours! And should it not inspire our hearts—make us ready to mourn with those that mourn, and prompt us to visit and comfort the sick and dying, whether they be friend, or foe? Oh yes! in whatever form we see sorrow and grief, we should be active, if we can be, to drop a word of kindness, and calm the troubled breast. Never do we better imitate the example which our blessed Savior has set before us, than when we are visiting the sick and afflicted, pouring into their bleeding hearts the soothing balm of consolation; and when the cup of affliction seems almost full to ourselves—when there is nothing earthly left for the troubled mind to feed upon, then, O then, how great the consolation, if love has sent some kind friend to our relief, to assuage the racking pains of sorrow.

Then let love govern all our actions, and inspire our hearts in every good word and work, and may we ever be consoled, by the knowledge of that pure and heavenly love revealed to us in the Gospel of Jesus Christ: which teaches us that we should love God because he is lovely—because he first loved us. And may we ever remember that it was one of his own prophets who said of him: 'Though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his tender mercies.' And finally, when we have done with all sublunary things, our heavenly Father hath prepared for us 'an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.' A. D. P.

One I love is in the Grave.

BY MISS M. A. DODD.

BRIGHT the summer sun is shining,
Blue the sky, and fresh the breeze,
Flowers the garden walks are twining,
Birds are warbling in the trees;
But while joy is smiling round me,
Naught from pain my heart can save,
Sadness with her spell has bound me,
One I love is in the grave.

Cheerful looks and pleasant voices,
Call me from my grief away;
Nothing now my heart rejoices,
Vain each effort to be gay.

Let me weep! the tears are swelling,
Eyes which smiles so often gave,
For each hour the tale is telling,
One I love is in the grave.

All things wear the garb of sorrow,
For my heart is filled with gloom,
And my thoughts their hue will borrow,
From the shadow of the tomb.
Mournfully the waves are singing,
Dim the verdure which they lave,
Every sound a knell is ringing,
One I love is in the grave.

Sadly now the days I number,
Dark and slow their passing seems,
Night but brings me troubled slumber,
Restless hours and weary dreams.
Death's dark wings my path are shading,
Sable plumes before me wave,
Phantoms from my gaze are fading,
One I love is in the grave.

Father, in distress I languish;
Heal the wound thy hand has made;
Thou canst see my silent anguish,
Thou wilt pity, thou wilt aid;
Yes, a ray of light is beaming,
From despair my soul to save,
Jesus, on thy bosom leaning,
One I love has left the grave.

The Indestructibility of the Mental Impressions;

Or the Future Identity of Man.

'BUT though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day.' PAUL.

THE question has been often asked, Shall we retain our identity in the future state? That is, shall we remember there that we had lived in this world? By some, this question is answered in the negative; and even some who call themselves christians, pretend to disbelieve that mankind, in the immortal state, will not be conscious that they once lived in this world. But why should any person, who believes in christianity, doubt for a moment, that man will retain his identity in the resurrection world? The belief that he will not, is unreasonable, comfortless, and unscriptural.

I. Man has a soul, or spirit, as well as a body. This soul, or mind, is contemplated as distinct from the body, and no way affected morally by any physical change. Though the outer man perish, yet the inner man may be renewed daily. Though the 'dust return to the dust as it was, yet the spirit shall return to God who gave it.' This view of man is corroborated by observation. The body of man is continually undergoing changes. For example, the individual who lives sixty years has had two or three bodies—or, in other words, his body has changed two or three times during that term of years. But his mind has not changed, for he retains his identity. He remembers, he is conscious that he is the identical person now, whose childhood, youth and manhood he takes in at one glance of retrospection. But if his mind had changed as his body did, he could not remember the whole course of his life.

Then, if the body can be changed several times gradually in the term of a few years, without affecting the identity of mind, why may not the mind remain unchanged by the sudden dissolution of the body? It appears to me that if a physical change of body which is gradual does not affect the spirit, neither can a change which takes place in a moment affect it.

It has pleased the Creator to give our spirits bodies which are liable to change in this world, and also to prepare for them other bodies, immortal and incorruptible, with which they are to be clad in eternity. Death destroys the mortal, and the power of the resurrection prepares the immortal. Hence the apostle said—'We know that if the earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.'

It is the opinion of some philosophers and theologians that all the mental impressions are indestructible,—that all the thoughts and purposes of the heart are as imperishable as the mind itself; so that 'the act of thinking becomes the register of thought upon the perpetual tablet of the soul.' It is, however, not pretended that there is absolute demonstration of this, still there are facts and phenomena in regard to the mind—especially the power of memory—that seem to warrant the conclusion above mentioned.

1. Every person can recollect many instances when he has attempted in vain to recall a forgotten idea; but because he could not, by any effort of mind, recollect the idea, forms no presumption that the idea is lost beyond recovery; for often, after this unavailing effort of the thinking powers to open to the page in the book of remembrance on which the idea is inscribed, it seems spontaneously, by and by, to present itself anew to the mind.

2. Impressions and ideas long forgotten often return suddenly and unexpectedly upon us, and quickly again vanish without our being able to retain them, like some friend that passes by our window, we catch a momentary glimpse of him, and he is gone. They seem to be beyond the control of the will, coming and passing away like the zephyr, without our knowing whence it came or whither it has gone. Indeed, every person must have experienced in himself instances like this of the involuntary resuscitation of mental images. Such facts prove conclusively that there are images or pictures of things impressed on the mind, though at the time we may not be conscious of them; but which, like the electric fluid sleeping in a summer evening cloud, requires only an appropriate medium of attraction to gleam forth.

This being the case, may we not say, that, if one class of ideas or impressions, which seemed to have gone forever from the mind, is recalled by some external circumstance, some accidental association, all ideas whose impressions were when made, at least as strong, would recur, if their respective associations could be awakened.

3. Individuals, by reason of some disease of the brain, or a violent blow upon the head, have remembered what in a state of health it had been impossible to recollect. On the other hand some have forgotten for a time all they ever had known, till some circumstance has re-instated memory in its important office. In proof of these statements I will adduce some well authenticated facts.

A few years ago a case of this kind occurred in Germany, in the town of Gottingen, a young woman of about 25 years of age, who was unable either to read or write, was seized with a nervous fever, during which time she continued incessantly talking Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, with most distinct pronunciation. This singular case attracted the attention of a young physician, and by his statements many eminent physiologists and psychologists visited her and examined the case upon the spot. All conspiracy or deception was out of the question.

This mystery, however, was revealed by ascertaining the following fact. The physician learned that his patient had lived several years in the family of an old protestant clergyman, and he was in the habit for years, of reading from classical authors, while walking in his house, through a passage way into which was a door leading to the room in which she kept. The physician succeeded in identifying so many passages with those taken down at the bed side that no doubt could remain in a rational mind concerning the true origin of her impressions. They must have been made by hearing the passages read or repeated by that clergyman.

This proves that impressions may exist long in a latent state in the very same order in which they were originally made. The fever stimulated the brain so that the impressions were called up as they were originally. The inflammation on the brain did not create those ideas of the classical passages of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew; but, as the earthquake by its convulsions may open to view rich mines of gold and silver, which otherwise had not been exposed to sight; so, the violence of disease, so unfolded the scroll of memory that those splendid ideas of classic lore were called up to the mind, which but for that instance of disease, had not been unfolded on earth.

Another instance of the kind took place in Freehold, New Jersey. I refer to Rev. William Tenant. One day while conversing with his brother in Latin, he fainted and apparently died away. He remained in a state of suspended animation for three days; and when the people were assembled to the funeral, he gave signs of life, and opened his eyes. He gradually recovered his health. A considerable time after his resuscitation, and when able to take notice of what passed around him, he saw his sister reading a book, and asked her what she had in her hand. She told him it was the Bible. Said he, 'what is the Bible? I know not your meaning.'

Upon examination it was found that he was totally ignorant of every transaction of his past life. He could not read a word, nor had he any idea what reading was. But in a short time he commenced anew to read and write as children are usually taught. And under the tuition of his brother, he began to study the Latin language. One day as he was reciting a lesson from Cornelius Nepos, he suddenly started, put his hands to his head, as if something had hurt him, and made a pause. He told his brother that he felt a sudden shock in his head, and it now seemed to him that he had read that book before. His recollection by degrees returned so that he regained a perfect knowledge of the past transactions of his life.

I will mention but one instance more of this kind. This was related to the writer of this by Dr. Greenland, an eminent physician in the city of Charleston, S. C. A few years since a gentleman of good education, while sitting in his chair and leaning back, fell; and in his fall, struck his head against some sharpened fixture. And immediately all that was past of his experience became as a blank to him. He forgot all his learning, and forgot he had a wife and family. In this situation he remained two or three days, when the pain in his head became so acute that he caught hold of his hair with great violence, and instantly his memory began to return to him. It was supposed that a piece of the skull was indented upon the brain by the fall, which produced his forgetfulness, and that this indented part was raised up from the brain by the violence he used upon himself.

In regard to this case, I remark, that the opinion which some individuals entertain, that the mind may be destroyed by a blow upon the head, is erroneous. The question is sometimes tauntingly asked, where is that man's mind who loses his faculties by a contusion upon the brain? I answer where it was before he received the blow. It is evidently wrong to say that the mind is destroyed because it is deranged in its manifestations, or ceases to act through its organs. Was the above mentioned individual's mind destroyed by the blow he received in falling, which caused him to forget everything and to appear as though he had no mind? No—for if the blow destroyed the mind, the violence he used upon himself created it again! The fact in regard to this matter is, the mind may, and does exist, when it is but imperfectly, or not at all manifested; as in the cases of idiots, the superannuated, and the insane.

II. But, in the next place, how utterly comfortless the opinion is that all impressions of the mind in the future world, which were made in this life, shall be eradicated, and man then forget forever that he had existed in a former life! Let a person of such views go to the bedside of some friend about to leave this world. What consolation, what hope could he impart? Would it comfort the dying one to be told that God will make of him and all others, a higher race of beings, though he shall forget that he once lived here, and had friends beloved and loving? Would not this be virtually telling the dying one, you will in a few hours be annihilated—you will cease to be in every respect that renders life desirable and dear to an intellectual and moral being,—your substance shall be created anew, and a being that shall not die, arise from it? What happiness would it be to the worm to tell him, were it possible, that it will be changed into a beautiful butterfly, and bathe its brilliant wings in sunlight, and drink nectar from a thousand flowers? He would say, what good will all that do me? The butterfly may enjoy life, but I, the poor worm, shall cease to be!

Say, if you please, that the Almighty will make of myself, in the world to come, a Fenelon, a Paul, or an angel; but if the future state has no connection with this, so that all which pertains to me shall be swallowed up and my identity lost, I can feel no interest in the future life. There may be beings there equal to the angels—but—I, the identical individual who pens this, will not be. Hence I can feel no more interest in any being who will be there than I now feel in the inhabitants of one of the planets. What though that world should be described to my vision as splendid and glorious? if I, who am now, shall know nothing about it, I should be like Moses upon Mount Pisgah—I may see the promised land in the distance, but must die on the mount of vision.

III. In the last place, what saith the scriptures in regard to this matter? Before I refer to direct scriptural proof, I will notice an inference that has been drawn from a passage of scripture in favor of the opinion that we shall not remember in the resurrection state that we lived in this. It is true that St. Paul says we shall all be changed, and this mortal put on immortality.

But what is to be changed? Not the mind or spirit, but the body. The body here is mortal, corruptible, natural, weak and earthly; the body there shall be immortal, incorruptible, spiritual, powerful, glorious and heavenly. Hence the apostle said, in answer to the question—'how are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come?' So is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption; it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power; it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body. All this has reference to the resurrection body, as every one cannot fail to perceive.

When we ask the sacred writers what they believed in regard to man's identity in a future life, what do they tell us? St. Paul represents his view of this subject by the figure of a tenant that passes from one house to another; but certainly he was the same tenant in the last house that he was in the first. His language is:—'For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.'

Now 'the earthly house of our tabernacle' is our present body, but the eternal and heavenly house is our spiritual body. He then proceeds to say:—'For in this, (i. e. the mortal body) we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven, (i. e. the spiritual body) if so be that being clothed we shall not be found naked.' Who ever heard of a man's losing his identity by changing his clothes? We might as well suppose this possible as that St. Paul believed he should not be the identical Paul the apostle, when he should be clothed upon with immortality, that he was when in his earthly house. Hence he uses the following strong language; 'Therefore we are always confident, knowing that while we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord; we are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord.'

Believing most confidently that the opinion that we shall be the identical beings in another world that we are here only greatly improved and elevated, and that we shall not forget there that we had an existence here, and lived, and enjoyed, and suffered, and hoped; I will conclude this article with the beautiful sentiment of one of England's greatest poets:

'When coldness wraps this suffering clay,
Ah, whither strays the immortal mind?
It cannot die, it cannot stay,
But leaves its darkened dust behind.

Eternal, boundless, undecayed,
A thought unseen, yet seeing all,
All, all in earth, or skies displayed,
Shall it survey, shall it recall:
Each fainter trace that memory holds
So darkly of departed years,
In one broad glance the soul beholds,
And all, that was, at once appears.'

My Home! Farewell!

'Tis done! the relentless hammer fell!
The home is sold that I loved so well!
No more through my childhood's haunts shall I stray,
For inscribed on all is—'Passing away!'

Farewell to the door where the woodbines cling,
And over the windows their tendrils fling—
Forming a curtain graceful and bright,
As their green leaves flash in the clear sunlight;
Where the fair moon would shine timidly through,
As if fearful her charms some eye might view.

Farewell to the room with its painted walls,
More dear to my heart than wealth's proudest halls;
There from childhood's hour to womanhood's prime,
Have I spent most of my mis-spent time;
And the corner where with his whitened hair,
My father sat in his roundabout chair,

And read, 'till his aged eyes would weep,
As if in sorrow, that time would sweep
With unheeding wing, not leave even sight,
To gild the dim page with steady light.

O! why do we linger here, to mark,
Warm hearts grow cold—and bright eyes dark?
'Till all is changed, 'till scarce a trace
Of our former self is left—the place
Hallowed by memories pure and deep
Departs like the winds which o'er it sweep!
'Till bright hopes have vanished one by one,
Like stars from the vault of heaven—'till none
Are left upon life's dark and rayless sky!
O! what a boon it is then—to die!

Farewell to the closet so snug and warm,
Where I used to repose secure from harm,
Nor awake 'till my mother's step was heard,
As she rose with the sun—to duty stirred;
And the chamber where for many an hour,
I have listened to hear the rain-drops pour
On the shingled roof, and list as they fell,
How rich the music that would softly swell
From the pattering drops as they seemed to raise
To heaven a song of the sweetest praise.

Who has not felt the soothing power
Of summer's calm, refreshing shower!
Been lulled to a dreamy, listless state,
Of luxurious sleep,—yet half awake;
As sweet as we deem the infant's rest,
When pillowed on the maternal breast,
Hushed in sleep by that voice which alone
Of all the world, has the sweetest tone!

O! sweeter 's the music that nature sings
When summer winds sweep o'er numberless strings,
Than the loftiest strains of liquid fire,
E'er struck from the gifted one's burning lyre,
And each reed, and bush, and lofty tree,
Are instinct with richest melody!
The harps which hang round my childhood's home,
Are all unstrung; their melody 's gone!
And when last I heard their tremulous lay,
'Twas—'Farewell! farewell! we're "passing away!"'

Yes! all farewell! the cherry tree wild,
On whose topmost boughs, when a fearless child,
I have sat and read by sweet twilight,
'Till darkness obscured my aching sight;
Where the red-breast came to build her nest,
To rear her young—her wings to rest;
Where, when spring came, the welcome jay
Would come and carol his sweetest lay;
The clump of elders—'mid whose green leaves
Bright flowerets peep and woo the breeze;
The languishing vine, and willow pale
Which gracefully bows to the passing gale!

Farewell! forever! O! ne'er again,
Would I list thy wild harps mournful strain!
The charm has vanished! broken the spell
Which held me in thrall! the darkling swell,
Of change has flowed o'er each hallowed spot,
And left her dark stains on meadow and grot.
And this is dear life!—chained—fettered to see
Ties severed by resistless destiny!

But memory's home is a hallowed place!
And no footstep profane a path may trace
O'er its sacred ground; and there shall dwell,
Enshrined in its depths, a holy well
Of purest feeling; there, far below
The cold world's gaze, brightly shall glow
Each remembered scene; before me pass,
By memory's faithful magic glass,
Loved forms and dear, in bright array
Which but with life will 'pass away.'

Life a State of Activity. No. 1.

MAN is made, not for inactivity and ease, but for action—prompt, energetic, continued action, both of body and mind. His relations to the external world demonstrate the truth of this position. The Creator has placed man in the midst of elements that need continual control, or unceasing resistance. During the years of his infancy he is protected from dangers by paternal kindness, or shielded by maternal love. As he grows in years his physical wants and appetites demand satisfaction, and this can be obtained only through toil, exposure and hardship. His food, his clothing, his shelter, are not ready furnished to his hand, they must be created from earthly materials by his own active energies. Activity is the law of the human constitution. Action is the demand made upon man by the thousand voices of nature. In one sense, the external world is man's enemy; and he must either subdue and bend it to his purposes, or it will overmaster him. Indeed, it does finally overmaster us all. We wear ourselves out in contending with its elements; we become old and decrepid in our conflicts with nature; and then we die, leaving the earth as young, as vigorous, as beautiful as when we first breathed its atmosphere, or revelled amidst its glories.

Man is not only required to be active in this life, but he is required to act with promptness—to act immediately, without procrastination, and delay. Many people are a long time in coming to a decision in regard to subjects which require immediate action. This deliberation and carefulness are sometimes right. To reflect a long time upon a matter before we decide to act, or how to act, may be the means of securing success, where more hasty determination might result in disappointment and defeat. But in this rapidly revolving world, if we would accomplish any considerable amount of good, we must learn to consider and reflect with rapidity, so that we may form the habit of quickly coming to conclusions. Although hasty thought and premature action are great evils under the sun, yet dilatoriness and procrastination are still greater. This habit of deferring till to-morrow what can be done—what ought to be done to day, is one of the most fatal to success in the ordinary affairs of business life. If we yield to this procrastinating habit—if we give way to this reluctance to act now, the favorable opportunity may slip by us, and others, more prompt in action than ourselves, may secure the profits, and reap the honors of success. Not only in common business transactions, but in the pursuit of knowledge—in the study of the sciences—in building up for ourselves a political, literary or moral character, it would be well to imitate those great military commanders whose success in war has been owing, no less to the celerity of their movements, than to their energy and courage. We all have enemies to contend against. They present themselves before us continually. We encounter them in the mysteries of art and trade; in the difficulties of science; in the obscurities of important truths; in the intricacies of matter and the laws of mind. To master these subjects—to understand and comprehend them in their true nature and relations, we must examine and study as rapidly as the faculties of the soul become sufficiently keen and strong to grapple them. If we do not overcome our apathy and proceed to the business with promptness, a longer life than is generally allotted to man will be insufficient to obtain even a tolerable degree of information about them.

But man should not only act with promptness, he should act with vigor. Whatsoever his hand findeth to do, he should do it with his might. An individual may possess the habit of quick decision—he may act with promptness in ordinary cases or those of emergency, and yet on account of the feebleness of his actions—the languor of his movements, he may be a long time in attaining his object, or fail altogether in his intentions. Prosperity in the common affairs of human life, and especially high attainments in art, literature, or science, cannot be purchased at so cheap a price as people generally wish to pay. Superior skill in art, talent and tact in business, eminence in science or learning, will not come to man by being merely called for, or even labored for; they must be sought after with all the vigor and energy of man's active powers, if he would obtain and secure them. Neither the kingdom of heaven, or anything else comes by observation. God has been pleased to surround with difficulties every object which human nature desires. He has seen fit to overlay them with obstacles and encompass them with dangers. Some of these objects are far off and above our reach, so that if we will have them, we must make manful attempts to climb to where they are.

These difficulties, which, in every pursuit and every stage of life, are thrown before us, are the means which the Creator has appointed to develop, strengthen and improve our nature. Those who would live inactive and easy lives, mistake or disregard the end of their being. They must ever remain unacquainted with the grand and beautiful world in which they are placed, and will go out of it as wise as they entered. But those who come up to the most difficult and discouraging labor—those who grapple manfully with the obtruse problems of nature or human life, are the men, and the only men who live in accordance with the laws of the universe. Their faculties are sharpened and improved by every vigorous encounter with difficulties. Men who stand before the world as pre-eminent in science and literature—those whose opinions and influence are felt in their country and on their age, have not obtained the homage and respect of mankind without having paid for them a full equivalent. Could we read their history, should we not find that their lives had been lives of effort, toil and contest. It is these mainly which have given them their superiority over the minds of their fellow-men. And what these men are, the most of men may be.

Again: our efforts in the pursuits incident to our state of being, should not only be prompt—should not only be energetic—they should also be continual. There is no fear of doing too much—no danger of our performing an overplus of labor, no danger of accomplishing a superabundance of good. Neither is there so much danger as some people apprehend, of exhausting and wearing out the powers of the mind, or those of the body by continual physical and mental activity. The faculties of both body and mind are more frequently injured by listlessness and inactivity, than by excessive action. Like the waters of still pools, unemployed faculties stagnate and waste away.

As organized physical beings we should be active. The perfect health and full development of the corporeal system require this. No day should pass without manual labor of some kind, if we would have vigor of body and strength of muscle, and elasticity of spirit, and soundness of constitution. But our physical exercise ought to be productive: that is, it should contribute something to the common stock of property in the world—it should add to the amount of useful articles which enter into the consumption of civilized life. Everything which we consume—every article which ministers to the necessities, comforts and conveniences of the outward man, must be created by the manual labor of some of our fellow-creatures; and each man in the community should perform his share of this productive industry, not exclusively as the means of improving and keeping in health his own bodily organs, but also to lighten the burdens of that class of human beings on which the customs of society have imposed the onerous and unjust task of doing little else except toiling for the physical gratification of others.

The physical activity of man must be continual, for consumption and waste must be replaced by new productions. The elements of the material world, as fast as they are expended in the form of food, dress, and other useful and commodious articles, must be again and again worked over to satisfy our ever returning wants. There must be no cessation so long as the race exists and possesses its present bodily wants and appetites.

A Thought.

BY REV. D. J. MANDELL.

THERE are, usually, some thoughts conveyed, even in the articles of a periodical. Whether this contribution will comprehend any or not, I pretend not to judge; but, at all events, it possesses the excellence in one particular—the title is A THOUGHT!

And, methinks, too, that a thought may be a very good subject; I see not why it may not be a most interesting and important one. Thoughts are the jewels of the most gifted minds; and when they are bright,—bright glorious, or heavenly,—ah! what star can eclipse them then, or shine more loftily? Let a man be deaf that he cannot hear, senseless that he cannot taste or smell, blind that he cannot see, and dumb that he cannot utter, yet give him a thought—one holy thought, and with darkness on his lid and silence on his tongue, his heart may almost throb itself to sleep with happiness. I have often imagined that poor Laura Bridgman, shut out as she is from nature's light, and from the most common mediums of communication with tangible objects, is still, at times, most happy. Though she, at most, can only feel the sunshine, still the light of heaven is gleaming full oft, within her soul. It comes in a gush of thought; and when you see the smile irradiating her sightless features, know that it is the symbol of some delicious emotion within; some thought, exhaling joy, is busy with her prisoned spirit; perhaps a thought of home, or friends, ne'er seen, but loved—perhaps a thought which is the mere prompting of innocence; or, it may be she has a thought of that purer and redeeming world where the dimness of the eye departs and every sense, unfettered, luxuriates in light and bliss.

The mind has never fathomed its own recesses to unfold the deep mysteries of its idealism. A thought is a wonder; truly a most astonishing thing. How oft it comes with the momentum of the lightning flash, to chain the stoutest as with a spell, or to rouse even the trembling and the weary to superhuman strength. Now the strong man pauses in the midst of his career as if some bolt from heaven had transfixed him. A thought is plunging through his brain big with visions of terror—perhaps a thought of fortune wrecked, of hopes blasted, of unavoidable perils already nigh, or else of death, breathing annihilation and clad in the horrors of the grave. Then, again, will a thought display its might far differently. For instance,—behold that mother rushing from amidst the flames which have seized her habitation, even at the midnight hour. She escapes. But the children—the children!—where are they? One! two! three! O, God, her infant boy is perishing in the fire! That thought is distraction. Back—back the mother rushes through the flames which circle round her like demon tongues surcharged with horrid death—back, back she rushes to snatch her loved one from the burning, or to perish where it sleeps.

In fact, what power does a thought not possess. A thought that worlds were linked together by an invisible principle, or sympathy, led Newton to lift his eyes unto the heavens, and to take flight into the mysteries of creation. A thought, that millions might be relieved from suffering by his individual labors, sped Howard on his mission of benevolence throughout the earth. And when scintillating from the pages of an Ossian, or a Shakspeare, a thought has served to freeze the blood, to fill the eyes, or awake the liveliest raptures of the brightest, the mightiest and the best. And yet, with all this power, what is a thought? Is it even an atom? It may be; but, if so, no microscope has ever revealed its shape or texture; and likely, the only evidence that thought may have substance, is the fact that one thought will crowd another away to make itself room.

I have often said that a thought is sometimes accounted for on the principle of magnetism, animal magnetism, I mean. Who has not had occasion to use an oft repeated maxim. Who has not sometimes had his mind suddenly called away from some subject to which it was fixed, by a sudden thought of some friend not known to be near, when, lo! the said friend has as suddenly appeared; and, roused with astonishment and pleasure, we have involuntarily exclaimed, 'Well, they do say that SATAN is always nigh when you are thinking about him!' Now I believe that there is more contained in this saying than is generally imagined. Why is it that the thought of a friend is so often connected with his unexpected remembrance of us and approach to us. Does it not seem to indicate a sympathetic, or magnetic link between man and man—a link, by which soul answers to soul where souls are in harmony? It seems so; it does appear as if spirit responded to spirit, uninterrupted by personal absence or actual distance, where the feelings are in harmony. And who knows, when we remember friends who are absent, but that our remembrance is the immediate echo of their own; or when the memory of our departed friends rushes over the mind, (as it will, at times, most strangely)—when some inward voice seems to call our ideas to them, who knows but that they are, at the same time, thinking of us in some of the beauteous bowers of their spiritual paradise, or else communing secretly with our spirit, in the bland accents of an immortal tongue. Verily, it would be nothing disagreeable if there should prove to be truth in the legend of 'the angels whisper.'

But, let me cease to be thus visionary. A thought is oft-times, withal, very pleasant, and I am truly surprised that mankind generally do not take more pains to secure pleasant thoughts. Why, a pleasant thought is worth a world, and will bring purer happiness than the wealth of Cræsus, Rothschild, Girard, or Astor, united! But, vice in all its shapes, is a Gorgan to pleasant thoughts. A swindler may defraud his neighbor—the toper may sip his stimulant, and the monster of all iniquity may dash away his fellow's life; but in the practice of all such things the heart grows selfish, callous, cold, or brutal—the passions are nourished till they rage and riot on every trivial occasion—and where are pleasant thoughts then? Alas, they are banished to their grave!

And now let me talk a moment of virtue. Virtue is bliss. If you want to enjoy a pleasant thought at any time, or at all times, be virtuous; virtuous even at some sacrifice—the more sacrifice the better, perhaps. Virtue will produce the abovementioned happy result, even doubly—first for him who exercises virtue, and also to the one in whose behalf it is exercised. Look, for instance, at the case of her who nourished her poor, imprisoned father, by the milk from her own breast. This shows what woman can do in her love. Did not that daughter have a pleasant thought at the remembrance of having thus prolonged the life of her sire; and did not the sire also enjoy a pleasant thought in the remembrance of her ready affection and devoted attention? Yes, and virtue will thus always create a double happiness—ay, even more; for not only will the son be thus blest in his own excellency, and the father be also blest in the same manner by the goodness of the son, but the mother, the sister, the brother, and the whole circle of relatives and friends, will enjoy many a pleasant thought in beholding their kinsman walking uprightly and honorably. But my sheet is full; and though I might enlarge much more, I must bring my subject to its close; and though my article may not be very interesting, in view of its theme, I hope the reader may deem it worthy of 'a thought.'

'Commune with your own Heart.'

COME back my weary heart!
Thou hast gone forth e'en as a wild-winged bird,
Tempteth the troubled sea. He dares depart
To breathe his thrilling song unseen, unheard!

Thus has it been with thee!
With love thy pilot, hope to speed thy sail,
Scorning the fetters which thy strength should be,
Thou hast gone forth to soar, to trust, to fail!

Return, though crushed and worn,
With thy far wanderings from the paths of peace!
Gather again the scattered hopes of morn,
And bid thy wild and unchecked longings cease!

Fold thy o'erwearied wing,
Spread for too lofty and too bold a flight!
Return with shattered hopes whose shadows fling
Across thy path, the sombre hues of night!

'Tis well that earth hath not
A mountain eyrie for our eagle thought;
Else were its lowlier pleasures all forgot,
In dreams of rapture by the fancy wrought!

Forget the meteor bright,
That won thee from thy sweetly tranquil way!
And turn again with meek and calm delight,
To scenes still hallowed by affection's ray!

Plunge in oblivion's stream,
And leave the precious memories of the past!
Too dazzling were they in their changeable gleam,
Too strangely fair, too fondly prized to last!

Thou hast been sorely tried!
Thy glittering shield lies prostrate in the dust;
Thou com'st not back with victory's flush of pride,
But with thy ruined hopes—a mournful trust!

Henceforth, if thou must roam,
Travel the path that has no secret thorn!
Seek on the seraph shore a cloudless home,—
Haste to eternity's unveiling morn!

The Realist.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

'I LOVE you, Miss Kingsley—you always take me to some pretty, wild spot, where the bees come for the honey, and the flowers grow fresh by the brook-sides. What a shady place this is!'

Marian said right. It was a wild nook in the midst of a dense woodland of oak and chestnut. A stream, half buried beneath the witch-hazels and glossy alders that crowded its margins, murmured a liquid song at their feet; and many a solitary bee, and purple dragon-fly sipped the intoxicating sweets of the wood azalea that crept most luxuriantly over the aspens and birches that mingled with the statelier trees around them.

'I am glad, Miss Kingsley, that you taught me botany. I know, now, the names of all the flowers I see. There is a large cluster of anemones—let me go bring them to you—are they not beautiful? How I wish,' continued the talkative girl, 'that the laburnum grew wild here. Do you not remember that Miss Landon speaks of it in a great many of her poems—and likens her maidens' hair to its golden blossoms?'

'Yes, I remember. But have you been reading L. E. L.? A dangerous book for imaginative young girls like you. Pray, can you tell me, Marian, how many times she has made disappointed love the theme of her song?'

'No; but often, I believe.'

'No less than fifty of her poems are founded on this one unhappy passion—and woman is usually the victim.'

'Well, my dear Miss Kingsley, do you not know that she more than once apologizes for this, and gives her reasons for it? In her preface to the "Venetian Bracelet" she says; "Aware that to elevate I must first soften, and that if I wished to purify I must first touch, I have ever endeavored to bring forward grief, disappointment, the fallen leaf, the faded flower, the broken heart, and the early grave." She says also, "that she has always sought to paint love self-denying, devoted, and making an almost religion of its truth—and for a woman whose influence and whose sphere must be in the affections, what subject can be more fitting than one which it is her peculiar province to refine, spiritualize, and exalt?"

'You have read not only poems but prefaces carefully, I observe. This enthusiasm of yours gives me a clue to some mysterious little sentimentalisms of yours recently remarked.'

Marian laughed and blushed as she met the merry eye that rested affectionately upon her beautiful young face. 'Oh, Miss Kingsley!' she exclaimed, 'I know I have made myself ridiculous someway. If so, pray chide me for it—I will do so no more.'

'No, not ridiculous, Marian. But we who have outlived the baseless romance of early feeling, cannot but look with some degree of amusement—not ridicule—upon the enthusiasm with which the very young and very romantic pursue dreams so soon to fade out and perish from the atmosphere of real life. I believe, as much as Miss Landon, that woman's sphere is in the affections, and that it is by "refining, spiritualizing, and exalting" these, that she fulfills her noblest destiny. But I do not, cannot confine her to the love of the imagination alone. There are other affections more real, more abiding than this. That which goes under the name of friendship, cold as the word may seem to you, is undoubtedly the purest and calmest attachment of which human nature is capable. Out of this grow numberless sources of beauty and of interest, which throw as sweet a coloring over real life, as love, technically so called, does over the ideal. Miss Landon, in her portraiture of love and life, draws almost exclusively from fancy. Fortunately there is little in the actual to confirm the tragic coloring she throws into most of her pictures. There are very few instances of death by love in the world around us; yet this fact does not disprove the sincerity and strength of the affections. The truest love, indeed, is that which is unselfish—and though I can readily believe that the sufferings or the sin of a beloved object might drive one to despair and to death, I cannot well, nor indeed, at all, understand how the mere denial of one's own affections can cause a wreck of the heart, and of the life.'

'Ah, I understand very well how that is,' said Marian, 'very few are as self-devoted, and as unselfish as Miss Kingsley; very few can so readily hush the earnest prayers of the heart with the severer voice of duty; very few can so resolutely persist in right, even at the expense of feeling. But you take a new view of this matter of dying for love, when you call it selfish.'

'Well, is it not so? Consider for a few moments, my dear Marian. Take one of Miss Landon's heroines, if you choose—one of those rare creatures of beauty, wit, and song, who lived but to love, and to be betrayed. What were they? Had they not parents, sisters, friends? Were they not endowed with every gift necessary to confer happiness on others? Why then, suffer their hearts to consume with a hopeless attachment? Could not their thoughts be turned to objects of need, and to the performance of duty? Had they not the love of parents, of sisters, of brothers, of other friends, unallied by ties of blood? And could they not in these affections find all that the heart needs of sustenance? Oh, very weak and very foolish would you and I be, Marian, who have so many sources of interest, not only in the quiet love of home friends, but in the trees, and stars and flowers, and in every pure and beautiful creation of God—weak and foolish indeed should we be to die of a hopeless love, or to make an abiding grief of anything but sin. But worse than weak, we should be selfish, also in throwing the shadows of our own griefs over the pathways of those who love us. We were made to be victors, and not victims of the passions that assail us; and the heart should rise up bold and strong to subdue sorrow, rather than to become its prey.'

'Oh dear, Miss Kingsley, you are too transcendental—you give too great a divinity to human nature—do, pray, remember that we are not all as superior to weakness as yourself.'

'Nay, Marian—I am not transcendental—I am only rational;—and all the little strength of character I can claim proceeds from a principle early inculcated by my mother—that our own sorrows should never deprive us of usefulness, nor be permitted to cause the unhappiness of others; and that whatever Providence ordains us to suffer, should be endured with cheerful gratitude, and a resolute determination to work out from it spiritual strength, and a renovation of all holy purposes.'

'I think you have most admirably illustrated this principle in your own life, Miss Kingsley—for I can say with truth that I never knew you to make your own sufferings a cause of the slightest murmuring, nor to use the least effort to excite another's sympathy by allusions to your own unhappiness. And you not only conceal grief, but you conquer it. This seems to me to be the most difficult part of the matter. I fear it is a lesson I can never learn.'

'We can all learn to be unselfish, Marian, and in learning this, we are admitting ourselves into the great secret of being happy. Be always, my dear young friend, thoughtful of the wants of those around you, and consult with your conscience how you can most properly relieve and satisfy them. In these reflections, and in the consequent action, you will be insensibly laying up an inexhaustible resource for all hours of trial, and for every variety of suffering. Self-sacrifice seems difficult, but it always brings a commensurate reward. I am giving these counsels, Marian, not as one who has abided by them, but as one who has often learned, from experience, the unhappiness which results from a disobedience to them. And I now conclude my long homily in the honest words of Burns:

'Oh may you better reckon the rede,
Than e'er did the adviser!'

The Mountain Girl.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

I KNOW a dim and still retreat,
Where woodland blue-birds daily meet;
And where the lark, for noonday rest,
Comes filled with music from her nest.
In a wide mountain gorge it lies,
Away from human hearts and eyes;
There echo brings her wild, deep song,
And sings it sweetly all day long,
Repeating, of the cuckoo's lay,
Some snatches in her own wild way,
And stealing, from the dancing rill,
A music more bewildering still,
Or breathing, to the wind's low sigh,
A dreamy, spirit-like reply.

The solemn trees grow wildly there,
And toss their branches in the air;
Adown the ledge of gray old stone,
With velvet moss and flowers o'ergrown,
The water trickles with a dim,
Faint music like a fairy's hymn.
The tall, red columbines o'erlook
The sunny dimples of the brook,
And welcome from the hollow tree

The entrance of the vagrant bee.
The fervent sunbeams faintly dare
To smile upon the moss-cups there;
And scarce the blue bells, by the stream,
Will meet the moon's delirious beam;
So soft, so holy, so serene,
Is all that shadowy, wild ravine.

There stealeth, at the early morn,
The rabbit and the timid fawn;
There skips the little squirrel by,
With tail erect, and glistening eye;
There glanceth, too,—the rill toward,—
A human foot across the sward;
A little foot that ever spares
The flower that springeth unawares;
That danceth gaily with the brook,
Or resteth in the violet nook;
That chaseth, through the mountain rye,
The beetle and the butterfly,
Then, finding nothing else to do,
Tosses aside its old torn shoe,
And, through the passage of a dream,
Plays with the pebbles in the stream.

A dainty creature, fair and wild,
Is that sweet vision of a child!
With sunbeams in her eyes and heart,
And beauty yet unwed to art;
With music in her gushing voice,
And love and truth in every choice,
She seems like some gay humming-bird,
With the new gift of music stirred,
Repaying to the flowers in song
The sweets they dropped upon its tongue.

Years pass, and yet the quiet scene
Is just as shadowy and serene;
No change has marred the violet nook,
Nor turned aside the murmuring brook;
The birds have not forgot their haunts,
Nor the wild bee its simple wants;
There come they still to pass away
The long, sweet, golden summer day;
And there, all beautiful as light,
Droop the soft shadows of the night.
Where is the child, the pretty child,
So gay of heart, so sweetly wild?
Where treadeth now that little foot?
Where flits it in its light pursuit?
Where dwell the merry laugh and shout
That once were ringing all about?
Let us go trace the mountain rill
Down through the crevice of the hill.
Here winds it gently now aside
With something of a timid pride,
Seeking within the dim retreat
A refuge from the summer heat:
Like some small silver chain it twines
Among the trees and drooping vines,
And kisses, in its cool, soft flow,
The flowers that on its borders grow.

She wanders there, the mountain girl,
With sunny cheek and floating curl;
Taller and quieter than when
We saw her flitting through the glen;
And wearing in her soft, dark eyes,
A wealth of human mysteries.
Some feelings have been born within,
Earthly, yet unallied to sin;
The ~~of~~ human love hath spoken,
And ~~of~~ mood's spell at last is broken.
Her heart is satisfied no more
With what it dearly loved before;
Nor bird, nor bee, nor woodland stream,
To her wrapt spirit longer seem,
In such a world of love as this,
Sufficient ministers of bliss.

Oh Time, no deed of thine so strange
As Love's mysterious, sudden change,
When, stealing from all else apart,
It clusters round one human heart !
Here dwells its music, and its light,
Nor grows the outward world less bright,
That it hath centred in one shrine,
All it hath recognized divine.
That child to womanhood hath grown—
Life's picture wears a deeper tone—
The golden hues that joy inwove,
Assume the varying shades of LOVE.

Years pass again. The mountain stream
Still sings its wild, unconscious dream ;
No change hath visited the spot
Where stood of old the rustic cot.
But o'er its roof the ivy creeps,
And on its walls the lizard sleeps ;
The spider o'er the latch hath spun
A web to whiten in the sun ;
The roses bloom, and fade away,
With none to weep for their decay.
The very birds perceive the change,
And find the solitude too strange.
No longer mid the sweet-briar leaves
The swallow builds beneath the eaves,
But, hurrying from the mountain glen,
Finds peace among the haunts of men.

The mountain girl—a girl no more,
Sits down beside that cottage door ;
How changed ! the very house has less
Of silent, saddening mournfulness,
In her deep, melancholy eye,
Life's brilliant hues no longer lie ;
And love itself, its sweetest light,
Has left behind a starless night.
A night ? Ah no ! 'Tis early dawn—
The long, dark, hopeless hours are gone ;
And Faith, the day-spring from on high,
Is beaming through her heavenward eye.
Aged and widowed, poor and lone,
She sits upon the threshold stone,
Where years before, in childish play,
She laughed the long, bright hours away.

What changes mark the course of grief !—
That bud is now a yellow leaf,
Shivering a moment in the blast,
To fall and waste away at last.
Yet some few hours of sunshine warm
The faded wreck of many a storm ;
Some few and transient smiles of hope
Enrich life's sere and downward slope.
She is once more at home, where roved
Her girlish steps when first she loved ;
And here, at last, her way-worn feet
May linger in their old retreat.
And in the shadow of the vine,
She planted for a Sabbath shrine,
She shall lie down to that sweet sleep
So welcome to the eyes that weep ;
While the low wind and murmuring wave
Sing constant requiems round her grave.

Impartiality of God.

ROM. ii. 11 : 'There is no respect of persons with God.'
RIGHT ideas concerning the Supreme lie at the foundation of all true religion. If we err respecting the character of the Almighty, that error will run through all our conceptions of his moral government, and will lead us astray in our views of the final issue of things. With a correct knowledge of the divine character, there is no danger of misinterpreting the broad declaration of the apostle's words as above ; but unless we do possess this true knowledge, we are liable to entertain gross ideas concerning the meaning of the assertion—There is no respect of persons with God.

And though christianity is in itself of the highest excellence, and adapted to the noblest principles of the human mind, yet it may easily be perverted, and made an object of reproach, by the use of ill founded, and ill managed arguments, professedly for its support. Hence in consequence of erroneous conceptions of the Apostle's meaning in this instance, many objections have arisen in the doubting mind against an over-ruling Providence, and against the truth of revelation. 'If,' say they, 'God is no respecter of persons, but regards all alike—looks with the same complacency upon the abandoned to vice, as he does on the sternly virtuous, then certainly he cannot be a holy God that hateth iniquity, and suffering virtue has not in him a favoring friend.'

But such is not the Apostle's doctrine ; neither does Universalism make such absurd declarations, though many are fond of declaring that the system of universal salvation upholds the idea that the sinner and the saint are the same in the sight of God. This slander has been assisted not a little in its march by the want of distinctness in the advocates of the truth, inasmuch as they fondly dwell on the impartiality of the Supreme, declare his love to be equally extended to all his creatures, and his tender mercies over all his works ; but are not careful enough to place before the mind of the hearer the great, the scriptural distinction, between the righteous and the wicked ; that God regards the actions of righteousness with pleasure and approbation, while the deeds of wickedness are abhorrent to him.

In the further progress of this article, we hope to lay the subject embraced in the passage quoted, open clearly before the candid mind. The passage asserts the impartiality of God, that he is the same in the character of his dealings towards all, and it becomes us to inquire in what this sameness and impartiality consist, and what are the distinctions we are to observe.

Here it may be well to premise that much of the divine character is hid from us while we remain in the narrow confines of this lower world; we cannot here see him fully as he is; and with Job we may well ask: 'Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty to perfection?' The wisest must answer, No; and in all our investigations into the subject of the moral government of God, we should remember this limitation of man's powers; and that what to us is apparently partial, severe, and unequal in the dealings of the Lord over all, may be, and we have sufficient reason to believe is, just and impartial.

In searching out the true nature of the divine operations, we must, in a great degree, walk by faith, for we cannot by sight; we must fix in our hearts the great, sublime, and glorious truth that God is love, and conclude, that whatever the divine agency brings to pass, must be the action of goodness to promote a good end or design; if that benevolent design is not apparent to us, it is because we cannot trace out all the footsteps of the wonder working Deity—we cannot discover all the bearings of his providences, nor discern how all things work together for good. Yet with christian confidence we can feel the truth of the poet's words:

'Through nature's ever-varying scene,
By different ways pursued,
The one eternal end of Heaven
Is universal good.'

With this assurance before us, our subject is laid more open, and we pursue our purpose by advancing the following propositions:

1. There is no respect of persons with God as a Father and Benefactor;
2. There is no respect of persons with God as a Judge, Rewarder, and Punisher of man; and
3. There is no respect of persons with God as an eternal Savior from sin and death.

We think that this division of our subject presents in a clear light the peculiar features of the Divine character; and by observing the distinctions here laid out, we are guarded from all erroneous conceptions of the ways of the Deity, and learn how the characters of Father, Judge, and Savior, may be blended in one Being, whose ways are all consistent.

There is no more common, and at the same time unjust, accusation made against the advocates of impartial grace, than that they ever dwell on God as a good Being and a Father; and neglect to speak of his retributive judgments, and his holy character as a judge, who decreeth tribulation and anguish upon every soul that doeth evil. This is all wrong. The accusation results from a narrow, or ignorant view of the subject, inasmuch as when we speak of the paternity of God, we speak of all the attributes that constitute him a Benefactor, Judge, and Savior. As a Father he loves the great and wide spread family of man; as a Judge he rewards and punishes and pardons; and as an eternal Savior he promotes the beneficent purposes of parental love—causes the sanctifying operations of grace to extend far beyond the influences of sin, and by the omnipotence of his universal sway will bring to pass the restitution of all things.

To call God, our Father, is not merely to add a title to his name—there is a mighty depth of holy meaning in the ascription, and while it awakens our love, it excites our veneration, and filial fear of offending his parental requirements. Regard him as a Father, as he is, of the human race, and carry out the proposition to its legitimate conclusions, and you must arrive at the Universal sentiment—there is no fair and honorable means of escaping it,—God loves every child of his creation, all are his offspring, and he is the benefactor of the whole, as in him we live, and move, and have our being; and every good and perfect gift is of his bounty, and he knows no variableness, nor even a shadow of turning.

This will not be denied by any; all acknowledge his universal care, and loving kindness; and as he changes not, there can never come the time when he will have respect of persons as a Benefactor. The love of the eternal Spirit is unalterable and ever-enduring; whatever the wild passions of men may lead them to commit, however they may stray from the paths of his truth, and sink into the depths of iniquity, there is still compassion for them in the bosom of the parental God, who retaineth not anger forever, because he delighteth in mercy. Men may forget that they are the children of the Most High, but he will never forget that he is their Father. As a parent he will seek them out, and call them back to the peace and virtue of home, to the bosom of unalterable tenderness, and the provisions of grace, bountiful and pure.

Why is it that men will imagine that although the Deity is no respecter of persons as a parent, but loves and cares for all, yet he is a respecter of persons as a Savior? Is this consistent? And does it not make us to conclude, that the God who is the Savior, is not the God who is the Father? For if it be the same being that thus operates, impartial, and partial, surely the idea of divine perfection in their God, must be abandoned. Inconsistencies are not compatible with perfection; and if God be perfect and unchangeable in his nature, he must keep eternally in view the benevolent purposes of undying parental love; as at first his love knew no respect of persons—as at first his tender mercies were over all his works, so while the ages of eternity shall roll on in unimpeded swiftness, the everlasting Father will embrace in the illimitable arms of his compassion and love all the children of humanity. There can rise no barrier to divide him from the creatures of his power—the strength of his unconquerable love will sweep away the mountains of corruption, and creation shall wear at last the smile that ever rests on the face of nature's God. 'Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool.'

And it is the deep and strong persuasion of this ever living love operating on the mind and affections of the sinner, that leads him to fly to the fountain opened for all uncleanness, and there wash his sins away. The thunders of wrath only serve to drive him away from his God, and alienate his affections the more from the first author of love. The poet Newton has most beautifully described the true feelings of the convert, weaned from his sins by the soft and winning charms of the tenderness of divine and eternal love.

'Lord, thou hast won—at length I yield,
My heart, by mighty grace compelled,
Surrenders all to Thee;
Against thy terrors long I strove,
But who can stand against thy love?
Love conquers even me.
If thou hast bid thy thunders roll,
And lightnings flash to blast my soul,
I still had stubborn been;
But mercy has my heart subdued,
A bleeding Savior I have viewed,
And now, I hate my sin.'

As God is no respecter of persons as a Father and Benefactor, so, 2. He is no respecter of persons as a Judge, and Rewarder and Punisher of man. Under this head we shall discover what the difference is which exists between the saint and the sinner—the righteous and the wicked; we shall see that the sternly virtuous, and the abandoned vicious, are not viewed with the same complacency, or approbation, in the sight of our God; and we shall find that the hallowed doctrine of impartial grace holds out many and enough incentives to mankind to lead a holy life on earth.

What then do we mean by declaring that God is no respecter of persons as Judge, and Rewarder, and Punisher of man? We mean by it what the Apostle meant in the words of scripture as in the context applied, that God judgeth in the earth, and visits upon men the rewards and retributions which are dictated by omniscient wisdom, and immutable justice.

The Apostle in the passage undoubtedly referred to the judicial character of the Deity; and the phrase used by him can be found several times in the sacred writings connected with judgments of men and actions. Lev. xix. 15, we read: 'Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment; thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honor the person of the mighty; but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbor.' And again, Moses said to the Judges: 'Ye shall not respect persons in judgment; but ye shall hear the small as well as the great; ye shall not be afraid of the face of man; for the judgment is God's.' Solomon among his proverbs of wisdom gives one to the same import as the command of Moses, thus: 'It is not good to have respect of persons in judgment.' All these instructions tend to make judgments of actions candid and impartial; and men are exhorted to judge honestly the poor as well as the mighty—the small as well as the great, because the Judge of the whole earth, who doeth right, acteth on this principle.

Hence we learn the great and important truth of revelation, that the rewards of the divine Benefactor are equitably dispensed to those who merit them, without respect to names and outer distinctions, but according to real goodness of heart and purpose. God can make virtue clothed in rags more happy in the secret chambers of the heart, than vice robed in brocade, glittering in gems, and surrounded by the vassalage of gorgeous wealth. There is much enjoyed by the heart of godliness—by the lover of the divine law, which the world cannot see; there are many streams of holy pleasure that flow into the hidden channels of the soul from the pure fount of devotional thought, that make glad the inner man with gladness of which the children of folly know not. The greater portion of the retributions and rewards of the divine and universal Judge, are hidden from the scrutiny of man; appearances are often deceitful:—

'For there are pangs the sorrowing heart
Will oft in darkness shroud,

That lurk within its lonely depths
Like lightning in the cloud;—
Though brightly o'er the hollow cheek,
The smile, the laugh may break,
Like bubbles bursting on the breast
Of Acheron's dark lake;
They are but outward signs to hide
The deadly pangs they feel,
As o'er the lone and mouldering tower
The rose is taught to steal.'

We believe, though we cannot trace out all the ways of the Deity, that all his dealings with men on earth are in accordance with the truth he has taught us by his servants; mercy is ever blended with justice, so that he may be said never to wound only when he would heal; and let it be a truth ever before the eye of our understanding, that as a Judge who knows no respect of persons, God never forgets that he is a Father that knows no respect of persons, but loves, with a parent's unalterable affection, the whole family of his power.

Well has it been said—'Does any one question a parent's love for his offspring, because he inflicts pain to prevent the repetition of some fault? At the very moment when the sense of duty compels him to punish the offence, the yearning of affection is most powerful within him, pleading with him to spare; and, could this avail, gladly would he take on himself the pain which he inflicts. Why then doubt that it is perfectly consistent with the benevolence of God to scourge and chasten his offending children, that he may make them partakers of his holiness, and that affliction may yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness to them who are exercised therein. God smites in mercy, not in malignity.'

Too often is the picture of a great day of final judgment, in the future world, drawn up before the minds of men by professed teachers of the gospel; in what terrors, in what robes of vengeance, is the Supreme then arrayed—seated upon the throne of judgment he is to pronounce the final and unalterable fate of every creature in the assembled universe. A portion he will cause to enter the pure and blissful home of angels, and the rest must greet, and eternally remain in the abodes of dark, hopeless despair. And this same Judge is the being whom our Savior commanded us to call upon as our Father in Heaven. Will he, can he, forget the character of Parent? When all his offspring are gathered together—all assembled as one family, and all looking up to him as their Father and only Friend—when he has but to speak the word, and they will be all under the influences of perfect love, blessing and blest, enjoyed and enjoying, will he then sink the Father in the Judge, and exert his power to draw a line of division—put songs of holy praise into the mouths of some, while from the lips of others curses roll fast and awful, mingling with the cries of agonized hearts, and tortured souls?

It is impious, to our mind, to indulge for a moment the thought that He who will not keep anger forever will cease to feel all the warm gushings of parental love, and throwing from him all the sweet influences of tenderness and compassion, will act as an inflexible Judge, and exert arbitrary power to produce immortal pain. No. The Judge of all the earth will do right; he is no respecter of persons, and as he loves all as a Parent, he as a Judge, judgeth all in love; which brings us to our last proposition, that God is no respecter of persons as an eternal Savior from sin and death.

This evidently results from the premises laid down, under which we have considered him as a Father, Benefactor, and as a righteous and merciful Judge; if these characters belong to him, then assuredly he is entitled to the other—that of universal and eternal Savior. In truth he cannot demonstrate fully his title to the characters of Father and Judge, unless he adds to them the character of Savior; as extensively as he saves, so extensively will he give the fullness of proof that he is a Benefactor and Friend of man. And what can prevent the Parent that has the will, and power to save, from saving the children over whom that power extends?

From our subject we should learn to keep in mind the relations which mankind bear toward God, and never regard each in an arbitrary, separate capacity. The chastenings of the divine government proceed from the same Being that poureth out upon us the bounties of life—that diffuseth around our path so many favors that speak of a God, that assure us that he is good, and conspire to raise our most grateful affections to the Beneficent.

Let us also learn that he hath no respect of persons in judgment, but visiteth every deed of men with an appropriate return, whether they be high or low, small or great, ignorant or learned, rich or poor. The obedient will find that in keeping the commandments there is great reward, and he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done, for there is no respect of persons.

And to 'calm each wild wish and idle fear,'

let us remember the salvation revealed by Jesus the beloved, and look beyond the bounds of this world of care to the pure clime of immortal bliss; where the King of kings shall be adored by a redeemed and glorified universe, as the Being that hath loved the world with a parent's fondness, judged his offspring in righteousness, and saved mankind by the sanctifying operations of infinite mercy and boundless compassion.

O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and show forth his praise in their daily walks! O that his love might breathe in us the spirit of a more fervid and constant devotion, that we might each cry with David—'O God, my heart is fixed; I will sing and give praise, even with my glory. I will praise thee, O Lord, among the people; for thy mercy is great above the heavens, and thy truth reacheth unto the clouds. Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens; and thy glory above all the earth; that thy beloved may be delivered; save with thy right hand, and answer me.'

The Baptism of Pocahontas.

THERE'S silence in that gathered group,
For stern Powhattan's pride,
With queenly step, and thoughtful brow
Draws near the altar's side!

The costume of the Indian girl,
Is laid aside for aye;
And well the christian garb beseems,
Her matchless symmetry.

A cloak of spotless ermine floats
About her graceful form,
No beads, nor gaudy trinkets now
The Indian maid adorn.

Before the holy altar now
She kneels—a lovely girl,
Not with a cheek, or brow of snow,
Or darkly floating curl;

But lovely with the soul's pure light,
Which beams in every line
Of that expressive countenance,
The light of love divine.

O when has whiter spirit knelt
Before the shrine of heaven,
Or purer love, or brighter faith,
Or holier hath been given.

The Southern Flower.

MARIA MILLEDOLER was the fair scion of a wealthy planter of South Carolina. Brought up in the most indulgent manner, she evinced none of those pettish weaknesses which some moralists suppose inseparable from a tender education. Extremely delicate in her personal appearance, and amiable beyond comparison, she seemed more like some pure being from the skies, lent for a while to mortals, than a creature of error and human imperfection. She was her parent's pride and solace, and none could look upon her dark blue eyes, lit up with intelligence and affection, without thinking well of human nature. All the accomplishments which are considered necessary to people of fashion, she acquired with a facility that more nearly resembled intuition than the effect of gradual and tedious training. Having lost her mother early in life, her education was principally superintended by her father, so that she became acquainted with much solid information of which young ladies are generally deprived. Amid the sunny fields of the South she grew up a delicate flower, shedding the fragrance of her virtues upon all who knew her; yet so keenly sensitive to every thing calculated to affect the chords of the human heart, that many pronounced her too frail and too gentle for the rude blasts of this stirring world. With a heart susceptible of lively impressions, and a warm admiration for every thing that is noble and attractive, it is not surprising that she found one of the opposite sex upon whom she looked with more than ordinary complacency. Robert Maxwell, a young law student from New England, visited South Carolina at the time when Maria had reached her eighteenth year. He differed somewhat from our heroine, being of a more hardy nature, possessed of a vigorous constitution, and not remarkable for those winning qualities which distinguished the amiable southerner. In lieu of them, however, he possessed a strong mind, penetrating and logical, a genius of a lofty order, and an address both dignified and commanding. He was one of those persons who improve upon acquaintance, and as accident threw him several times into company with Maria, she at length became sensible of his merits.

When Maxwell made mention to Mr. Milledoler of the relation in which Maria and he stood to each other, he appeared to be affected by sensations altogether new. The thought that his cherished daughter must sometime leave the paternal roof in obedience to the call of even a tenderer affection than that which she awarded to her parent, seemed to occur to him for the first time. Mr. M. was, therefore, silent for some moments, after the young man had addressed him; when he mustered resolution to say: 'I see how it is, sir, and I know what course matters must naturally take. We, old people, are prone to forget that we were once young, and that our offspring have other joys, sorrows, and anticipations than those which cluster around the old hearth stone, and which centre in home. The old withered trunk cares for nothing but to abide on the spot where it first grew, and there to fall and perish when its days are numbered; but the young green shoots that spring up around it, seek to tower aloft; and spread out on every side, rejoicing in the life so lately given them. The young have many things to wish for—the wishes of the aged centre in few things; and yet they are the more tenacious of those few—one of those few things was my daughter.'

Here Maxwell was about to make some proposition, but Mr. M. waved his hand—'I know what you would say; but I cannot leave my plantation. Poor and unproductive as my property now is, it still requires my attention. My affairs are embarrassed, and the abundance which I once possessed is eluding my grasp. It is well, therefore, that Maria should pass into the hands of a more able and youthful protector. She has, indeed, been brought up tenderly, and the change which is passing over my fortunes might have an effect upon her mind of an injurious character.'

Thus ended the conference, and the young man could not avoid reflecting upon the extreme tenderness manifested by Mr. M. toward his daughter. Whatever changes might take place in the fortunes of the father, it was a matter of question with Maxwell how the ease or comfort of Maria could possibly be affected by them. Yet the remark of Mr. M. served to show that Maria's gentle nature required all the tenderness which a husband could exert toward her.

In the course of a few weeks, the two lovers were united, and Maxwell embarked with his lovely partner for the North. The change of scenery appeared to have a happy effect upon Maria, who, indeed, was always sufficiently alive to all that is grand or beautiful in nature. Maxwell saw nothing either in the spirits or the health of his fair bride to warrant the extreme anxiety of her father. She bore the journey well, and complained but little of fatigue when she reached her Northern home.

It was in a small town in Massachusetts that Maxwell had commenced business, and he conveyed Maria to a large elegant building near the centre of the town, the upper part of which he had hired for their accommodation. The furniture of the rooms was scanty, and as the cold weather had begun to set in, Maria soon discovered an absence of comfort, of which her Northern husband was not aware, and of which Maria could never bring herself to speak. She knew that her husband had just commenced a professional business, and that both time and labor were required to introduce him fairly into practice; and she, though gentle as the fawn, possessed a martyr spirit to endure all that her husband's slender fortunes might render necessary. When her limbs were shivering with the cold in the large but half-furnished rooms that her husband's love of show had induced him to hire, she exerted every nerve to hide her discomfort from her husband, lest his knowledge of the fact should only add to his embarrassments. But if Maria was so careful to hide her own griefs, Maxwell could not always control his impetuous spirit when the sense of poverty was brought home to him by some adverse circumstance, which wounded his pride or curtailed his enjoyments. At such times he could not but contrast—when he came home to his meals—the housewifery of poor Maria with the dexterous management of the neighboring young ladies, who had not been waited on by slaves from their cradles, but who had been regularly instructed in every branch of household economy. Too poor to keep even a single servant, Maxwell grew more and more sensible that Maria should have married a man in affluent circumstances. She, on the other hand knew little of Northern manners, and had little dreamed that she would be called upon as soon as she reached her new home to perform the duties required of slaves in her father's house. As the weather became more severe, and the first snow of winter whitened the earth, the delicate frame of Maria shrank from an encounter with the elements. About this time, too, Maxwell's complaints of poverty, and the difficulty of keeping up a genteel appearance, became frequent; and the discovery of Maria's total inability to assist him in the acquisition of property, weighed more and more heavily upon his mind. One day, after he had given vent to his feelings in a more turbulent manner than usual, Maria said to him: 'This need not be, my dear, for a word from me to my father would bring us immediate assistance, and I am sure that nothing would better please him.'

Maxwell started suddenly from the sofa on which he had been reclining, and exclaimed, 'Never, madam! Your father himself complains of poverty; and were he richer than an eastern prince, I would not be a suppliant for pecuniary aid! No, madam, seek not to degrade me any farther, I beseech you! Did you southern ladies think less of dependance upon others, and learn more to depend upon your own exertions, you would not be under the necessity of advising your husbands to seek the boon of charity.'

The reader must not suppose that the gentle spirit of Maria was crushed by this passionate speech. Although her spirit was gentle, yet she possessed good sense. It was the gradually increasing coldness of her husband that had begun to undermine the health and waste the spirits of the fair southerner, and not the momentary gusts of passion which passed over her yielding spirit like the storm over the osier bowing it for the moment, yet suffering it to rise unbroken. Maria's arduous attempts to fulfill the duties of a housewife, the severity of the climate, and the complaints of her husband, had made great inroads upon her health before the middle of winter. Yet her nature was meek and uncomplaining. Hers were not the airs of a spoiled child; but her course of conduct more nearly resembled that of a youthful invalid who quietly closes its eyes, and swallows the bitter draught prescribed by the physician, without knowing why the distasteful dose is administered, but in meek and docile obedience to those who are more experienced.

Such was the lamb-like fortitude of this poor young woman, who had been nurtured with the utmost tenderness amid the genial gales of the South, and now trembled almost alone and friendless amid the bleak winds of the North. As soon as Maria's health forbade her attention to domestic duties, Maxwell brought his mother to the house, to preside over its concerns. She was a stout, healthy, country woman of coarse habits and narrow views. She had been brought up with all those rigid, sour, and uncompromising notions which prevailed in New England in the witch ages; and she soon discovered that Maria had been ruined by education. She refused to permit her to read any of her favorite authors. She put her harp in the garret among the lumber, and set about dieting the fair sufferer, that is, starving her to death. The lady who owned the house, and who lived below stairs, sometimes sent up some nice dish to the invalid. This Maria was not permitted to eat, on the plea that she had been spoiled by indulgence already. 'Not know how to work!' exclaimed this Amazon—'what is the woman good for, and what was my son thinking of when he debased himself so much as to marry her!' It needed not this course of treatment to send Maria to the last resting place of the lovely and the unlovely, the noble and the vile. The seeds of consumption were already sown in her constitution; and she had no remonstrances to offer to the harsh treatment of the mother-in-law. The sufferer only opened her languid blue eyes, and fixed them for a moment with a sort of wonder upon the termagant, and then turned away to forget in gentle slumbers that she was many miles from her sunny home, and that those who would have died to shield her from the least breath of adversity, were wholly ignorant of her condition. Some little feeling seemed to be awakened in the breast of old Mrs. Maxwell, when the emaciated Maria, on one bright morning in February held out her hand to her husband, and said, 'Robert, life is fleeting—I feel that around my heart which tells me that the wheel at the cistern can revolve but a few times more. Perhaps I have not been to you all I should have been; yet we have enjoyed happy hours together, and may we meet again where there are no wants to corrode the heart—no chilling winds'—She ceased, when Maxwell pressed her hand, it was stiffening in death. The husband looked gloomily upon the faded lily—the mother-in-law gazed coldly on the face of the dead, when footsteps were heard coming up the stairs—the door opened hastily, and Mr. Milledoler, dusty with travelling, rushed into the room. 'Where! Oh! where is my daughter?' exclaimed he, panting for breath. He approached the couch where

'Lovely in death the beauteous ruin lay,' and seeing what death had done, smote his hands violently together, and clasped them on his breast; when he stood gazing for some moments upon the cold remains of his last earthly tie. He left the room a short time, and then returned with several men and a litter. He approached the body. Maxwell stepped forward—'I have heard all!' cried he, sternly motioning him back with his hand. The deceased was placed on the litter, and silently borne away followed by the bereaved father. To the land of her sires was she borne, and there rests with the southern flower beneath one of the wide-spread trees of her native groves. The birds of Carolina trill their notes over her green grave, and the fairest flowers of a southern spring grow on every side, and spangle the couch where reposes the dutiful daughter, the uncomplaining wife, and martyr to affection.

The Boquet.

'THERE are withered flowers lying on my heart; you remember those flowers.'

I HAVE them yet,—those few and withered flowers;
And they are precious in their faded bloom,
As lone mementos of far happier hours,—
Bright stars imbedded in a night of gloom.

Voiceless instructors, may your silent teaching
Blend with the depths, from human eye concealed!
The inner temple of the spirit reaching,
That may, to your pure presence, stand revealed!

Strange that around your faded forms are clinging,
So many thoughts of mingled bliss and woes!
Strange that the past with varied hues is flinging
So many shadows deepening as they close!

I turn to you, sweet flowers, when night is folding
Her sable mantle o'er my fitful rest,
And the high stars their silent watch are holding Above the slumberers in earth's dewy breast!

When, one by one, your fragile leaves are dying,
And memory weeps above their scattered dust,
May angel whispers to my heart replying,
Restore its vanished hopes—its heaven-born trust.

A Trip to Marblehead;

Or a Stray Leaf from my Journal.

WE left Boston at half past two and reached the cars in due season, under escort of ———, and in company with his sister. I was agreeably surprised to meet ——— and ———, who were to take passage with us for our destination; and after an expeditious passage arrived safely, and received a cordial welcome from the amiable Mrs. ———. Tuesday morning: The gentlemen proposed rowing us over to the neck, and we, friend A. and myself, gladly acceded to the proposal. Bonnets, shawls and parasols were put in requisition, and we hastened to the water side and borrowed a boat. Of this latter commodity there is such a supply, that I am sure there must be one to each family,—I had almost said to each man, woman and child in the town. This gliding over the bosom of the ocean, with the delicate blue arch above, and the waters around, almost as calm and quite as beautiful, is one episode in the poetry of life. We landed on a small beach, and then pursued our way to the opposite side of the promontory, where the shore is diversified by precipitous cliffs. There, the water is never quiet. It is lashed into foam by the rocks under its surface, and when it meets those which line the shore it sends its spray far up, as if baptizing them in the face of heaven and with its silent approval. Here too is music. Not such as the green places of the earth afford—not the soul stirring melody of the human voice, but the chorus that was commenced at creation, and has never faltered—the low, changeful music of the heaving, never-resting deep! Oh! it wakens my spirit to a newer, and I trust a better life. The disappointments and cares which an hour before weighed heavily upon my spirit, were thrown off as if by commune with the Deity, and I sat on a projection of a rock, looking out over a vast extent of water and listening to its melody, without a sense of the past, or a hope, unless a very brilliant one, of the future. It were sacrilege to bring our petty sorrows to this high altar of nature. The beautiful line of the poetess who left no equal, came readily to mind,

'Thou in the shadow of the Rock shall dwell,
The Rock of Strength.'

And truly we were in the shadow of a rock. The scenery about this neck strongly resembles that of Nahant, but here fashion has not set its all-prevailing seal. Could a portion of these rocks be transported to Plum Island and cast there with the negligence of nature, it would add much to the wild appearance of that bed of sand. On leaving 'home' we received orders to be back by twelve, so, tearing ourselves from this favorite spot, we took to the boat again, not, however, without agreeing to go over again in the evening to ascertain if darkness would lend enchantment to the scene. Accordingly just after sunset we repaired again to the water's edge, but the boat was 'high and dry' as the tide was at its lowest ebb, so there remained no alternative but retreat. Unwilling to be daunted, friend H. proposed going to a friend's house and borrowing a boat that was afloat. As he approached the house he said—'Ladies will you walk in?' Excuse me if I answer for all, 'we had rather not.' 'Then,' said he, 'make me minister plenipotentiary,' so he walked on without us. Not finding all as we wished, though a boat was at our service, and the night growing dark, we altered our intentions and agreed to walk around town. I accepted H's. arm, and the other ladies being well provided for, we moved onward. At the approach of evening a great number of the inhabitants forsake their houses and take to the sidewalks, where smoking and talking seem to afford an abundance of enjoyment. The remark on smoking does not apply to the ladies of M., nor should they take to themselves the credit of doing all the talking. My companion's long, flowing dressing gown, somewhat in the Oriental style, created considerable mirth as we passed along. He remarked that 'one would think it is a time of great excitement and these little groups are embryo mobs.' He said 'the custom house is the only aristocratic looking building in the place.' Why should there be one such building, when the town claims to be purely democratic? We saw a few fine houses, but the proportion is small compared to the number of princely habitations in Newburyport. We walked round the common which is fenced, (the only mark of care about it,) and has two large gates opposite each other; one of them has an unconquered, and, therefore I supposed unconquerable, inclination to leaning—H. said, 'in imitation of the leaning tower.' The evening was very lovely. The stars looked out with their mild, subduing beauty, as if watching our progress, perchance pitying us for our rough passage through the most crooked of all crooked places. When a Bostonian complains that streets are not straight, people may well wonder. The Methodist church has a retired and beautiful situation. The tall trees bend over it as if anxious to preserve its sanctity from the glare of day. The waving of their branches and the rustling of their leaves must form an accompaniment without a discord to the soul-music of the humble and repentant believer.

Wednesday: Our party received an agreeable addition in the person of Rev. ———. We endeavored to be in season to catch the tide this morning, but were again disappointed, and went to the ruins of the fort which commands an extensive view of the harbor and town of M——. This old fort, by the way, is full of interest. Its walls are in a good state of preservation, many of the cannon are still there, the barracks of the soldiers and the better houses of the officers, are yet standing; but where are the gallant forms, fired with a Spartan zeal to do or die? I bless God that they quailed not in the hour of peril, else were our goodly heritage trodden by the emissaries of a foreign despot, and liberty herself compelled to flee to the caverns of our western mountains, or repose upon the border of the vast Pacific. A cloud of vapor obscured the brilliance of the newly-risen sun, yet the scene was delightful. Here and there, all over the vast expanse, were scattered the boats of the fishermen—dark motes on a wide field of blue; yet were they interesting to us because in each was a man, possessing that spark which was kindled at the throne of the Eternal, never to go out in darkness. A small fishing vessel, all sails set, was working its way against an adverse wind. There is nothing like knowing how to manage in this world of adversities. Beautiful land birds were darting like winged thoughts over the water, and occasionally gliding downwards so as almost to rest on its waveless bosom. I half imagined that the little vain things were lured thither by the reflection of their own delicate forms. We returned home with fine appetites to breakfast. I wrote a letter to friend T. T. O. and sister S. requesting them to join us in a fishing excursion the next day. In the afternoon Rev. ——— invited us to visit the 'neck' again, as some of his friends were there. We went accordingly, but left the strangers for another brief hour of 'converse with earth's glorious things.' We travelled over the longest beach in this neighborhood. Beyond it are rocks piled upon rocks, and there too is this unceasing dashing of the waves. Skipping from point to point like wild goats of the mountains we were seen, while we inhaled the fresh breeze and felt our spirits rise with its invigorating influence. I think I prefer old Neptune's perfume casket to any other. Our rowers endeavored to land us at the point from whence we started, but alas! for the unceremonious regularity of the tides, we could not come within a vast distance of the desired haven; so we turned about and entered another cove, but fortune was still against us, and finally the gentlemen jumped overboard, took us in their arms and landed us in safety. It created some mirth at all events, and darkness overtook us before we again saw 'home.' Thursday morning cars brought T. and S. with letters from N——. Again wending our way to the sea-side, we set sail in the Thomas H. Benton—a fine boat—and, as we could not approach the opposite shore, we were landed in a small boat. The gentlemen of the party, (with one exception) and three ladies put out to sea for the pleasure of fishing. Again we sought the rocks with book in hand, and sat down in their shadow. Mr. G. accompanied us and enchained our attention with stories of sea-life. Many of his relatives sleep in the silent caverns of the deep. Imagination loves to suppose them resting peacefully below the commotion which rivets the eye, and watched over by those pure sea-nymphs with which poetry loves to people the unseen floor of ocean. I remarked to him concerning the beauty of the beach, and expressed a wish to be on the spot during a storm. 'I was here,' said he, 'when two vessels were cast upon that shore, and but one man out of both ship's companies was saved.' The spot where we then sat was washed by the wrathful surge, and the scene as described by him, was one of awful sublimity. I have since gazed upon that beach, but those vessels with their despairing crews were but too visible. Not a vestige of their ocean home, with its towering spars and free white sails now reminds the spectator of that scene of terror, but the picture was written upon the hearts of the beholders, and time cannot efface the impression. While we were resting our wearied frames and listening with intense interest to our companion, the water for a considerable extent was colored with a purple hue, and it bubbled as though a million small pebbles had been thrown into it. 'This,' said our friend, 'is a school of mackerel,' and he supposed a thousand barrels might be gathered in the usual way. A well regulated 'school' were there, if one may judge by the regularity with which they moved along. Observing that our fishing friends were 'homeward bound,' we sought the landing place in time to welcome them. They saluted us with a chorus and the waving of handkerchiefs, which we answered in the best manner possible, considering our diminutive number. Many fine fishes rewarded them for their pleasant toil, and no one was so unfortunate as to place his name upon the sick list. A chowder, excellent in quality and abundant in quantity, refreshed us all. The gentlemen, truly democratic as they styled themselves, reposed upon the grass and feasted at their leisure.

While sailing homeward, we joined our voices in a full chorus, and, though 'unable to fill the house' we succeeded in making considerable noise. A solo from — — —, was warmly applauded. Being truly patriotic, the whigs and democrats both claimed it. The worthy friends around us deserve commendation as patient listeners. Our Boston friends bade us 'farewell' and took the evening cars for home indeed. In the evening we again assembled in the parlor of our worthy host, and Mr. H. electrified us with specimens of eloquence. His gestures were very graceful, his voice has a fine manly tone, and, better than all, he evidently felt the soul-thrilling sentiments he was uttering. The pilgrim fathers were before us as they stood upon the Rock of Plymouth and caused 'the aisles of the dim wood to ring with the anthem of the free.' Bernardino del Carpio grasped the rein of the king's fiery charger, and placed the false monarch face to face with the injured dead. The heart-touching strain of Mrs. Hemans' 'Leaves have their time to fall,' was spoken with a solemnity and pathos that sent the truant tears over my cheek. Then came Cato's sublime soliloquy and extracts from Richard 3d., and Macbeth. All these were preceded by a short lecture on Transcendentalism, so irresistibly ludicrous that the auditors were convulsed with laughter. I asked him whether the grave or gay predominated in his character. He answered me truly 'they alternate.' He gave himself to the inspiration of the hour, and afforded us a liberal intellectual entertainment. He is eloquent because fearless in depicting the passions and emotions of the soul, and the evening was one of the most delightful I ever passed. Truly Mr. H. I owe you much for this. Between eleven and twelve I retired.

Woman.

In a late number of this Miscellany, may be found an excellent essay on 'MAN,' by my fellow-laborer and companion. The scripture saith, 'It is not good that man should be alone,' which is probably true in more senses than one. The piece referred to, suggested the idea of offering to the readers of the Repository, some thoughts on 'man's better half.' It will be confessed by all that my subject is a good one, and were it in hands capable of doing it justice, there might be a corresponding goodness in a discourse upon it.

In all barbarous nations, where physical strength has been the test of true greatness, woman has been regarded as man's inferior, and has been considered and generally treated as his slave, instead as a companion. She has been doomed to move in a sphere far below her nature and dignity; she has been degraded in mind and reduced to the lowest state to which moral and intellectual beings can fall. Not being possessed with so great physical strength, nor with so bold and masculine a mind as man, her condition and prospects were fearfully dark and appalling. And this probably would have been her condition now, in our own happy land, as it is in many other countries, had not christianity, like a loving sister and friend, took her by the hand, and led her away from her slavery under which she had long groaned and suffered. The gospel by its sacred powers and holy influences elevated her to her proper sphere and condition, gave her new energies and beauties, and formed a new and interesting era in her history. Where civilization and religion have not scattered their blessings, she is robbed of all those moral and intellectual endowments, to which she is capable of attaining, and which throw such a dignity and lustre around the character of any human being. There her task is the menial drudgery of life, and she is exposed to sale like the brute that perisheth. Such seems to be the features of a certain portion of woman's history. But it is not of the past that we design to speak.

Without premising further, we will offer some considerations upon woman's intellectual attainments. In this age of intellectual and moral culture, counterfeit accomplishments in any class do not seem to pass current. The time has been when she who could charm by her beauty of person, graceful appearance, and splendid dress, occupied the most conspicuous station in the minds of some; but as society advances in knowledge and refined taste, beauty of mind seems to be the only thing upon which any real value is placed, by all who have minds to discern the difference between the counterfeit and genuine accomplishments. Personal beauty and the fashionable graces, without mind, are like the charms of the wax figure in the show-room, we admire for a moment, but soon discover that the object of admiration is devoid of understanding, and we involuntarily turn to seek something more attracting and instructive. 'The untaught and unregulated beauty we soon wish to lay upon the shelf in disgust.' The rose is sweet and beautiful while it lasts, but its day is short, and its sweetness and beauty are soon no more. The evergreen, the emblem of immortality, has not the exquisite beauty and charms of the blooming flower, but its chief excellence is that it lasts all the year. The storms of winter and the bleak winds when they come howling around, do not wither its leaves or blight its beauty. So with the beauties of mind. Knowledge and truth are immortal, and they will form a wreath for the brow, which will never fade. When the storms of adversity darken around us, and when the winter of life comes, they remain the same, bright and beautiful. They have an intrinsic value, which remains the same in all the periods of life. A person with a benevolent disposition and a well taught intellect, always possesses more influence, and is more highly esteemed, more useful and happy, than the accomplished belle.

By what has now been said, it will be perceived that we do not place any great value upon that system of female education, in some places so popular, which only aims at ornament rather than usefulness, which adds grace to appearance, rather than to prepare for the great objects and ends of life. All education should be for the purpose of assisting thought, to aid the mind in its onward march in knowledge and virtue, and to elevate every noble faculty of our natures. It should be a system of training the mind to think for itself, to originate ideas, to discipline its faculties, so that they can be concentrated upon one object, till thinking with power becomes an easy task. 'To arouse the dormant energies, to elicit the latent powers and resources, to unfold the faculties of the mind—to give scope, direction, impulse, efficiency and employment, is the first appropriate business and end of all education.' It has not in days past been deemed important that woman should be educated beyond the bare capacity of doing the common business of the nursery and kitchen, but it has been discovered, that he who opposes her education in a higher sense, is his own enemy. The ocean can be poisoned only by poisoning the streams that flow into it, and so it is with society. And if woman is not educated, if she has not the knowledge and abilities to which she is capable of attaining, home is cheerless, and society will be ignorant and corrupt. 'The guardianship of domestic comfort, the nurture of the unfolding mind, the regency over home's hallowed sanctuary, cannot safely be committed to a soul darkened by ignorance.' The public mind seems to be somewhat conscious of this fact, and a good degree of interest has been awakened respecting female education. Yet an improvement seems to be called for in that system of which we have spoken, so fashionable in high circles, a system of training for the great market of the world, rather than a preparation for usefulness and duty. What Mrs. Emma Willard has said on this subject in an admirable address, presented by her to the Legislature of N. Y. in 1819, proposing a plan of improving female education, and which plan she has followed with great success, is to a great extent true now. 'Not only has there been a want of system concerning female education, but much of what has been done has proceeded upon mistaken principles. One of these is, without a regard to the different periods of life, proportionate to their importance, the education of females has been too exclusively directed to fit them for displaying to advantage the charms of youth and beauty. Though it may be proper to adorn this period of life, yet it is incomparably more important to prepare for the serious duties of maturer years. Though well to decorate the blossom, it is far better to prepare for the harvest. In the vegetable creation nature seems but to sport, when she embellishes the flower, while all her serious cares are directed to perfect the fruit.' The importance of the course here recommended is well sustained in the address from which the above is extracted. Mrs. L. H. Sigourney has also spoken to the same effect, from whose writings we make an extract. It is from a piece entitled 'Superficial Attainments,' in the 'Lady's Book' for July, 1840. 'You will find,' says she, 'a well-disciplined literary taste, a source of great delight. It has a self-sustaining power when the tinsel of life fades. We are in our inherent structure as well as by the usages of refined society, far more dependant than the other sex. Our happiness rests on a few props, formed out of the affections. If they fail us, and they may, we cannot turn to the world for a substitute. Even were its fame and honor subject to our control, they could not sooth us, if the heart's sanctuary was invaded, any more than the imaginary music of the spheres might console the homeless wanderer who shrinks from the beating of the tempest. But a well regulated mind, full of rich resources, is a fortress of no ordinary strength. Among those resources, is a substitute for friendship, in that fellowship with the great of every age which makes the solitary study a peopled land of choice spirits. We share a satisfaction almost like personal intercourse with those mighty minds which the world has worshipped.' 'Literary characters,' said De la Mothe, 'are cotemporaries of all ages, and citizens of every clime.' Even the page which has silently chronicled our thoughts, becomes to us a sister. 'I part with my manuscripts, as with dear friends who have cheered me in hours of sadness,' said the sensitive Cowper. * * * * * 'Who can estimate the amount of good which may be done in a country like ours, by educated women? Men may have more knowledge, yet influence others less. By the nature of their pursuits they cannot often pause to scatter its seeds by the wayside. Borne on by the current of a restless and excitable age, multitudes of them struggle for wealth, or honor, as the swimmer breasts the wave; they ride for a moment upon the crested billow, or sink beneath it, and their wisdom perishes with them. But the daughter and sister in the quietness of the paternal home, the faithful teacher in the village school-house, the mother in her secluded nursery, are all forming others after their own model, writing upon that which is never to die. Man may have more knowledge, and yet hoard it up in his cabinet, or embody it in expensive tomes, or confine it to the profession through which he seeks sustenance, or attains distinction. He lifts himself up like a mountain in its majesty—like the solemn forest, which overshadows and awes the traveller. But woman, like earth, the sweet mother, gives freely what has been entrusted to her, the corn ripening for harvest, the flower blushing in the sun-beam, the rich grass that covers the dark brown mould with unconscious beauty.' The Youthful Warriors.

IN ancient times, a warrior stood preparing himself for battle. The first dawning of day shed a faint light on his gilded armor, and but feebly illumined a spacious apartment. Few of the Carthaginians had awoken from their slumbers; but there was one, a youth, scarce nine years of age, who had passed a sleepless night. Bright visions of future glory filled his brain, and morning's earliest dawn found him prostrate at the feet of the warrior, beseeching that he might accompany him to a far distant field of battle! It was the warrior's son, and his favorite. He gazed upon him earnestly, and he saw bravery, decision and revenge depicted on his countenance, and ever and anon he heard the earnest, thrilling request: 'My father, may I go?' The father yielded, after he had taken him to the 'altar of Moloch,' and heard him swear that he would be the eternal enemy of the Romans.

This youth was victorious. His name became a terror to the whole Roman army, and his deeds of valor filled all Carthage with rejoicing. Thousands of voices chanted his praises, and he seemed great as their gods. But changes will come. The warrior who carried his army over the untrodden Alps, saw that the sun of his glory was about setting in darkness. Dejected, he retired to his home—but how changed were his countrymen! How fickle is man! Coldness and distrust had succeeded idolatry and confidence; and nearly twenty years after, Hannibal, that great general, was poisoned, far away from the country he had fought to redeem!

In modern times, I saw a youth in conversation with his father. He, too, had passed a sleepless night; but his countenance seemed calm, though decided. Visions of future glory had filled his thoughts; but it was glory of a celestial kind. 'My father, shall I go?' His father yielded, and he bowed himself at the altar of the great I am, and vowed to be the friend of man, and the eternal enemy of sin. He joined himself to an army of warriors, whose leader was Jesus of Nazareth. Many were the battles they fought, and many the victories they gained over the ridicule of scoffers, and the enemies within their own hearts. Angel voices chanted praises of his deeds of benevolence and love. The widow's heart sang for joy, and the famished orphan was fed by his bounty. His kindness softened hearts which had been harder than Alpine rocks, and his offers of salvation found their way to the soul, through avenues untrodden as Alpine passes. But a change comes over him. His sun goes down, 'not behind the darkened West,' but melts away into the light of Heaven. His body was embalmed with the tears of friends, and his funeral dirge was the moaning of those he had relieved.

Reader, which, think you, God looks upon with the most pleasure; Hannibal, the conqueror of armies, or this christian philanthropist, the conqueror of sin?

The Atmosphere.

THE atmosphere is an element which we cannot see, but which we feel investing us wherever we go: whose density we can measure to a certain height; whose purity is essential to existence; whose elastic pressure on the lungs, and on and around the frame, preserves man in that noble attitude which lifts his head towards the skies, and bids him seek there for an eternal home. The atmosphere is neither an evaporation from earth nor sea, but a separate element, bound to the globe, and accompanying it in its motions round the sun. Can we for an instant imagine, that we are indebted for the atmosphere only to some fortuitous accident? If there were no atmosphere, and if we could possibly exist without one, we should be unable to hear the sound of the most powerful artillery; even though it were discharged at the distance of a single pace. We should be deprived of the music of the sea, the minstrels of the woods, of all the artificial combinations of sweet sounds, and of the fascinating tones of the human voice itself. We might make our wants and feelings perceptible to each other by signs and gesticulations, but the tongue would be condemned to irremediable silence. The deliberations of assemblies of men, from which laws and the order of society have emanated, could never have taken place. The tribes of mankind would wander over the earth in savage groups, incapable of civilization, and the only arts which they could ever know would be those alone which might enable them to destroy each other.

Our Book and Memoranda Table.

THE ROSE OF SHARON. This our especial favorite among the Annuals, is fast receiving the favor we desired for it, as, at this present writing (Sept. 25) 1300 copies have been sold, although it has not yet been advertised in the city papers. It has received from all quarters decided approbation, and all allow, what is evident at first glance, that it is a more elegant volume than the previous issues. Let the friends of the work continue their efforts to extend its circulation, and thus encourage editor and publisher to go on and preserve in being a work that is needed and which is an honor to us. Elegant binding, four plates of great beauty, and rich reading, at $2 per copy.

'THE CRISTIAN'S LEGACY. By Wm. Jackson.' This is a volume whose prospectus we noticed some time since, and which we would notice as favorably as possible, for we are aware that to the author much depends on its sale. Br. Jackson is known as a convert from Calvinism to the doctrine of the final salvation of all men; but he retains, so far as we can discover, all his former theological opinions save in reference to the particular mentioned. He therefore must be expected to vindicate, as he does, the doctrines of original or inherent sin or depravity, imputed righteousness, &c. The doctrine of the Trinity is here put 'in opposition to the pride of human reason,' and the existence and activity of a personal Devil are many times confessed. We cannot find any clear and distinct avowal of the doctrine of the Restitution—the nearest is page 285, headed with John xii. 32, and followed by quotations from scripture without a word of comment or explication. In short, the doctrine of the work has not sympathy with Universalian views of God and scripture and human nature.

We do not speak of this matter as finding fault; God forbid that we should wish to dictate a single soul in the utterance of his theological opinions; but we do feel it our duty to state clearly and distinctly what, in respect to doctrine, the reader may expect from the volume. He will meet with many good thoughts—with a large number of precious passages of scripture, and with many trains of reflection which can be improved to great spiritual profit. He will meet with a style often eccentric and too often gross, but yet plain and simple. But he must also expect the usual doctrines of the Calvinistic church inwoven throughout, and scripture bent to favor them. We should, perhaps, add, that the author does not presume by any single word to put forth his book as a Universalist work, but presents it to lovers of the Lord Jesus, to whom, he says, all the promises of 'the God of truth in Christ Jesus' are made.

The author is poor, and we are sorry, sincerely and deeply are we sorry, that he ventured on the cost of publication. With some, his work may meet with great favor; it may be that enough will favor it to take up the edition. All can cull from it excellent matter, and we could wish that the benevolent might relieve him of the burden he bears in assuming the undertaking of publishing this work. The book is well bound and fairly printed; it contains 420 full pages; and is sold at $1 the copy, or 6 copies for $5. Published by the author, Providence, R. I.

CHRISTIAN GRACES. By a Lady. We have received a copy of these beautiful sketches, done up in a very neat style, from our publishing friend, A. Tompkins. We have been proud of them, as they came to us, month by month, in the pages of the Repository; in their collective character, they have lost no attribute of excellence. They are the production of a very beloved friend of ours,—the wife of our excellent co-editor; of course, we make no pretensions to impartiality. But others do—and they pronounce the 'Christian Graces' a valuable acquisition to our moral literature. The sketches are all interesting and good—particularly to our spirit did 'FAITH, or FIDELITY,' commend itself. We love, above all others, a faithful, unselfish, 'leal' spirit, ready always to make noble sacrifices in behalf of duty, of affection, and of truth. We could almost join in the apotheosis of such a soul. In conclusion, we would cordially thank our friends, the author and the publisher, for this sweet little volume. The style is simple and affectionate, and well suited to the tastes and understandings of the young, to whom it will prove a most acceptable and useful gift. S. C. E.

LETTERS FROM ABROAD. By Miss Sedgwick. Our good genius in the book department, B. B. Mussey, has sent us two handsome volumes, bearing the above title. They are delightful—and reading them, is next to taking a tour through England, Germany, and Italy, one's self. As an author, Miss Sedgwick ranks as the first love of our childhood—and to use her own words, 'Children are seldom at fault in their first loves.' She goes abroad into the world with a heart full of benevolence, and a vision clear from prejudices. She seems to have an intuitive knowledge of human nature, and can pity and pardon where others would reproach. Her sketches of several public characters in England and elsewhere, are very interesting; and her own personal adventures are narrated with a modesty and pleasant humor which make the peculiar fascination of her character. All in all, these letters of hers are the most agreeable volumes we have read for many a day, and the only thing we can regret about them is, that they come to an end so soon. We want another brace of volumes, taking us through Switzerland and France, back to England. Shall we not have them? S. C. E.

IRVING'S LIFE OF MISS DAVIDSON. I have just risen from the perusal of the above mentioned work, and with your permission, will call the attention of your readers to a book every way worthy of their patronage. Attached to these memoirs are Miss Davidson's poetical remains, and I think the world can furnish no parallel to these monuments of youthful genius. Her short ministry on earth teems with examples of patience, untiring industry, a holy and trusting spirit, and a clear, calm faith in the realities of the unseen world. The love she bore her mother, so engrossing as scarcely to admit a thought of self, her tender care lest maternal anxiety should awaken and operate unfavorably upon health, precious as her own heart's blood, the confidence with which she poured forth the aspirations of her fervent spirit to a heart that ever beat in unison with her own—all this presents a picture so delightful, that the reader enshrines it as a household memory in the sanctuary of the heart. How blest the mother who could boast such a child, and truly favored the child who possessed such a mother.

Mrs. Davidson read unerringly the nature of her gifted offspring. No youthful aspiration was ever checked, no hour of inspiration ever passed without sympathy, no feeble effort of her heaven-born genius was ever unheeded, but high and sacred communion formed an indissoluble bond between the mother and daughter. So similar was her character to that of her lamented sister, Lucretia, that it seems but the same strain of unearthly melody from harps equally beautiful and fragile. Her frame was too delicate to withstand the chafings of her keenly sensitive spirit, and the tabernacle crumbled and fell while its wonderful inhabitant, day by day, gathered strength for lofty flights into the spirit land, and returned only to shed its radiance upon the perishing objects around it.

Her biographer has performed his task beautifully, and I would close as I began, by recommending these Memoirs to all who would delight to trace the footsteps of an almost angelic visitant through the shadows of earth, till its wing was spread for an unseen but unerring flight to the bosom of its God. IONE.

SAWYER'S REVIEW OF HATFIELD. We are glad to greet this work. We would not alter it. It is strong, thorough and earnest—as it should be. And humble as the offering is, we present the author our thanks. He has done the denomination a great service, which will be acknowledged far and wide. He has completely dissected the dead body of Hatfield's 'Universalism as it is,' and shown that if it ever had any life, it must have been from the galvanic action of the author's ecstatic vanity when he first viewed his work and complacently beheld his image there! Some may deem the examination too minute, but they will not longer think so, if they will remember who the author had to deal with—one who would make the greatest ado, if perchance a single assertion or argument had been passed by, as though that were a poser. And again; it is the minute review which alone could unfold the insignificant methods of attack adopted by the adversary. And still farther;—the minuteness of the inspection evidences the calmness and care with which the author proceeded with his task, weighing well the expression of all he has uttered of the severity of truth and fact. And more than all this—the opponents of our doctrine are so wrapt up in the blindness of prejudice and ignorance, that it is necessary to let light in upon their opening vision gradually, accommodating to their feeble sight the visual medium of truth. We, therefore, hope much from the circulation of the 'Review,' and trust it will meet, as we have no doubt it will, with an extensive sale. The New York organ of Hatfieldianism refused to advertise it, which the conductors would not have done, if the power of the work were not feared. But it will be read, and circulated, and work conviction towards the principles of everlasting truth, when the mockery that called it forth, has become despised.

The 'Review' is handsomely printed and bound, contains 220 pages, and is sold for 50 cts. To be had of A. Tompkins, 38 Cornhill, Boston, P. Price, New York, publisher, whom we thank for our copy.

'ISH-NOO-JU-LUT-SCHE; or the Eagle of the Mohawks. A Tale of the Seventeenth Century.' 2 vols., pp. 234 and 284. These volumes present the reader with an interesting tale full of engaging and various incident, leading the imagination to scenes and times in contrast with our own. The hero and heroine are early introduced, and the interest immediately excited, is not lessened, but increased to the close. Many of the other characters are drawn with skill, and the descriptions of places and events are quite graphic. The religious character of the work has sympathy with our faith, and a long continued and highly useful conversation occurs between an Indian sachem—a Restitutionist, and a Catholic maiden, furnishing admirable rules for the study of the Scriptures. The general tendency of the work is to impress the mind with the importance of living christianity if we would make converts to its truth,—a good and great moral. We commend the volumes to the attention of our friends, and especially to the librarians of our Sabbath Schools. The volumes are published in a very neat style by P. Price, New York. On sale at A. Tompkins', price 50 cts.

THE POWER OF THE GOSPEL. We acknowledge the receipt of a copy of a sermon by Br. O. A. Skinner, from J. H. Harris of Haverhill. This discourse was delivered in that town at the installation of Br. T. P. Abell, and was examined by a Mr. Fitch of that place, who afterwards published his sermon. The discourse by Br. Skinner is a most excellent one on Rom. i. 16. In it he treats negatively and positively of the Power of the Gospel, and well treats his subject. We regard it as one of the very best of the author's productions.

We also thankfully acknowledge the receipt of another discourse called out by the same circumstance—an examination of Mr. Fitch's review of Skinner's Sermon, by Br. Abell. It is a calm and dignified production, giving due honor to Mr. Fitch for his candor in allowing some good in Universalism, and replying fairly and distinctly to the assertions against our faith.—We do not know whether or not either of these discourses is on sale.

THE UNIVERSALIST COMPANION, with an ALMANAC and REGISTER, containing the statistics of the denomination, for 1842. A. B. Grosh, editor. We acknowledge the receipt of this valuable work, published in a very neat style, and full of useful matter. It contains the usual matter of an Almanac, together with doctrinal and practical articles of interest, and full statistics of the Denomination in the United States and Territories. We trust that a very general attention will be paid to it, and that the whole edition published will speedily be sold.—To be had of A. Tompkins, by the single copy, the dozen or hundred, at the following prices;—12 cts. single; $1 dozen. O. Hutchinson, Utica, Publisher.

'THE GOSPEL HARMONIST; by Thos. Whittemore. This is the new music book we mentioned in our last as about to be issued. We cannot read music, and therefore cannot give a scientific notice. But we can tell of the harmony and richness of good music when it is executed with skill; and we have had the pleasure of hearing some excellent tunes from this work, sung by our church choir. On asking our leader his opinion of the work, he answered by one good, simple, rich, yankee word—'Prime!' And such we doubt not is the 'Gospel Harmonist,' and therefore commend it to the attention of the lovers of music, and especially to the leaders of our church choirs.

THE ESSEX QUARTERLY CONFERENCE will meet in Georgetown on the third Wednesday of October. We expect a full meeting; especially shall we look for a goodly number of friends from Haverhill, Andover, Methuen, Newburyport, &c. Rich meetings are always enjoyed by this Conference.

UNITED STATES CONVENTION. 'Glory to God in the highest; on earth peace and good will toward men!' We have great cause to take up and repeat with gladness this anthem of praise, for the influences of the joyous meetings of the Convention have breathed a new enthusiasm into our soul. It cannot be but that all must be better for gathering there; so rich was the occasion in all that elevates, strengthens and refines.

The New York friends deserve and receive great credit for the very ample and every way acceptable accommodations prepared for visitors. A large number from all parts of the Union were there, and all, so far as we could learn, were handsomely provided for. We conversed with many who confessed themselves as happy in their temporary homes as we were, and that is sufficient. We shall never forget the warm hospitality of the friends who entertained ourself and partner.

The public meetings were well attended. The Annual Sermon by Br. Sawyer was a finished production, evidently the result of much study and care—and we confess ourself thankful that he has set a good example to brethren when appointed to deliver occasional sermons. Too many content themselves with an apology and an ordinary production; a course that reflects no credit on themselves, and is no compliment to their brethren. The discourse will soon be given to the public through the press, and we therefore defer more particular remark.

The meetings of the Council were conducted with peace and to good results. The news from various parts of the land were encouraging, and a good degree of zeal is evidently felt everywhere. A Meeting of the Friends of Education was held the third day, and an animated discussion took place in reference to the importance and necessity of having schools of a high order under the control of Universalists. There was a good deal of wordy warfare between the ardent friends, and no less sincere opponents, of a Theological Institution. Not a soul, that we could learn, was opposed to the earnest advocacy of a higher order of intellectual attainment in our ministry. The demand for this depends upon the people, not on a few ministers who desire the elevation of the denomination; and in all discussions, it should be conceded that the ministry are in favor of the most thorough mental preparation—of the establishing of seminaries of learning and colleges where the best educational influences may be concentrated. The opposers of a giant Theological Institution contend that these are all we want—that these will furnish the desired good, and all beyond these is but the fashioning of a mould by which to cast the mental elements into one form, bearing one stamp. They contend that the erection of every Theological Institution is the upbuilding of another monument of sectarianism, fraught with more evil than good, and they point to the history of every such distinctive institution as full of warning. But a brief notice cannot suffice to present the argument for and against, and we must refer the reader to what has been, and will be published in the weekly papers on this subject.

Our journeys to and from New York were safe and pleasant. A Temperance meeting was held during our return passage in the cabin of the steamboat, and a warm and interesting meeting it was indeed. In short, we have the memories of one of the happiest of all religious gatherings, and can ask no more than to pray that the next Convention may be blessed as the last.

The state of the cause in New York city is of the most encouraging character. It is a great city, and severe labor is required of those who lead in the Regeneration. God give them strength of mind and heart, prudence and every virtue and grace needed, and may they see, as they have seen, the work of the Lord prospering in their hands.

The Convention meets in 1842, in Providence, R. I.

TO CORRESPONDENTS AND READERS. We hope to hear from many of our correspondents who have been silent a long time. We need their favors, and shall be thankful to receive them.

We shall give a fine article in our next, from Mrs. S. Broughton, entitled 'The White Satin Dress.' We have also on hand several very acceptable poems from her, which we shall publish in due time. Also, an excellent poem from our valued friend, Mrs. C. W. Hunt, entitled 'Georgiana,' full of the richest poetry.

Other communications are on file.

The Beatitudes;

Or the Elements of Christian Happiness.

CHAPTER V. RIGHTEOUSNESS.

MATT. V. 6: 'Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness; for they shall be filled.'

THERE was much hungering and thirsting in the hearts of the multitude who stood in our Lord's presence, but not after righteousness. Their intense desires rested on objects adverse to the true devotion to the Right, and they sought rather for what would exalt and distinguish after the manner of the world, than according to the standard of holiness. Hence, their enthusiastic longing for a Messiah that should lead to battle and to conquest. Had they possessed the virtue our Savior commended in this beatitude, the prophecies would have been read by them with a far different mind, and a few spiritual leaders would not have led astray the whole nation. Yet how descriptive is this picture of a great portion of mankind! They yield their minds to favorite pursuits, tamely receiving religious doctrines; thus permitting a few teachers to lead thousands astray from the most important branches of righteousness. And these, thus taught, have made others err, and thus error has been and is perpetuated, by following a multitude rather than principle.

This is an evil of great magnitude, and the connection of the sentiment of the beatitude with social progress and human happiness, should be understood. Individuality should be preserved, and men should cease to flatter themselves that others can hunger and thirst after righteousness for them. They must feel the heaven ordained union between their growth in spiritual knowledge and the christian graces and their true happiness; or they will still retain their stunted stature as religious beings. Christianity bases itself on our progressive nature, and by its adaptedness thereto would prove its divinity, in harmony with all the correspondences which exist in the works of God. Therefore, it recognizes man as an immortal being, as capable of becoming a partaker of the divine nature and growing into the likeness of God. It goes with him through every stage of his being, and perpetually impels him to look on and up—to press forward and continuously hope. Its clear, strong, earnest and sweet voice, is ever bidding the soul to 'grow in grace, and in the knowledge'—perceptive, and practical and experimental—'of the Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ.' Thus it recognizes Progress as the great law of our being, and Regeneration as life-long, as here and in eternity we follow the Way, Truth, and Life, and die unto sin. And thus in what christianity proposes to do,—to quicken and feed the divine life that we may grow up to the perfect man in Christ Jesus—we have the loftiest encouragement to exertion, and the principle of ambition may be developed with safety and to permanent glory. 'If any man suffer as a christian'—in working out the true character of a disciple of christianity—'let him not be ashamed, but let him glorify God on this behalf'—by rejoicing in the power to develop the christian spirit and by obedience to it; for 'the fruits of righteousness are unto the praise and glory of God.'

We approach then our theme, conscious of its ever increasing importance, and would treat of the foundation, nature, and blessedness of Righteousness, or right moral feeling and action.

First, then, the beatitude under consideration, has its foundation in our very nature. We are constituted for the feeling and practice of righteousness, and certain it is that this is its proper element. Were it not so, we should be deprived of one of the best proofs that God is a holy being, that he truly desires his creatures to be holy, and has ordained their final and complete recovery from sin; but every evidence that persuades the mind that the essentials of our nature—the proper order and developement of our faculties—require the practice of righteousness, should strengthen our conviction in the moral perfections of the Deity. Men sin, but they are not satisfied with the service. They never hunger and thirst after it, but after some false good, which is attained by sin, and which blinds the reason to the character of the transgression. They have heard so much of ‘the pleasures of sin,’ that they are inclined to regard it with much less horror than Moses did, (Heb. xi. 24–26), as not all evil, and its hideousness is partly concealed. They forget that it is a departure from God’s wise and benevolent law—that it is unfaithfulness to the higher and better principles which should ever be revered, and that it sacrifices to the earthly appetites their celestial aspirations. Thus error and forgetfulness lead them to forsake, while they are amid the bustle and din of the world, what in every hour of retirement and reflection they are convinced is founded in their very nature and promotive of their best happiness. The Beatitude takes for granted that man has a mingled nature, and so he has. He demands food for the nature that has an affinity to the angels, and by which he has been made but a little lower than they; and he knows that nature will not be satisfied with transgression and sin; he knows how sin has stirred up rebellion amid the elements of his moral being, and he has suffered, as the poor victim suffers when the energies of the physical system have been aroused to resist the influence of a subtle poison introduced therein. And as that victim is willing to suffer if the enemy can be routed, so often has the sinner been willing to suffer, if the foe could be triumphed over and expelled. Thus are we taught to hunger and thirst after righteousness, as after the element of life.

Experience is confirmed by observation and the history of others. Take a view of the character and effects of the vicious affections, in contrast with the virtuous affections, as observation has presented them, and what is the result? Consider them as revealed in history—‘philosophy teaching by examples’—and what is the conclusion? Is it not the same, and that same eloquently in favor of the sentiment of our Lord? We are certain it must be so; and we are the more convinced of this as we consider, that to every project there are three stages of thought or action,—the Conception, the Fulfillment, and the After-Reflection. Do not each of these plead strongly for virtuous projects being the nearest connected with happiness? If they do—and who can deny it?—then we have three classes of powerful reasons for thinking not a single vicious thought, or doing a single vicious action.

We must have this high estimation of the worth of righteousness before we can be of the characters described in the Beatitude. An intensity of mind is referred to, and men do not ardently desire that which they value little; but according to their conception of its worth and its promise to promote their happiness, will be their anxiety to obtain and enjoy it. We read, ‘Unto you which believe, Christ is precious!’ and why? Because they knew his worth, and the intimate connection of his truth and mission with their happiness. This holds good as a rule in reference to all departments of human effort and every pursuit. Animated exertions to further our undertakings can alone insure success, and this animation cannot be secured but by a high conception of the importance or good of the object in reference to ourselves or others. We must regard righteousness as a great good—a good not to be trifled with, or lightly given up. We must look upon it in the light of heaven—in the clear sunshine of the Gospel, and not by the dim and hazy lights of human wisdom; and then shall we see its divinity, how it is worthy of our highest and noblest efforts, and in its crown will glitter more radiant gems than ever lent brightness and beauty to the diadem of the monarch. The ‘crown of righteousness’ laid up for Paul in the christian church, was to him a reward rich and satisfactory for the fight he had fought and the course he had run; for he knew many a mortal’s eye would look upon it, and feel animated by a remembrance of how it was earned, and pant for a like honor.

There is a three-fold Righteousness for which we are to hunger and thirst, or to attain which we are to strive with an holy ardor and perseverance. This threefold righteousness is,—The righteousness of God; the righteousness of principles of thought and feeling; and the righteousness of life and example. How blessed is he who hungers and thirsts for these, and is filled or satisfied! How closely are they united with our best good, all conspiring to make us happy, useful, and exemplary! Let us consider them—they are our life.

1. By the righteousness of God, we mean that rectitude of nature, word, and deed, on which all the certainty of promised good depends, and which makes him, as declared by Moses, 'a faithful God.' We know how our confidence and trust in a fellow being is affected by our ideas of the rectitude of his character, and this, with becoming reverence, we may apply to the divine Being. Nothing is more essential to our resting with our whole strength on his promises, than a clear and settled conviction of the perfect veracity of his character—that there cannot exist or arise any thing to cause him to alter his purpose, to deceive us, to do us wrong; and as he cannot fear or hope, his eternal counsel will remain, and what he has designed and revealed, that he will do. When this is fixed in the mind, how firm is the heart's trust! how unshaken by darkness and mystery, and tempests of evil is its confidence! and how calm is its reliance that the consummation will be perfect in the perfection of every human being! 'He will not suffer his faithfulness to fail!' is the declaration of his word; and to the mind fully, thoroughly imbued with the conviction of the veracity of Jehovah, this is enough to make the soul resigned even when the shades of a Gethsemane gather around it. 'God is love.' He will not suffer the faithfulness of that love to fail towards any intelligent creature in his universe. He will be faithful to each and to the harmony of his perfections. All mankind shall therefore be brought home by God's fidelity to his own love and grace, and he be all in all. Happy they who seek and find and enjoy, this knowledge of his righteousness!

2. By the righteousness of the principles of thought and feeling, we mean, that as God is a being of veracity and truth, and we are bound to imitate, as far, in degree, as we can, his character, it becomes us to seek ardently so to fix in our spiritual being those principles of rectitude which will cause our very thoughts and feelings to be right. This is a high attainment—one for which we may well hunger and thirst. In its full perfection, we cannot expect to possess it on earth; but to keep the attainment in view, will be incitement to effort and progression. Mysterious are our powers of thought and feeling, yet they are the springs of action. The noblest and the meanest deed alike sprung from one thought; that, like a self-multiplying seed, produced others, and they another tribe, and so on till a host nerved the passions to the godlike or the fiendish work. And so with feeling—twin sister of thought. We cannot guard against the intrusion of all thoughts, nor the rise of all feelings, no more than we can command the electric fluid in the atmosphere. But we have power, if we will nourish it, to prevent ourselves indulging and cherishing, as a nurse her pet, thoughts and feelings. We can bring in a good, to expel an evil spirit, and it is the non-exertion of this power which makes the good or evil, the applause or censure; to exert this, we want the aid of fixed and righteous principles, which will remind us of duty and our accountability to the all-seeing God. For these we should hunger and thirst—there is life in them, and happy will it be when we can use with solemnity and our whole heart, the Psalmist's words: 'I have sworn, and I will perform it, that I will keep all God's righteous judgments.' 'I shall not be ashamed when I have respect unto all thy commandments.'

3. The other thread of strength in the three-fold invisible cord which is to unite us to our best good, is the righteousness of life and example. This has an inseparable connection with the others, and the aim of the whole is to make ours the righteousness of Christ; and the way is simple, yet profound, for we read: 'If ye know that he is righteous, ye know that every one that doeth righteousness is born of him.' Though this is very plain, and perfectly harmonizing with the Savior's teachings; yet many of the disciples, led away by false apostles and teachers, were constrained to put their trust in something else than in doing righteousness to be righteous; and therefore John wrote them, using the affectionate language of a father, thus: 'Little children, let no man deceive you; he that doeth righteousness is righteous, even as he is righteous.' In the same degree as we act or do according to the righteous principles of the gospel, we approach the righteousness of Christ—we are righteous as he was righteous.' This righteousness is superior to the pharisaic standard; and we need not err in respect to its character, if we make Jesus our pattern and interpreter. His was the righteousness of principle, not profession; for the approbation of God, not the praise of men; and as we copy it, its reflection in our example will be most salutary to enlighten others, for they will not only have the word of righteousness in their Bibles, but righteousness living and breathing around them—and it may be like the prophet breathing on the dry bones in the valley, restoring to life and action. Happy is he who hungers and thirsts after this righteousness, and is filled. But we are not filled once for all. The 'bread of God,' and 'the life-giving water,' must be often hungered and thirsted after, as the renewing of the strength and cheerfulness of the spiritual man require.

Recalling the tender language of John, we are reminded of the peculiar application of our theme to the young. Well has a quaint writer said: 'Plants that receive only the evening sun, never grow so high as those that enjoy the rays of the morning. So it is with those men, whose hearts were not turned to divine things till the evening of their days, compared with those, who in early youth, began to drink in the rays of religion, and ripen their fruit in due season.' A beautiful thought and just. And what a pitiful desecration of our soul's capacities is it, to give them up to the service of the world in the bright and vigorous morning of life, and not awake to the high purposes of our existence till our sun is declining in the horizon! How meanly do such think of their inward being, of the powers of their celestial nature! Bowing down reason and heart to the things of the footstool, they aspire not to those of the throne of God. And while they have done this, they have boasted of Liberty! But what kind of liberty? A liberty to forget God, to trample upon his laws, and lead others from goodness and virtue! The veriest slavery ever fastened on man is such liberty; for what freedom is thereby given to those capacities which are the essentials of our intellectual being, and which are not satisfied with the routine of earthly pleasures and enjoyments? These misguided beings give freedom to every bird that can scarcely fly above the earth, and whose eye cannot bear the sun, while the eagle is chained, and its flutterings and strugglings are almost stilled by despair, and then they talk of having given liberty to the birds, as though the eagle was satisfied with its lot! Nay, nay, ye who are young and vigorous, do not talk of liberty till ye know the feeling and power of freedom to do nothing but good. This is the soul's freedom—the freedom of angels, and of Christ.

Be not led into the error which, like the ignis fatuus to the bewildered traveler, has betrayed many into paths of darkness and trouble—the error of regarding the service of religion as a comfortless one—a kind of slavery, in submitting to which men yield up the relish for the natural enjoyments of life, and must lose all vivacity and cheerfulness! How fatal an error is this—how many has it caused to reject, till old age, the divine light which is given as a lamp to our feet, shedding its rays around our path, revealing all dangers, and by its brilliancy discovering to our gaze beauties and joys that are hidden to others,—as the poet goes forth with the magic mirror of poesy, and by it reflects a new light of intellect, feeling, and fancy, on the loveliness and glories of nature, which none other can. They know not what they sacrifice who make no alliance with the divine goddess, Religion, in youth. It is as though one having a fine capacity to understand and enjoy the finest strains of poetry, should utterly exclude all works of genius from his sight and mind; for it is religion that inspires the finest passages in the poetry of life. It gives a new vision—it brings mind in rich conversation with material nature, and clothes the outward with thought and sentiment, everywhere tracing the presence of Jehovah, and reading the evidences of his wisdom, benevolence, and power, on all the varied and ever turning leaves of the seasons. Yea, it gives the power, which naught else can give, to feel what the poet has beautifully expressed:

'O be sure of this,—

All things are mercies while we count them so;
And this believing, not keen poverty,
Nor wasting years of pain, or slow disease,
Nor death, * * * * *
Shall ever drift our bark of faith ashore,
Whose steadfast anchor is securely cast
Within the veil, the veil of things unseen,
Which now we know not, but shall know hereafter.'

Then, come joy or sorrow, adverse or prosperous fortune, obscurity or fame,—let the principle of truth be firmly held to and revered, that life's best enjoyment springs from the careful cultivation and exercise of the capacities that make us capable of being righteous and good, and submission to the affectionate authority of religion,—the religion taught and exemplified by our Lord, not the religion whose legitimate effects have been, to exclude from the socialities of life and drive to the cloister and the cell. Hunger and thirst after this righteousness, as the warrior does for the fame of the victor, the poet for the laurel bay, the miser for wealth, or, what is the better ambition, the mother for growing virtue in her child. Seek aright the satisfaction of this desire, lest you gain that which is not, though it have the aspect of, bread, or of life-giving water. As the salt in the Judean valley of salt, only retains its savor as it clings to the parent rock, so religion can only be vital and sanctifying religion as it clings to and assimilates itself with Christ—with his doctrine and example. Cling to him as the student to his favorite author, and let Christ be formed in you, that the world may see Jesus in your life and conduct.

Happy are they, and happy will they be, who thus with holy ardor seek the highest and best attainments. They are panting for that which will prove as satisfying as the delicious waters of the flowing brook to the wearied deer; and as the deer stoops to drink but to revive for further progress, so let the seeker after righteousness linger not contented with the satisfaction of former efforts; but, like the deer, up and away for other scenes, strong and fleet to preserve his freedom, and escape the snares and shot of the enemy. The true christian does not tarry by pleasure's streams, hesitating from doubt concerning the joy of further effort, but his language of heart and action is, and may it be so with us:—

'No, my dear Lord, in following thee,
Not in a dark uncertainty
This foot obedient moves;
But with a Brother and a King,
Who many to his yoke will bring,
Who ever lives and ever loves.'

Georgiana.

BY MRS. C. W. HUNT.

THE extreme beauty and spiritual richness of the following poem, will make every reader prize its length. b.

'Tis evening hour; a sunset bright,
Is gilding with its golden light
The far hill-tops; the glowing earth
Is radiant as of infant birth.

The wind is playing 'mong the bowers,
Stealing sweets from all the flowers,
Waving their incense like a sea
Of perfume, gushing melody.

The deep—before so dark and cold,
Now gleams like waves of molten gold;
The fisher-barks at anchor ride
With close-furled pinions o'er the tide,—
Like some dark birds from out the sky
Attracted by its brilliancy,—
Are by some secret fetters bound,
Moving in mystic circles round.

'Tis hallowed time; a solemn spell
Is brooding over hill and dell,
Stirring the fountain depths of thought,
With sweet and bitter mem'ries fraught;
Yet soothing us His voice, whose will
The tempest hushed, with 'Peace-be-still!'
Waking the spirit's finest chords,
Like music-strains and gentle words.

On the heart's altar! kindling there
Are hopes, as sunset-shadows fair.

Hark! the bell! on the evening breath,
I hear it pealing—'Welcome, Death!'
See that long procession wind
Around the hill! now lost behind!
They're bearing at this quiet hour,
With sorrowing hearts, from her home-bower,
A lovely child; two days ago,
The tide of life, with sparkling glow,
Flushed, her fair cheek; her joyous brow
Seemed beauty's throne,—but mark her now!
Pale, pale and cold—yet beauteous still.
As some fair, frozen sparkling rill
Beneath the glancing moonbeam's power;
So seemed she at this evening hour.

Relenting death—as with regret
That he so soon his seal had set
Upon her brow—withdraw his arm,
Ere he had sullied one fair charm.
She lay within her coffin-cell,
Like priceless pearl in costly shell,
Enshrined in light, so pure—so rare,
A breath would leave a shadow there.

Her head was laid as if asleep,
Partially shading one fair cheek;
Her bright hair parted on her brow,
In glossy ringlets fell below
On either side; one dimpled hand
A rose-bud held; a rainbow-band
Of flow'rets wreathed the coffin-lid,
As if the fatal truth they hid,
That she was dead; frail diadem!
The casket's there—but where's the gem!
The censer's there—still—still the same,
But where's the incense? where, the flame?

Great God! it seems a mystery,
That thou should'st spare the aged tree,
Until its grey and sapless trunk,
Trembles and totters, as if drunk
With age, crushing the tender shoot,
Ere it has scarcely taken root.

She seemed some cherished hot house flower,
Broken in an unguarded hour;
A nestling stricken by the dart
Hurled blindly, by some careless heart.
The fowler shoots with erring aim,
May not the archer do the same?
Say—Death! did'st mean this victory?
Flew not the shaft unwarily?

Far away o'er the sun-bright sea,
Their proud ship coursing gallantly,
Are those—who, did they know the bed,
That this night pillows thy young head,
Would be like wrecks o'er storm-waves borne,
When rudder—masts—and all are gone.

Wilder than the troubled ocean
Over which thou now art borne,
When by storms and rude commotion,
Ships are tossed—and sails are torn,
Will be the tempest in thy bosom
When the tidings thou shalt hear,
That thy loved and cherished blossom
Faded—died—and thou not near.

She—the young and joyous hearted,
Whom thou left in beauty's bloom,
From thy warm embrace is parted,
Slumbers in the icy tomb.
As the wave, in sunshine glowing,
Passes ere its brightness dies,
So undimmed—no sorrow knowing,
Passed her spirit to the skies.

Mother—did no spirit token
Tell thee then—the cord was snapped?
That the golden bowl was broken,
And the heart's bright fountain sapped?
Did no shadow fall around thee
When the last pure life-beam fled?
Did no tempest-clouds surround thee,
Bringing night ere day had sped?*

When the deep-toned bell was pealing
Did no echo reach thy soul?
When the mourners' tears were stealing,
Did not thine instinctive roll?
Tell us! is no warning given
When the distant loved one dies?
When the spirit-links are riven,
Are there heard no boding cries?

When the tender rose-bud's taken
From the tree whereon it grew,
By the shock the whole is shaken,
Branches—stem—and leaflets too.
Tell—O, tell us! when the treasures
From the rifled heart are borne,
Are there heard no spirit-measures,
Chaunting sadly—'they are gone!'

In mournful loveliness she slumbers,
Where the forest flow'rets wave;
Trees are sounding dirge-like numbers,
O'er her calm and peaceful grave.
'Tis a hallowed spot and fitting,
To entomb the young—the fair,
Where the bright wild birds are flitting,
Sprinkling incense on the air.

Dark will be thy home—and dreary,
Shadows from the grave are there;
For that sunny smile thou'lt weary,
Which is beaming—Mother, where!
Hush thee,—hush! she's with her Maker,
Fled earth's weariness and care;
The smiling morn no more will wake her
From thy couch—she sleeps, not there!

She's gone to God! angels greet her!
Gone to join the seraph-band,
Who are springing now to meet her,
In the glorious spirit-land.
'Tis a blessed lot and joyous,
Thus to die in early youth,
Ere the storms of life sweep o'er us,
Staining the bright springs of truth.

Weep not! in the spirit's lightness,
'Tis a blessed lot to sleep;
Ere earth's shadows dim its brightness,
To depart; O! wherefore weep!

The White Satin Dress.

BY MRS. SARAH BROUGHTON.

'My dear Charlotte,' said Mr. Milman, 'I have brought you the pattern you wished, but I know not how I shall pay for it. I really fear I shall go to goal for it.'

'Father, father,' said the astonished girl, 'What does this mean? I would never have asked the dress, if I thought you could not afford it.'

Indeed I cannot wear it now, I am sure I could not dance a step in it. Do, dear father, take it back.'

'Oh no, Charlotte, it will perhaps look niggardly if I cannot afford you a new dress at your birth-night ball. Besides, you told me you thought you had none that would be proper for the occasion.'

'I did,' said Charlotte, blushing deeply, 'but I now remember that aunt Amelia told me so, and said the Misses Wiltons were to have new satin dresses richly trimmed with heavy pointed lace, and were to have pearls in their hair. I did not think of asking so much, but aunt said she thought I ought not to be out-shone by every one, so I made my request for the dress, which I now feel was dictated by vanity, perhaps tinctured with envy.'

'You certainly deserve the pattern, Charlotte, for this ingenuous confession, and I shall insist on your keeping it.'

'What, with the dreadful prospect of your imprisonment before me? Do not think of it, papa, indeed I cannot wear it,' and the utterance of the gentle girl was checked by tears.

'O I was desponding when I said that. Times may improve, I feel more cheerful now. Heaven certainly will bless my endeavors for the happiness of so good a child. Now dry your tears, love, and I will send aunt Amelia to you before night, and you will be all ready for the ball in good time.'

'Nay, but father, this is not necessary for my happiness. No one will love me better for this display of my father's hard earnings, and I feel that my heart must be sadly out of tune if its serenity could be disturbed by the lack of a little splendor.'

'Well, keep it, dear, at any rate, I begin to feel a sort of affection for this dress, since it has shown me the character of my child in so lovely a light.'

Mr. Milman was an industrious mechanic in a thriving village some twelve or fifteen years since, when the citizens of the empire state were liable to be furnished with solitary lodgings at the public expense, when unable or unwilling to pay their debts. His wife had been some years dead, and the expense of rearing small children was of course greatly enhanced, yet he always sustained good credit, and till within two years of the time of which we speak, he had kept an equal balance with the world. But the expenses of his family increased while his health failed by constant labor, and he saw the shadows gathering over his path, now no longer lightened by one who had been as the polar star to the wanderer on the pathless deep. Yet it was very bitter to think of adding to the weight of care that already rested on the heart of his beloved child; for since the death of her mother, she had supplied her place in so kind a manner, that they scarcely knew the loss of their maternal guardian. She was now nearly eighteen, and it was for her birthday fete that she had asked the dress.

Charlotte was walking out that evening, and overtook two little girls who were sobbing bitterly. She kindly inquired the cause of their grief, when they told her their mother was very sick, and as she could not pay the rent, the landlord would turn them from the house they lived in, the next day. They had just returned from pleading with him, but could not soften his heart. Charlotte requested to accompany them to their mother, and entering a poor looking house a little removed from the village, she saw a scene of misery that awakened the deepest sympathies of her benevolent heart. The interior was dilapidated and cheerless, seemingly destitute of every thing for comfort. On a low truckle bed lay the mother, apparently unconscious of their entrance; her raven hair strayed in disorder over her pallid brow, and the small spot of crimson upon the cheek, contrasted strangely with the sunken eye and deathly paleness of the emaciated features. The girls knelt by the couch, and kissing their mother, whispered to her that a stranger had come to see her. Charlotte approached the invalid, and tenderly inquired after her health.

'Indeed I am but poorly,' murmured the sufferer.

'Pray how long have you been ill?'

'It is two months since my health failed, but I kept on working for awhile, as I had nothing to depend upon for support but my labor. The last winter was very hard, and I was obliged to sell every thing even to my bedstead, for fuel and rent. And continual hardship reduced my strength, till a severe cold two months ago left me in this decline. God only knows,' said she, after resting a moment, 'what is to become of my poor suffering darlings. The grave will soon spread its quiet pillow for me, but they must struggle on beneath the shadow of penury's dark wing; yet I ought not to distrust the care of Him who heareth the raven's cry, and gives the young lions their food.'

'I trust you will be restored to truth and see many happy days with them yet,' said Charlotte, as she stooped to arrange the miserable pillow. 'You are hardly comfortable, my dear madam, will you allow me to send something for your use until you are better?'

'Thank you, and I sincerely thank heaven too, that one so young and beautiful has that best of all gifts, kindness of heart. But I fear there is little of comfort left me in this world.' And calling her little girls to her, she learned the failure of their mission. Charlotte tried to comfort the poor woman in her distress, and whispered words of hope, bidding her to trust on a few more days and all might be well.

'Alas,' said the poor woman, 'it is for young and untried hearts to be cheered by the illusions of hope.'

'I am young, but not altogether untried,' said Charlotte, 'and I know that despondency makes my troubles worse than they would be if sweetened with cheerfulness and hope.'

'Ah yes, but my dear girl, you never knew real sorrow. Your heart is yet young, and the world seems fresh and fair, gilded with the rainbow hues of fancy; and if a cloud overshadows your path, your eye rests only for a moment on its frowning blackness, before it revels again in the calm beauty of the azure dome that appears through some opening rift. Your heart has not become so worn and wearied by the bleak storms of adversity, as to be almost alike unheeding of the scorn or sympathy of mankind. I have suffered too much to be elated by the one, or depressed by the other. I shall soon be away from it all. For myself it is pleasant to muse upon the brighter realms that bloom in fadeless splendor beyond the dark wave of death, where sin can never breathe upon the unfolding blossoms with its withering influence, nor sorrow, disease and death, follow in its fearful train. But my poor hapless orphans, what will become of them?'

Charlotte in vain tried to soothe her grief, and begged her to compose her mind and take some refreshment. But she found there was nothing that could be nourishing to the poor invalid in this miserable abode. Here was wretchedness, real heartfelt sorrow and privation, by the very wayside of plenty and happiness; and it was unrelieved, not from want of benevolence in those around, but because a delicate pride in the poor woman had concealed her wants under a show of contentment, till the springs of life were giving way beneath the pressure of mental and bodily suffering.

Charlotte then inquired the amount due the landlord and found it to be but six dollars; and for this miserable amount the poor family were to be deprived of a home. She started for home with a sad heart reflecting upon the sufferings of those she had just left, and wishing in vain that she had some means for their relief, when on turning a corner she fell in with the fashionable Mrs. Lacy.

'Good evening, Charlotte, we were just speaking of you, and enjoying your good fortune.'

'Indeed, madam, I cannot imagine what incident of my good fortune can incite to envy, unless it be good health and spirits.'

'Well, those are certainly admirable accomplishments. Only look at Emma now; her eyes are like sunbeams in April struggling with tears, and really Charlotte, you look somewhat tender eyed yourself. Pray what caused those mists that gleam upon your eye-lashes my dear?' and Mrs. Lacy smiled complacently at her sentimental effort.

'Only the power of sympathy' said Charlotte, 'but what can be the matter with Emma? With such an abundance of fortune's favors, and such indulgent parents, I cannot divine the cause of her sorrow.'

'O she is very unhappy at her disappointment. We have tried in every shop for a satin dress, but you have the last pattern that was in the village, and there is no time now to send away as your party comes on so soon.'

'That is small cause of sorrow,' said Charlotte, 'I am sure I would relinquish mine without a tear.'

'Well, you are an excellent girl, really, and if you would sell it to me I would give you a good bargain. But then you would not, I am sure, for there is a rich gentleman come to the village, and bought the widow Morton's farm, and he will be invited of course.'

'Of course,' said Charlotte, smiling 'but what of that? It can be no concern of his whether I am poorly or richly clad. Rich people are generally too well satisfied with themselves to notice the garb of a poor girl like me.'

'Well if you are willing to part with it, I will give you twelve dollars, the price of the pattern and two dollars beside for your kindness in obliging Emma. The misses Wilton are determined on producing an effect, and it would be really mortifying to see them so completely eclipse Emma, and before strangers too.'

'I am not the only one,' thought Charlotte, 'whose vanity leads to folly and extravagance.' The bargain was soon made, and Emma regaining her speech with the gratification of her vanity, gave Charlotte a thousand thanks for her kindness, and bidding each other good evening, they retired to their homes, one to dream of her splendid ball-dress and anticipated conquest, and the other to rejoice in possessing the means of comforting the dying widow and orphan children.

The next day dawned brightly and Charlotte arose with a glad heart, and preparing the morning's meal in haste, she sallied forth in pursuit of her benevolent purpose. She thought the sun had never shone so sweetly before, and the beams that strayed through the shrubbery as she crossed a little stream on her way, seemed dancing gaily on the grass plot, as playing at bo-peep among the beautiful flowers, and the brook itself had never rang its chimes so musically before. She did not know that the wires which gave forth all this melody were vibrating in her own heart; and that gratified benevolence was the seraph-minstrel whose magic touch was thrilling the silvery cords, whose mysterious music-tones are but stray notes—detached chimes of that anthem, whose full, harmonial symphonies roll ever from the angelic harps that surround the throne of Eternal Majesty, whose eye of love is never clouded or dim; but surveys with equal care the vast and ponderous globes which wheel their circling marches through the unknown realms of trackless space, and the frail children of his bounty who bloom, and fade, and die, in this diminutive portion of his domains.

Charlotte rapped lightly at the door, and was admitted by a lovely, intelligent looking girl, on whose features rested a shade of sadness; but it seemed so blended with un murmuring patience, that the beholder could not fail to perceive the young spirit had been moulded under the influences of those principles that kindle the undying flame upon the innermost shrine of the heart; the pure altar-fire of love and devotion, which, purging the soul from the dross of false pride and undue ambition, teaches it to look for happiness where alone it can be found, namely, in the paths of virtue and piety. The poor woman had passed a restless night, and was much exhausted, and it would seem that Charlotte had anticipated this, for she had brought some cordial and refreshments. After partaking of some nourishment, the sick one was able to sit up a little, and thank her visitor for her kind attention. 'Heaven has bestowed upon you a kind heart,' said she, 'may you never feel its warm affections crushed by the heartlessness of a selfish world, or blighted by the chill blast of penury and desolation.'

The lady, whose name was Warner, informed Charlotte that she was a widow. They had formerly possessed a good property, but her husband had sold all, and gone to the far West, where he purchased a large tract of land, and had commenced improvements preparatory to moving his family there, when he became a victim to the fevers of the climate. Mrs. Warner wrote frequently, but could learn nothing satisfactory, and finally received a letter informing her that the title under which her husband purchased was not good; so she was left penniless to struggle along life's thorny way, with none to protect her save Him who is the orphan's father, and widow's God. 'I am now alone in the world save these young orphans,' said the mother, as she put back the tresses from the fair brows of the little girls who were kneeling by her side. Tears of joy glistened on Charlotte's face, as she bestowed on the sufferer her gift, and saw the expression of gratitude enliven her pallid features.

'You are an angel of mercy,' said the suffering one, as the warm blood rose even to her marble brow. 'Language is too poor to speak the emotions of the grateful heart. I can never repay you, but He who planted in your heart the principles of active benevolence, will be ever near you to shed upon your spirit the radiance of love.'

Having arranged every thing for the comfort of the poor woman, as far as circumstances would admit, Charlotte returned home promising to call again soon.

A few evenings after this saw a joyous party assembled at Mr. Milman's, in honor of his daughter's birth-day. We need not stop to describe the decorations, or illumination of the house, for at the time of which we are speaking the rage for display, and maintaining the just rank in ostentatious luxuries had not attained its medium height. But as every one loved Charlotte for her unpretending goodness, they were not the less happy to tender their homage to her this evening, as queen of the festivities. The Misses Wilton were there splendidly attired, their fine auburn tresses beautifully contrasting with the costly gems that sparkled amid their dark glossy luxuriance; and we will not say that Charlotte's vanity did not give her a slight twinge as Mrs. Lacy entered with her languishing daughter, who might pass for a very handsome girl, had not every feature betrayed the studied effort at producing effect. But, poor girl, she dared not smile, except as her mother had taught her to train her pretty phiz before a mirror, which sometimes made the smile too late to appear quite natural. She almost gave way to a sigh of regret as she looked upon her splendid ball dress, and queried in her mind as to what her father would say to her when he saw her in plain muslin; but Mrs. Lacy at the same time sighed quite audibly, and turning to Charlotte, asked if Mr. Elmer were not to be of her party. 'I do not know,' said she, 'is he not here? I presume papa invited him.' The dance had been some time begun when a plain, but elegantly dressed gentleman entered the room, and after the usual ceremonies, took a proffered seat beside Mrs. Lacy, with whom he was slightly acquainted, she having managed to procure herself an introduction to him, since his recent abode in the village.

'Who is that beautiful girl in the dance,' inquired Mr. Elmer, after a pause in conversation, 'that one, so simply attired in plain muslin, with the white rose in her hair? She seems the personification of cheerful goodness.'

'That is Miss Milman,' said the superfine lady, biting her lip with vexation. 'Emma, my love, will you take the fan? The heat is oppressive, I do not wonder you declined dancing.'

The tutored damsel bowed and smiled languidly, and by mere chance raised her beautiful eyes with deliberate timidity to the gaze of the stranger. It was plain from Mrs. L.'s satisfied look, that he regarded her with admiration, for she was really a lovely girl. But his gaze was soon carelessly withdrawn, as if those features lacked some lustre of expression that might radiate upon the mirror he carried in his heart. He was a noble looking man, in the prime of manhood. The expansive brow was finely marked, and his eye was the mirror of all the noble qualities that dwelt in his breast. Calm, clear, and discriminating, it looked to the face divine, for the delineation of the soul. A shade, approaching to sadness, rested on his features. He had returned to his native land after a long absence, to find the household hearth deserted, and his once happy circle of relatives dead, or dispersed he knew not where. We acknowledge he was in search of a wife, even as the sagacious Mrs. Lacy had divined; but he sought not wealth or superficial accomplishments, but a true, kind heart, on which his own might repose its cares, and lavish its wealth of affection. Just as the self-satisfied Mrs. L. had begun to congratulate herself upon the certainty of Emma's producing an impression upon the rich stranger, he remarked, 'It is long since I have danced, but I have a great mind to join the fantastic measure. May I presume upon your favor for an introduction to Miss Milman?' It was with ill concealed chagrin that she presented him to Charlotte, and saw him lead the dance with her, plainly clad as she was, while her own petted idol was left to languish in her well-worn delicacy of appearance. The truth was, her mask was too exquisite not to excite suspicion, every motion, and look so guarded, one would have thought 'her very pulses beat by book.'

The evening passed in mirth and hilarity, and an early hour saw all parties quietly seeking that repose which is as necessary after enjoyment as labor.

'I wonder where Charlotte can be going?' said Mrs. Lacy, as she was fanning herself in Mrs. Wilton's parlor, at sunset, a few days after the party. 'I see her passing every day, at about the same hour. I should hardly think she could find time to leave work every day to ramble, being so penurious as she is.'

'Penurious,' said Mrs. Wilton, 'I thought her a generous hearted girl. I believe she is the only one who could fulfill the arduous duties of her station.'

'I know she is sadly tied to drudgery, poor thing; perhaps that may be an excuse for her miserly turn. Why, do you know her father bought her a satin dress for her birth-day gift, and as I was regretting that I could get none for Emma, she offered me hers for an advance upon cost of two dollars.'

'That argues a singular lack of taste in one of her age,' said Mrs. Wilton, 'but what could she want of money?'

'What does any miser want of money but to look at? I should be sorry to see my Emma so devoid of sentiment as to sell the gift of her parents.' It so happened that Mr. Elmer was enjoying a social chat with Mr. Wilton at the farther part of the room, yet he evidently heard the conversation, as it was intended he should.

A shade of painful dissatisfaction passed over his fine features for a moment, for he could not but perceive that malice dictated her speech. And it produced a contrary effect from what she intended, for it awakened in him a slight interest in behalf of Charlotte, as he wished to know what secret cause existed for this display of unkind feeling. He was, however, a stranger, and could not hope to learn the text book of the school of scandal at present.

'I am told there is a desolate lady near the village,' said the apothecary, one day, as he entered a store, 'who is suffering severely from want and disease. Indeed it is thought she is near death.'

'And are there none to relieve her wants?' asked Mr. Elmer, with surprise.

'She has no friends that I know of,' said the prim apothecary, who prided himself upon having the most refined and sentimental daughter in the village; for Mrs. Lacy had often prefaced her demands for money with the information that Emma's taste was so refined, and her mind so exceedingly sensitive, that she positively could not bear contradiction.

'No friends!' exclaimed Mr. Elmer, 'will you please to direct me to her residence?'

Mr. Lacy, with a somewhat mortified air, gave him the direction, and he started in pursuit of the victims of poverty. He rapped at the miserable abode, and was admitted by a lovely girl upon whom he gazed with more than ordinary interest for a moment, and then took a proffered seat. The little girl retired to another room, and soon Miss Anna Wilton came out and passed the compliments of the morning.

'I am glad to find myself preceded by an angel of mercy to this place. Will you be so kind as to make use of this, for the benefit of the poor woman?' said Mr. Elmer, as he handed her his purse.

'I fear, sir,' said the lady, 'that money can avail little with her. We had the advice of a physician this morning, and he thinks she can survive but a short time.'

'Is the sick woman a friend of yours?' asked Mr. Elmer.

'I have never seen her, sir, till within a few days, except at church.'

A low moan from the inner room caught their ear, and Anna hastened to the bedside of the sufferer. Just then Mr. Elmer took up a well worn Bible that lay on the table, and on opening to the records, read with uncontrollable emotion first the marriage of his parents, then the birth of Lucy Elmer, and five years later the birth of Frederick Elmer. Upon another leaf was the marriage of Geo. W. Warner to Lucy Elmer. He stepped to the door and in great agitation desired to speak with Miss Wilton. 'What is the name of this poor woman?' gasped he.

'It is Warner, sir. But Mr. Elmer, are you ill? You look deadly pale.'

'God of heaven,' said he, sinking into a chair 'she is my sister, my only sister,' and the strong man bowed his head and wept like a child. 'Tell her I have come,' said he, after a few moments, 'tell her, her brother waits to see her, gently as you can, lest it should overcome her.'

Kindly as possible the gentle girl informed Mrs. Warner of her brother's return. For awhile she seemed scarcely to comprehend her, but soon her eye flashed with unusual radiance. 'What did you say?' she almost shrieked, 'did you say Frederick had come back?'

He rushed into the room, and knelt by the low bed. 'Indeed I have come, Lucy, and your own brother shall cheer and protect you from all sorrow that human aid can avert.' She looked with wild intenseness into his face for a moment, and murmuring 'It is he!' fell fainting upon her pillow. Long and heavy was her swoon, and when she revived a little, she faintly inquired, 'Has not Charlotte come yet? Has the only friend of my loneliness deserted me?'

'She cannot come to-day,' said Anna, 'for her little brother is sick. But here is your brother, Mrs. Warner, he is holding your hand.'

'Lucy, Lucy, can you not speak to me?' said the agonized brother. She raised her languid eyes to him, and returned his pressure feebly; but strange shadows were gathering over that loved face; the eye grew dim as it gazed—one flash passed over the pallid features—the smile was chilled by a fearful pang; a shudder, a faint gasp for breath, and all was over. Frederick Elmer held the hand of his sister's corpse.

The neighbors were immediately summoned, and the last sad offices for the dead performed. The poor little orphans wept sadly, and could not be comforted, until their kind benefactor came in, when they ran to her, and mingled their tears with hers. They had known no other friend but her, for their mother had not resided long in the town, where she came in order to get needle-work; and it is well known the poor make few acquaintances. It was a sad day for Mr. Elmer, when the grave closed over his much loved sister. He had left his early home for wealth, he had obtained it; and the first draft that was made upon it after his return to his native land was for the burial of the sister who had been his guide and companion.

* * * * *

Mr. Elmer took the children to his own home, but he learned soon that little girls are a sad plague to a bachelor. They would run away, and he was obliged very often to go to Mr. Milman's to fetch them home. At last the idea occurred to him, that it would save time, if he could persuade Charlotte to come and live with them altogether. Elated with this sagacious thought, he called one fine evening, and requested Mr. Milman to walk with him. Anna Wilton was there, and gave him a most mischievously intelligent look. She had told him the story of Charlotte's sacrifice, and hinted to him at the time, her suspicions that another dress must be had, and that his purse must pay the bill.

She was right; for in less than a year, Charlotte stood the blushing and beautiful bride of Frederick Elmer. She had caught the 'rich gentleman,' as Mrs. Lacy called him, without fishing for him. And he obtained what was of more value than riches, a kind and sympathizing wife.

A Sketch.

THE noonday heat had passed. The tender flowers,
From which the scorching sun had drawn the strength,
Turned their bright faces to the summer sky,
While every tiny leaf and bursting bud,
Seemed to speak blessings on the cooling breeze.

We could not linger 'neath a man made roof,
But wandered out in the cerulean air,
Where God's own azure heaven bowed o'er our heads,
And the rich carpet which his hand had spread,
Lay in elastic softness 'neath our feet.
Anon the breeze would gather all its might,
And with its wild, free finger shake the boughs,
And stir the tasseled grain, while we as oft
Imagined 'twas some angel sent to breathe
The growing essence through all growing things.

We rambled on until our feet were stayed
From farther progress, by the foamy deep.
But we had reached a spot we would not leave.
An old decaying fort, which brought to mind
Days long since passed away—the cannon's roar,
The flashing steel, and anxious face of him
Who loved his country's rights far more than life.
We sought a height that overlooked the sea,
And gazed delighted on each swelling wave;
Nor knew we one dark cloud was resting near,

Until the large warm drops fell round our feet.
 We found a shelter from the searching rain,
 And listened to it as it fleetly fell.
 The bold old rocks received it cold and stern,
 But the young plant a softer welcome gave;
 And the dry earth the sparkling water drank
 As eagerly as one drinks of the brook,
 Whose lips are parched by days of want severe.
 Soon it danced lazily from out the sky,
 And ceased at length. Again we sallied forth
 Unto our favorite spot; and when 'twas gained,
 Such wondrous beauty burst upon our view!
 The sun's bright rays had mingled with the drops
 That fell afar, and formed a glorious arch
 Of such magnificence, it seemed too grand
 For man to see with unanointed eyes.
 Another lay upon the ocean's breast,
 Softer in color, but as pure and fair,
 Making a circle all so heavenly bright,
 I e'en forgot 'twas earth whereon I stood.

Father! if e'er I felt thy presence near,
 If e'er I felt thy glory, or thy might,
 'Twas at that holy time! The power of speech
 Was gone. All I could do was gaze and love,
 To wonder and admire the type of peace.
 We watched it, till had faded every hue,
 Then turned our feet toward our happy home.

O! if sad doubts of overruling power
 E'er fill my mind, I'll think of that bright scene,
 And they will vanish, e'en as angry frowns
 From off the brow on which kind love doth smile.

Feminine Virtues.

BY REV. T. J. TENNEY.

As society is a polisher of manners, and good conversation elevates the mind, it should be the object of the members of the little parties that assemble to while away an hour or two, to select such topics for conversation, as will be most likely to engage the attention of the company individually, and thus profit each by the continued or occasional sparks of intellect that will be evolved in reciprocally instructing and being instructed. The all absorbing object of living should be improvement;—the day is lost, as far as the improvement of the mind is concerned, that gives not an addition to our knowledge; and how much worse than lost is a day spent in scandalizing the image of God!

If you please, reader, you may consider me as one in the parties of which I have spoken; and I will entertain you, very humbly, in the introduction of some of the duties of the class to whom I am to address myself. It will be understood that I cannot embody many of these in a single article.

The sphere of female action is not like that of man;—man's acting place is the world; woman acts around the domestic hearth,—man moves in the rough and rugged paths of life; woman delights more in the retirement of 'Home, sweet, sweet home;' when the sound of war is heard, man flies to the field of danger; woman prays for the olive of peace,—when man is wielding the sword for the fame of heroes; woman is enkindling freedom's spirit in the hearts of her children, that they may give it to such as merit the praise of freemen. 'The influence of woman commences with man's existence, and throughout his whole career, however diversified, he is never dissolved from it—commencing at the cradle, it terminates only at the grave. The domestic circle is its fountain head, from whence its streams flow throughout all the various ramifications of society. * * * There her peculiar qualities and powers are developed—there she commences the exercise of that sway, which, for good or evil, is sensibly felt in the world at large—there she begins those lessons which will affect those to whom they are addressed, either beneficially or injuriously, while earthly life shall endure.'

How indispensable it is then, that our young women imbibe a great deal of knowledge. I have sometimes thought that about one half of the time spent in school was in unlearning what we have mislearned in our fire-side conversation. If the mother is ignorant, it would be wonderful, if her offspring did not copy her ungraceful and undignified way of talking. It is from the mother too, that our children get those superstitious fears which embitter a great many of the hours of life. From an ignorance of means to govern her little ones, she has resorted to hob-goblins, and old-harries, and old-nicks, and fairies, and witches and bears, until the child thinks the earth and air are full of them. I would rather have a child of mine nursed as it is said Romulus and Remus were, than be instructed by such a woman.

But when I urge young women to get knowledge, I am met with objections. Fontenelle said, 'Women have a fibre more in the heart, and a cell less in the brain than men.' By a cell less in the brain, the writer would have us understand that females are not capacitated to receive such an extensive education as males. This is all assertion. It is indeed true, however, that the female sex is not so generally educated, at present, as the other, for the very obvious reason, they have not had the same privileges of attending to the cultivation of their minds. It was a maxim of our great grand fathers and great grand mothers, that if girls knew how to milk, spin and mend well, they were amply qualified for married life; and this opinion is more or less cherished in this enlightened age. Let this be taken away, (and it will be,) give young women the same chance of young men, and we should soon see whether they deserve the application of Fontenelle's remark. Mrs. Moore, Mrs. Norton, Mrs. Hemans and Mrs. Sigourney are examples, among many others, of what women are capable of doing. And do not be blinded with regard to the importance of learning. For if it be true that young women are sometimes taken for idols, beauty fades, and the spirit of idolatry must die with its fading idol! I must desire my fair readers 'to give a proper direction to their passion for being admired; in order to which, they must endeavor to make themselves the objects of a reasonable and lasting admiration. This is not to be hoped for from beauty, or dress, or fashion, but from those inward ornaments which are not to be defaced by time or sickness, and which appear most amiable to those who are most acquainted with them.' 'It is an old remark, that the most beautiful women are not always the most fascinating. It may be added, I fear, that they are seldom so. They are apt to rely too much on their beauty; to give themselves too many airs. Mere beauty ever was, and ever will be, a secondary thing, except with the simple. The most fascinating women, are those that possess the finest powers of entertaining the mind. In a particular and attaching sense, they are those that can partake of the pleasures and pains of their friends in the liveliest and most devoted manner.'

'Mind, mind alone, bear witness earth and heaven,
The living fountain in itself contains
Of beauteous and sublime! Here hand in hand
Sit paramount the graces.'

True wisdom implies the presence of humility, by which I understand, freedom from pride. Many a family has been ruined by an excess of pride—by an aping disposition to follow the fashions. Such a disposition cannot be too severely spoken of. A plain dress, suited to the season is all that nature demands, and our pride ought to be satisfied with it. But when I say a plain dress, I mean a neat one—I would not encourage a slovenly appearance. The safest advice, however, is, that we dress according to our situation and business. There is such a thing as 'living within the means, up to the means and beyond the means;' and in tyro language, the first would be prudent, the second, less than prudent, and the third, much worse than the second. There is also, a way of dressing to the season and out of it, the first of which ought only to be indulged. And if my readers will allow it, I will say that these remarks are not exclusively for young ladies—wherever the evil exists, the remedy is needed.

It has been said by a traveler, 'that women in all countries, are civil and obliging, tender and humane: that they are ever inclined to be gay and cheerful, timorous and modest; and that they do not hesitate, like men, to perform a generous action. Not haughty, nor arrogant, nor supercilious, they are full of courtesy, and fond of society; more liable in general to err than man, but in general also more virtuous, and performing more good actions, than he. To a woman, whether civilized or savage, I never addressed myself, in the language of decency and friendship, without receiving a decent and friendly answer. With man it has often been otherwise. In wandering over the barren plains of inhospitable Denmark, through honest Sweden and frozen Lapland, rude and churlish Finland, unprincipled Russia, and the wide spread regions of the wandering Tartar; if hungry, dry, cold, wet, or sick, the women have ever been friendly to me, and uniformly so. And add to this virtue, so worthy the appellation of benevolence, their actions have been performed in so free and kind a manner, that if I was dry, I drank the sweetest draught, and if hungry, I ate the coarsest morsel, with a double relish.' What is so well, and I doubt not truly, said of the uncultivated part of the female race, is a praise that I hope may be merited and extended to those who are permitted to add to their virtues the refinements of knowledge. Merit will, must be rewarded, whether it be under the roof of the most humble cottage, or in the palace—whether in silks, or the coarse garments that have been woven by the hands of poverty. When I say rewarded, I do not mean that it always comes to receive the praise of men—there is a rewarder within us, which, when a day is well spent, or a deed well done, applauds the actor. It is more than the praise of men, it is the voice of God. Pride seeks the former, humility the latter—pride would be flattered, humility is contented with the consciousness of having done well—pride rises by outward appearance, humility by her inner virtues.

'Of all the causes which conspire to blind
Man's erring judgment, and misguide the mind,
What the weak head with strongest bias rules,
Is pride, the never failing vice of fools:'

but blessed are the meek—there is a blessing accompanying the humble, and let them be where they will, they feel it.

But meekness cannot be sustained without the aid of religion. Religion beautifies the female character, and makes life a miniature of heaven. I should think I had but half done my duty, did I pass this part of my article without a particular notice. This is not only due the subject for its plain bearing on the welfare of young women, but I may add, it is highly probable, the young women to whom I write, will be wives, and every wife should be qualified to teach the young mind the perfections of God. First impressions are the most lasting; and there are but few of us who have any idea of the immense amount of evil that arises from an inattention to the giving of the child the right kind of information. Early should the benevolence of the Almighty be impressed upon the mind which is yet unstained with error. This is the duty of the mother, but alas, how many mothers neglect it! When there is every thing immediately before us, around us and above us, by which they might illustrate the love of God, how often are these chances neglected! But I am told they have determined to let the child grow up and take such instruction as it pleases. Suppose I have a farm—but I need not suppose, for here is Mr. C. who actually has one, and has prepared a piece of it for sowing—it is all nicely fixed, but he won't sow it. I ask him, why? 'Why?' says he, 'I have determined to wait, and let it take such seed as it is disposed to.' And what kind of seed do you think it will take? Do we not know enough of such matters to lead us to the conclusion that there will be a million of weeds to a grain of wheat? So it may be with the young mind—some kind of impressions it will receive, and would it not be better to see that they are good ones, that the harvest may be good? Many a mother has wept over the fallen son,—and why did he fall? I can tell you, reader,—she determined to let him grow up as he pleased, do as he pleased, and he pleased to break a fond—too fond—mother's heart. Let this mistaken notion of parental duty be banished forever. But I have wandered from what is, to the giving of instruction in a probable case. Let me urge the readers of this communication, then, to frequent and attentive examinations of the Bible. Above all books this is the most important. I would not oppose the reading of good literature, but the Bible should have the first place in your spare hours for the purpose of reading. If you would live well, the important way to do it is in the Bible. If you would be valued far above rubies, be guided by the Bible. If you would make the morning of life a cloudless one—if you would lessen the stings of adversity, and take, from the pillow of the sick bed, its sorrow—if you would respect yourselves and be respected by others—if you would make a blessed beginning, a blessed middle and a blessed end; or in other words, if you would rise well and come down to the grave like a shock of corn fully ripe in its season, cherish, above all things, the hope of the Bible. As Mary who anointed the feet of Jesus was,

'Such be the dames who grace the storied page:
Life's guiding lamp they hand from age to age,
Assert their sex beyond the loftiest pen,
And live on tongues and reign in hearts of men.'

Album Dedication.

I've seen a withered rose leaf lay
Beside a braided curl,
Dearer to one fond heart than e'er
Was diamond, gem, or pearl.

It decked a rose that bloomed the hour
Her lovely infant died!
She plucked it off, and then a curl,
And laid them side by side.

And hath not love a magic power
To hallow what it will?
And can it not with precious things
This beauteous volume fill?

Aye, that it can; and now for thee
I consecrate the book,
Forbidding all but friendship's eyes
To on its pages look.

Like dew-drops to a fading flower
Be all the offerings given,— Imparting life, and drawing out
Its fragrance unto heaven.

Then all of earthly love shall teach
Of Him who rests in love,—
Who made the human heart for bliss,
And glorious life above.

An Hour by the Sea-side.

'COME, Irene, let us go down to the sea-side.
We cannot pass an hour more pleasantly, I had almost said more profitably.'

This was addressed to me by one who was once my schoolmate, and is now my sympathizing, faithful friend. It rarely happens that the companions of the school-room become friends in after years. They part at the portals of the temple of learning and go out into the world, to form new ties and gather new associations, till a sort of dreamy charm lingers around the past, and its scenes blend into a picture, indistinct indeed, but precious in memory. Occasionally this early attachment outlives the circumstances which gave it birth, and gains strength and beauty from continued existence. Such was the affection that found root in my heart, when, from among my numerous classmates, I selected Irene and affectionately called her cousin. The feeling was mutual, and now that we have passed from childhood, we turn to each other for sympathy and advice, with the same confidence that marked our early intercourse. I think I love her better now, for I can appreciate her worth. In her character, imagination, brilliant indeed and soaring, was taught to fold its wings and seek repose at the bidding of her clear, calm judgment. She had arrived to pass a few days with me in a beautiful sea-port town, but her presence caused me grief as well as pleasure. Her cheek was paler than formerly, her eyes shone with a fitful lustre, and her form, once round and full, now attenuated to extreme delicacy.

We soon found our way to the beach where wave after wave came up like serried columns, and bowed before their immovable antagonist. We stood for a long time in silence, fully possessed by the wild sublimity of the scene, and equally unwilling to intrude human language where the Almighty seemed holding converse with his glorious creation. At length we seated ourselves upon an elevated rock, and Irene spoke with an impassioned eloquence. Her heart-treasured narrative impressed me so forcibly that even now I cannot recall it, without a thrill of deep emotion. If possible I will do justice to her words, but her face, I cannot picture that here, and it told half the tale.

‘Helen, I loved the ocean once with an enthusiasm to which words cannot do justice. The restless heave of its waters, the gathering of its forces as if for battle, the waves fretted into foam by the ungentle wind, the bird that dipped its delicate wing in the crystal flood, the ship that gave out its white wings as if in triumph for its freedom,—all these were objects of the deepest interest, or I should rather say of wild, passionate love. I have spent weeks upon the sea-coast watching the advance and retreat of the unnumbered waves, and giving my soul to their bewitching influence, till I longed for a home far down in their unvisited caverns, and prayed that at last, I might be buried in their depths, with no dirge but their unceasing anthem. I forgot the sweet green wood where hand in hand we used to wander and gather fresh flowers for our teacher’s desk. I forgot the home music of the untamed bird, and the dark recesses of the tangled underbrush, where nature seemed to have reserved a quiet nook, but which opened before us as though we had been priestesses in the great temple. I forgot all these or ceased to pine for them, and became a worshiper of the unfathomable ocean. It was my lot to become acquainted with one who had made the sea-coast his home for a long period of his life. His familiarity with its sublimity and terror had by no means weakened his love for it. With such a companion in my erratic rambles, is it strange that my love for them increased? Let me briefly describe the friend who first awakened other feelings than friendship. He was my beau ideal of a gentleman. I dare not draw a faithful portrait, or you would say imagination lent its colors to complete the picture. He was tall enough to suit even your ideas of manly beauty, but his height was relieved by good proportions. He was not vain of his rich, dark hair, or glistening teeth, and his mildly brilliant eye won confidence and affection. Could you look into my heart, you would see his portrait there, but not on the lofty shrine where it once rested. It has been laid aside, all unfaded to be sure, to make way for another. His mind was a rich mine of poetic thought, his reverence for holy things unfeigned and earnest, and a long acquaintance with the world had matured a judgment of no inferior natural power. Our intercourse was free and kind, and insensibly I had erected an altar in my heart and placed him upon it. Circumstances and inclination threw us constantly together, and when at the end of a few weeks we parted, I felt that I had given my heart unasked, and I believed that I had received one in return. A few letters passed between us, and then all was silence, and conjecture ran wild as to the cause. A dark, threatening cloud hung over my soul’s horizon, and the world that had once been so joyous—so full of flowers, ceased to charm. I felt that he was lost to me, and expect-tation was fast dying in despair. I strove, in a continual round of duties and pleasures to banish vain regrets, and I succeeded.'

'The cause of this whimsical conduct is still unfathomable, but its ministry was for good. It gently unwound the chain which had been gathering about my heart, because it lessened the esteem with which I had regarded him. The gorgeous dream, too bright for earth's accomplishment, had ceased to bewilder and dazzle me. I returned to my old occupations, subdued in spirits, but cheerful and trusting still.'

'At times, the memory of those past and unclouded hours full of deep, unmeasured, and inexpressible joy, arising from the consciousness of possessing the sympathy of a gifted yet congenial spirit, comes with prevailing power to mar the Eden of the present. Since my first and only disappointment, I have loved and been beloved. Calm, tender and holy in their strength, are the affections that now twine around their object. They are founded on esteem, and therefore, I trust, permanent. In a few months I shall meet at the altar one who has become very precious. When first he sought to win me, I shrunk from the idea of a second love; but O, Helen! constancy and perseverance will accomplish much. I shall never again love the ocean as I have done—it is too intimately connected with my heart's only sorrow. I half fancy it knows my secret, and again, as in the unsullied hours of childhood I turn to the wild wood path, the fragrant flowers and the sweet choristers of nature. Helen, may you never know the agony of blighted hopes. The tide of affection thrown back on itself, scorches and lays waste the green places of the heart. Should you be so unfortunate, remember your Irene loved after having conquered her first misplaced attachment. Let us return, for the shades of evening gather. Betray not my confidence, nor forget the moral of my confession.'

'The succeeding summer I visited Irene at her own sweet home. It was a beautiful cottage, a few miles from the metropolis, furnished with elegance, but without ostentation, and surrounded by exuberant shrubbery. The avenue leading to the house, was arched by the interlacing branches of the yielding elm, while over the porch at the door drooped graceful willows. My friend bounded along the path to meet me, and was followed, with a more stately motion, by her husband, whom I had never before seen. He was one of nature's noblemen—I saw it at a glance—and an hour had hardly elapsed before I forgot Irene's 'only disappointment.' Truly the noble mind has resources within itself against the hour of trial, and my delicate, confiding friend was greater than Napoleon with the crown of empires, for she ruled her own spirit.

The Choice of a Partner.

TO MY FRIEND MISS M. W.

CHOOSE not thy partner from among
The high and proud of earth;—
Perchance in humbler mind may dwell
More pure, exalted worth.

Seek not for talents high and great,
Seek not for beauteous form,
But seek for one whose mind doth glow
With truth and friendship warm.

The flatterer may not have the power
To charm thee with his art,
For thou'lt not trust his wily words,
But spurn his faithless heart.

Choose one industrious, prudent, mild,
With mind and morals pure,
One who will love thee as himself,
But love his Maker more.

The Autumn Walk.

THE bleak month of November has arrived—too soon to those whose best life is in the summer, but in the right time to Him who ordereth the seasons with unerring wisdom. The first approaches of the stern days are the most difficult to contend with, as they are felt the most, and we do not wish to rivet the conviction that winter is near. We are apt to let duties pass, which have important relations to the future, and leave undone, till too late, what prudence suggests should be done. We need a voice to impress us with the importance of present activity, that in all things—in our minds, in our homes, and in our business, we may be ready for the darker days, and have in store all that we can treasure up for the best improvement and enjoyment of winter. The parent should school the child early to this important rule; and as affording hints thereto, as well as being profitable to us all, the following tale is offered. Read it, mother, and give it to thy child, as a simple story with an eloquent moral.

B.

'It was on a cold November day, when the wind was whistling through the naked branches of the trees, that little Anne Wilson was sitting on a low seat, by her grandmother's side, busily engaged in sewing, and enjoying the warmth of a good fire, whose cheerful blaze seemed to enliven every thing in the room.

'Now this was the very situation that Anne liked better than any other she could think of; her grandmother was so good and kind, so cheerful and sensible, that when she was willing to talk to her, it was Anne's greatest delight to listen; and as she was rather a timid, thoughtful little girl, more fond of sitting still, to read, or work, than of noisy play, she was happier at this moment, than if she had been surrounded by children of her own age.

'Their conversation was soon interrupted by the entrance of a messenger, bringing a note to Anne's grandmother, which made her look very thoughtful and serious. I wonder what it can be about, thought little Anne—but she did not ask, for she had been taught not to ask impertinent questions. While she was thinking about it, her aunt came into the room, and her grandmother said to her, "I have just had a note from Mr. Smith; he tells me that poor Beckey is suffering from one of those terrible rheumatic attacks; he wants medicine for her immediately, but the man does not return till night, and he had no one else to send. I cannot bear to have the poor woman so long without relief, but what can we do? we have nobody to send."

'Little Anne thought about what her grandmother had said, and wished that she could go, but she had not quite courage enough to propose it; it was a greater distance than she had ever walked before, and the weather was so disagreeable.

'The thought, however, seemed to strike her grandmother at the same moment, for she said in that inspiring animated tone which seems to make all labor light—"Why, here is our little Anne! why should not she go? It will do her good to take a run this cold day, and I know she will be glad to comfort poor Beckey and please Mr. Smith."

'Anne's aunt shook her head, as if she thought this was rather too much for such a little girl. Anne was but eight years old, and the distance was three miles, through a very barren, desolate country. But Anne jumped up from her little seat, ashamed to seem unwilling to undertake anything which her grandmother thought she could do, and said, "O yes! I can go as well as not. But, aunt, have you got the medicine to send?"

"Yes; you shall have that directly. Wrap yourself up warm, and the quicker you go the less you will feel the cold, and the sooner poor Beckey's pain will be relieved."

'Beckey Johnson was an excellent, faithful old servant, who had often been very kind to Anne. Mr. Smith, her master, was an author and a philosopher, a man of taste and information, whom Anne had always regarded with reverence; for her grandmother loved and respected him, and this was proof enough to her of his goodness and wisdom.

'Anne set off, therefore, feeling that the errand was a very important one. It required all her strength to keep up against the cold wind, which swept over the high sandy plain she was crossing; and there was nothing very pleasant to see, only that she could not help smiling, as she passed by a farm-yard, to observe a number of half starved cattle, and bright, various colored barn-door fowls all huddled together on the sunny side of a high stone wall, which sheltered them a little from the wind, looking very patient, and as if they thought it could not blow so violently all day.

'Yet her own reflections made the little girl very happy; she thought that she had never been able to make herself so useful before; and as she found it was possible to get on in spite of the wind, every blast that beat against her gave her pleasure in the thought that she was capable of doing a difficult thing, though she was but young; and thinking of the object of her walk, made her very brave and regardless of the cold; she knew that though her fingers ached, her kind friend Beckey was in much greater pain, which could, perhaps, be removed by her means. Perhaps she thought a little of the pleasure and approbation Mr. Smith would express when he saw her; and if she did, it was quite natural, and what any little girl might have felt who was making such an exertion.

'At last she reached the top of the hill, and looked down on the beautiful valley where Mr. Smith's house was situated. It was a delightful scene in spring, when the woods were filled with little birds, building their nests and singing their sweet songs; when the river was murmuring between its green banks, and every bush and tree was putting forth buds and blossoms; it was delightful in summer, when the fields were waving with grain, and the village children were plucking the ripe blackberries from the vines; it was pleasant even in winter, when the trees were all adorned with glittering icicles, or feathered with soft snow flakes, when the lively sleigh bells were heard on the hill, and the children were skating on the river, or coasting down the sloping bank. But now, it was all bleak and barren, the river was of a dull gray color, like the sky above it; the trees were all leafless; there were no birds or squirrels to be seen, and if Anne had not seen the smoke curling up from the chimney of Mr. Smith's house, she would almost have fancied that there was no living thing in the whole valley. She did not stop, however, to think much about it, but full of the thought of relieving Beckey, and anxious to reach the house, she hastened down the hill, and soon found herself in the sick room.

'The poor woman was stretched upon the bed, in too much pain to take notice of Anne. The philosopher, dressed in a flannel gown, was sitting at the foot of the bed; the room was darkened, and everything looked very dismal to little Anne. Mr. Smith was very glad to get the medicine, but he seemed to think very little about the messenger; his attention was entirely taken up by the sickness and sufferings of his faithful domestic. He had no children of his own, and he knew and thought very little about them: he was better acquainted with the natural history of every little insect that fluttered in the sunbeam, than with the feelings or capacities of children; otherwise he would have loved them, for he who loves flowers, and butterflies, and birds, will surely love innocent and good humored children, if he thinks of them with the same attention. At first Anne felt disappointed; but in an instant she subdued this selfish feeling; and when she looked at poor Beckey, and thought how much she must suffer to change her kind and cheerful countenance into such an expression of distress, her heart rejoiced at the thought that she might be relieved and comforted by the medicine she had brought, and she did not wonder that Mr. Smith, who had been watching by her all night, should be thinking of Beckey, and feeling for her too much, to have much thought or attention to give to herself.

'Anne sat a little while to warm and rest herself, and then sat out on her return. This was not so difficult. The wind had abated a little, and besides, it was not now in her face; so she trudged along very fast, and had the pleasure of delighting and surprising her grandmother by her quick return.

"Well, Anne, have you been all the way to the mill and got home so soon? I shall think something of you, if you can take such a walk, all by yourself too, and get back in less than three hours. And how did you find poor Beckey?"

"Oh, grandmother, she looked as if she was very sick; and when Mr. Smith said the medicine was just right, and he thought it would do her good, I was so glad that I had carried it!"

"I am glad you did; and now you have got finely warmed, and a good appetite for dinner, I am sure."

'Anne felt very happy at her grandmother's kind words and approving smile. The dear old lady seldom praised her grandchildren—she knew they were happy when they had done right, and did not require praise; but the little girls well knew when she was pleased, and their grandmother's smile was the greatest reward they could have, except the approbation of their own hearts.

'When Anne was older, she frequently took the same walk from her grandmother's house to the sweet, quiet valley, with agreeable companions and in fine weather; yet she thought she had found more real enjoyment in the cold, solitary walk of that autumn morning, than in any other she ever took.

'The reason must be, that people are more likely to be happy, when they are seeking the good of others, than when their own pleasure is their object.'

To S. C. E.

BY MRS. SARAH BROUGHTON.

SWEET sister, I have met thee in my dreams,
When glittering star-lamps gemmed the azure dome;
And moonlight trembled on the murmuring streams,
Or tipt with silvery crests the ocean-foam.

I met thee in the glorious spirit-clime,
Where hues immortal tinge the nodding flowers;
And angel-voices wake the music-chime,
That stirs the bloom of those aerial powers.

Sweet strains, unheard in daylight's busy hour,
Steal with a mellow cadence o'er the soul;
The care-worn spirit owns their soothing power,
And hush'd in peace the anguish-billows roll.

Methought on seraph wings we soar'd away,
To the supernal realms of life and light;
Where the unclouded Presence makes the day,
And forms of dazzling glory meet the sight.

There, by the never-failing streams, that spring
From the glad fountains near the eternal throne;
Our ravish'd spirits furl'd the radiant wing,
To learn the anthems of that blissful zone.

In those fair bowers, where in perennial bloom,
The life-trees cluster o'er the healing flood;
Bright cherubs round us wav'd the purple plume,
And woke the joyful hymn of praise to God.

And thou, seraphic minstrel, swept the lyre
To glory's lofty, everlasting song!
How my rapt spirit caught the angelic fire,
As thy symphonious numbers rolled along.

There bloomed the immortal amaranth, whose hue,
Won from the rainbow's fount, can never pale;
And the bow'd Rose, that erst in Sharon grew,
And flung its perfumes o'er the lilled vale.

Bright forms were there, and voices whose lov'd tone
Faded in anguish from this dim, cold sphere;
They join the chant, around the burning throne,
Crown'd with the bloom of the ever-vernal year.

See, from the golden censers round the hill
Where dwells the unseen Majesty on high,
Bright incense-wreaths the empyrean fill,
And veil with dazzling light the Eternal eye.

As the loud chorus rings along the line
Of angel and archangel, bending low;
Mercy and justice, truth and love combine
In bright prismatic hues th' o'erarching bow.

O should we not rejoice, since hope has given
Such glorious views to cheer our mental sight?
While faith has won the golden beams of heaven
To gild the scenery of time's shadowy night.

Sing on, sing on, celestial minstrel; thou
Whose lyre is tuned by the bright 'shining ones':
They're weaving fadeless garlands for thy brow,
More glorious far than all earth's jewelled crowns.

Sing on, and swell the joyful pæan high,
Let hill and valley catch the thrilling strain;
Till mountain-fanes give back the glad reply,
And sea-rocked isles repeat the loud Amen.

Musings—Fancy and Truth.

POETRY has breathed out many melancholy and heart subduing strains. Our tears have been made to flow at the sorrow of strangers, and even at imaginary grief. And we have been grateful for the developement of our sympathies thus given, and have been made to look kindlier on the human face and more reverentially up to God. It is good to weep, if the uprising waters of the spring bathe and give new life to the roots of any of the affections or sympathies, causing the tendrils of the vine to produce richer and more abundant fruit. It is good to weep, if any heavenward hope is nourished thereby—if the fever of the soul is allayed—if new sources of strength are opened to us. It is good to weep, if the eye is washed to read clearer the types and symbols of God's love and interpret the mysteries of life.

I spoke at the opening of this article of Poetry's melancholy strains. I know of none that have presented to my mind a more perfect image of desolation than these:

'Lingering, he raised his latch at eve,
Though tired in heart and limb!
He loved no other place, and yet
Home was no home to him.'

My heart was light when I opened to these lines. I was in a book-store, in a noisy city street, and a crowd were around me with all the various hum of a motley gathering. If any one had looked into my eyes, I should have been ashamed—for they were full of tears; tears which I could no more restrain, than I could bid the drops of a summer shower back to their fountain cloud. And wherefore should I be ashamed of this emotion? It is undefinable as common; and does it argue good or ill to human nature, that man is unwilling that man should witness the revealings of some of the loveliest and most amiable feelings? It is strange to notice the aspects of a crowd, whom a sudden accident has brought together and swayed with one sympathy, when the excitement is passed! They had entirely forgotten themselves—the habitual concealment of deepest feeling, and you saw the flushing of every face by the quick pulsations of the one heart of humanity. But now they are returning to the old way—the artificial of life's conventionals—and many a one looks as if he were caught in some unmanly affair, and turns away lest man should see the moisture in his eye. Be this as it may, these lines of the poet affected me strangely, so that I left the store, forgetting all I wanted, and went on saying to myself—

'He loved no other place, and yet
Home was no home to him.'

Throngs passed me by, but I saw them not, for I was pitying one nearer my eye, and in whose wretchedness I was absorbed. He was a pitiable object indeed! 'Tired in heart and limb' at evening, standing before the dwelling, with his hand resting on the latch, his head drooping, one foot lifted as if to move, the other resting as if to tarry. There he lingers. He looks up and around. It is indeed his dwelling. There clammers the vine he planted as one he loved directed, and there is the leafy screen she had trained over the window. The row of rich flowers—each with a thousand memories—still bloom, weeded for her as faithfully as ever every morning; and there hangs upon the string the signal, she will never raise again upon the staff to call him from the field. All is as ever in the outward—save the brightness and cheerfulness with which it was once all clothed by his spirit. But within—O changed indeed! 'He loves no other place,' and why doth he not enter? It is home, and yet not home. It is the home of memory—of the thrilling past—of the hallowed things of the holiest love; but now it is no home to satisfy present wants, for as he laid his hand on the latch, its click did not find an echo in the quick step of one hastening to meet him, and his heart now feels the truth that she cannot come. Whither she has gone, is his home! His spirit is like hers who when told to go from the prison where her husband was confined, and return home, replied: 'I have no home, if he cannot come there!' He feels the need of something more than what is of the earth, earthy. He enters, and who shall enter with him?

Yes, who shall enter with him? You answer, 'Religion—the Gospel!' But ah, there are many religions and many gospels in the world; which do you choose? I have known of sorrow deepened by some—the wounded heart lacerated more and more, and whereas death made them melancholy, religion added madness. 'Try the spirits,' saith the beloved disciple, 'whether they be of God!'—of the God he styled—Love. The spirit that cometh of God can alone be the Comforter. Let that spirit enter. Alas! the door is crowded as a throng seek to enter—let them all halt, and enter not till they are tried. Here are three who may represent the whole—we will question them.

Here cometh one ever forward to claim the precedence, and what is its name? Calvinism! I do not like the stern aspect, the schooled features, and the repulsive glances of the eyes; still we must question the candidate.

'And what, spirit of Calvinism, what will you say to the melancholy and bereaved soul? What comfort will you carry to him, if you enter?'

'I will tell him of the sovereignty of God, of his absolute and immutable decrees, and assure him that if the departed was one of the elected few, she is happy, and if he be one also, he will meet her, and I shall bid him submit to the sovereign God.'

'But how shall he know whether she or himself is of the elected few? To what infallible sign will you refer him?'

'I can refer him to none—he must rest in hope; especially, if she possessed the graces of holiness, he can hope strongly.'

'How can he rest in hope when all is uncertainty, and how can he decide whether she had the graces in the fullness required?'

'Be that as it may be, I can only teach him to submit—to submit to Him who is glorified no less in the damnation of the reprobate, than in the salvation of the elect.'

'And do you pretend to come from the God of love? Strange love divine that can be glorified in the entire and unmitigated wretchedness of a creature of his power. You cannot go in. The Comforter, even the Spirit of Truth, never commissioned you.'

Here comes another with an aspect more mild, for brilliant hopes are sometimes glowing there, and in the rapture of transient glorious anticipations, the soul is lifted up in praise, as it forgets all is uncertain. And what is its name? Arminianism.

'And what, spirit of Arminianism, what will you say to the homeless, because stricken soul?'

'I will tell him of the great Judge, who decideth all things, and who will give glory to all who, regenerated by his spirit, have believed on his Son and persevered in his grace.'

'Alas, his troubled soul must halt and decide upon these three great questions, ere he can dare to take hold on a single comfort you will offer. Perhaps the departed was not of those you would call the regenerated—perhaps she did not believe as you would deem right, and may have been wanting in some of the marks of perseverance in grace. All must be uncertain.'

'I would then tell him of the duty of submission; how he cannot reverse what is done—that there is no more change, and his grief is useless, preventing him from securing his own salvation.'

'If thus you would speak, you will but increase his wretchedness. His heart weeps now, because events cannot be reversed—he cannot bring her back to him, and the pleadings of his spirit are to know if he shall go to her?'

'That indeed I cannot tell—the Judge alone can decide. He must think of heaven, and "work out his own salvation with fear and trembling," that he may get there.'

'Alas! as home is now no home, because she is not there, heaven would not be heaven if there she dwelt not. His affections cannot change, and they are sent beyond the grave. They ask for a heaven there for her, as they tried to make one here—but to him it has “passed away.”

‘I own it and I feel it, but I must be sincere.’

‘God forbid you should be otherwise.’

‘And I must say that I can speak of no certainties, for God had prepared glory and bliss eternal for those whom he foresaw would believe and prove faithful in this probationary state, and he alone knoweth who they are. The judgment will tell.’

‘You cannot enter. With God, who scanneth all things—whose eternal thought knoweth all the relations of mind and matter, and all the results of the infinite variety of movements thereof,—with him to foresee is to appoint or decree; in truth, he foreseeth as he decreeth.’

‘Yet let me enter! I will tell him of Jesus who died for all and rose again, and the glories of the eternal world I will display’—

‘Yes, and the horrors of that world you must necessarily suggest to him. Your presence, your name, is sufficient to tell the whole. A God who foresaw the eternal misery of millions as the result of his ordinations, cannot be a God of love—he cannot be love so far, at least, as that result extends. You cannot have come from the Comforter, the Spirit of Truth, and I pray you leave.’

It mournfully departed, for there was much benevolence in its soul, and many that have been with it in years past, have paid it honor, though now they rank it with the errorists who limit the Holy One.

As Arminianism departed, there came a lovely form, all radiant with light, and wearing such sweetness of expression, that I instinctively looked for the furred wings of an angel! An immediate illumination took place—the twilight was clearer, and the evening star came forth in beauty such as I never beheld before, while a gentle zephyr fanned the shutting flowers, and they joyously awoke to give forth a welcome in a breath of perfume. Soon as I recovered from the overwhelming effect of so much beauty and sweetness, I asked the name. ‘Universalism!’ was the reply. ‘Is this,’ I said to myself, ‘the spirit against whom I have heard so much’— ‘Yes,’ said the spirit who had read my thoughts, ‘and my Master was reviled and his earliest followers were every where spoken against. Pride inflamed their hearts, and they were wise in their own conceits. But I am taught to reveal truth and and not heed human malice, so permit me to pass in.’

‘The test must be applied ere that.’

‘The test! what test? If you judge me by the standards of dominant sects, I shall be found a heretic—but I haste to enter, tell me the test?’

‘Comest thou from the God of love?’

‘Look upon my helmet and on my shield I have laid there, as I need them not in the house of mourning.’

‘I indeed read the motto there—‘God is love,’ but I want more proof than that.’

‘And you have it in every principle of the religion I advocate. They are all drawn from the perfections of God, and I harmonize them in the creation, preservation, and redemption of mankind universally. They accord with all the prophets sung of the Deliverer, with the advent, life, death, resurrection, ascension, and mediatorial reign of Jesus, and with the most glorious ascriptions of praise to Him to whom belongs the kingdom, power, and glory, and who shall be all in all. And more than this, they alone are adapted to satisfy the unlimited capacity of loving, on which are based the precepts or commandments to universal love. O let me in! I know how the mourner languishes for me, and how to him “in the evening time, there shall be light.”’

‘But pause a moment and tell me how you will speak to him of God?’

‘I shall speak to him of God as our heavenly Father, who mingled his paternal affections with every purpose of his wisdom, every exercise of his power, and every dealing of his sovereignty with man; who afflicts that he may bless, and wounds that he may make whole; and who is without variableness or shadow of turning, the God of love.’

‘Go in; the Comforter I know goes with you.’

Universalism entered and met pale Melancholy. In a moment they by sympathy became familiar, and the hour was the first happy one he had known since Death left his shadow in that home. The visitor spake of the paternal Deity so tenderly and wisely that the mourner listened with richest delight to the voice that told of Jehovah’s unceasing love; how he first loved us; how he loved a world even when dead in sin—not the sin, but the spirits betrayed by sin; how he sent his Son to commend that love, and what the Savior endured, and how he trusted in the love he declared for man, finding comfort in the hour of deepest agony from the thought of God as his Father. ‘The cup which my Father giveth me, shall I not drink it?’ said he. ‘You have been in sickness, perhaps’—

'Yes, yes,' exclaimed the bereaved, 'and who will be the angel of patience and goodness that she was to me in those seasons of weakness and pain!' and his tears gushed freely forth.

'God strengthen thee, mourner! You are thinking how easy it was to drink a bitter cup if she but smiled?'

'O yes, it was because she could not smile that the cup of death was so very bitter!'

'You could trust to her wisdom in the preparation of the draught given in your sickness, that it was well for you to drink it, and you have experienced benefits therefrom.'

'O yes, such as I shall never know again!'

'Let me quote again our dear Savior's words—"The cup which my FATHER giveth me, shall I not drink it?"'

'I see, I see your meaning. O for more faith! O for a filial spirit! O that I could be a child again, and breathe now as once I did—"Our Father, who art in heaven!"'

'Pray, sorrowing soul, pray! and solemn and earnest communion shall strengthen thy trust, and thou wilt with thy whole soul cry, "Abba, Father!"'

Long did the visitor converse with the bereaved one, and that night his spirit rested in hope. The Bible became a new revelation, and Jesus precious to his soul. The morning sun rose brighter than since the burial, and his first walk was pleasant as he went to the mechanic who was preparing the grave stone, and requested him to add four lines to those ordered to be cut, so that they read,—

The earth is dark! its light hath gone
With her the loved and lost!
To day with joy we count our own—
To-morrow ends our boast.

But Hope is left, and by her aid
We look to brighter realms,
And grief no more, with gloomy shade,
Our spirit overwhelms.

Heavenly Treasures.

BY REV. E. H. CHAPIN.

WE come now to consider the durability of heavenly riches. Were earth man's only abiding place—were he to be a denizen of this sphere forever, or to know none other when he leaves it, it would be right for him then, perhaps, to look here for his only gratification.

But this is not the case. He has a high and immortal nature, and those things upon which it can safely and immutably depend for its welfare, must be immortal also. And these are the riches which he lays up in heaven. They are pure and spiritual treasures, and the power of men cannot rob us of them, nor death destroy. They are liable to no physical accidents—the flame, nor the wind, nor the flood, nor the arts of men, nor the disappointments of enterprize, which are so ruinous to earthly wealth. The moth and the rust cannot corrupt them, nor thieves break through and steal. For, what are some of the heavenly treasures? There is the principle of doing right. The joy which flows from the possession of this principle, is a treasure to us. It is not needed here only—although great is the present reward which it bestows—but it is a principle which is to live hereafter, and is to move the soul forever. The angels have it; they move in their bright circles by its guidance, and worship by its dictates. The saints feel it, when they wave their palm branches, and cast down their 'starry crowns.' It is not a circumstance of this sphere only, then. He, therefore, who adopts this principle as a possession, has an eternal one. And oh, what a delicious, what a free reward, has this principle bestowed! Men whose limbs have been loaded with chains, and their flesh torn by cruel stripes, have felt a richer joy than all earth's wealth, thrice heaped, could give alone. It has borne up bruised hearts, stoutly, against the pelt-ing and crushing weight of cares and sorrows. It has given the philanthropist boldness to stand before kings, and furnished the naked martyr with a panoply of steel. It is a blessed principle—this one of doing right—a treasure that cannot fail us. It comprehends, strictly, all others that might be named, but we will specify another.

There is, then, the principle of love—love to God and man—the requirements of the moral law. This, also, is an eternal treasure. It is a principle which makes radiant the universe. There is not a quivering leaf which is not influenced by it, nor a star. It prompts to the performance of good for its own sake, and we move by it in the path to heaven. We shall carry that, too, beyond death, and wear it with our immortality, when we roam—

'—beside the crystal waters.'

We may defy earth's changes to rob us of it, if we fix it within and guard it aright, and it will expand and glow, when mountains topple into chaos, and orbs are shattered upon their radiant axles. It is as eternal as the THRONE, and binds all God's hosts together, soul with soul.

Faith, hope, charity, and principles like those which we have named, are heavenly treasures, and when they are 'laid up,' moth and rust cannot corrupt them, nor thieves break through and steal. The contrast they afford to earthly wealth, is like the difference displayed between mind and matter—the latter changeable and uncertain, the other, eternal, lofty, triumphant. The one treasure-house, is earth, the other, heaven. One of these bestows upon us those treasures which can only benefit us here—the other, those which are of incalculable profit in the present existence, and which will remain with us amid the glory, the joy and the eternity of another.

Another difference which exists between the two classes of treasures, is this. The one we may not attain. We know that wealth, or fame, or whatever object of the kind may be before our mind's eye, is not always reached by us, after all our endeavors. They are fickle and subtle, and elude our hands, perhaps, in the very moment of grasping. How many have delved, and dug, and struggled, and labored heavily, and found their toil all come to naught?—or have just reached the object of desire, and ere reaping any of its anticipated benefits, have died and left them to others? It is not certain, then, that we shall reach these treasures, or if we do, that we shall have an opportunity to enjoy them.

But the other treasures are sure upon the seeking. They are privileges of no one rank or clime. The poor man may acquire them equally with the rich, and the beggar with the king. Exposed to none of the contingences of earthly things, they cannot, like earthly things, fail us. The way to them is open and easy. We hazard nothing in striving to obtain them, as we do, often, in temporal enterprizes. They are around us in the air, and upon our path in the sunlight—they meet our eyes in all we see, and come to us with eloquent invitation. They will never elude the hand that reaches out to them. They are sure—they are of heaven!

FIGURATIVE language, when not carried to excess, is highly agreeable to taste and imagination; it gives splendor to poetry, lustre to eloquence, expression to passion, dignity to sentiment, and poignancy to wit; the elegant mantle which delicacy throws over all that is gross, vulgar or deformed; and is the graceful dress of the muses.

An Answer to a Remark.

'You would be a more popular writer if you professed another faith.'

I KNOW it, and most proud am I,
That at God's holy shrine,
I am not brought by lures and bribes
To call his name divine.
I worship, not because the crowd
Are bowing at his feet;
I praise him, not because the proud
Around his altar meet.

I will not bend before a shrine
Because the rich are there;
I will not seek the crowded street
To shout a pompous prayer;
Enough for me, that in my heart
The living truth resides;
Enough that wheresoe'er THOU art,
There holy peace abides.

'Tis not for worldly praise we shed
The penitential tear;
And any shrine is sacred where
The offerings are sincere.
The temple may be massive gold,
Or but the leafy bough;
'Tis hallowed if one heart hath told
Its worship and its vow.

Life a State of Activity. No. 2.

MAN should be continually active as an intellectual being. We have already offered some considerations to show why he should act with promptness and vigor. We will now consider why he should keep his intellectual powers continually at work. The simple reason is, because there is so much to be learned—and because the difficulties which surround every department of human inquiry make the progress of individuals but slow, even with the greatest assiduity, promptness and energy. The sources of knowledge are around us, above us, beneath us—on every hand they lie waiting as it were, for the investigations of the human mind. A wide, an unbounded field is presented for us to explore; and do our best, we can but examine an exceedingly small portion of it. The thought is overwhelming when it is realized—that the most learned man's amount of knowledge when compared with what is to be known, is as a handful of sands to the incalculable quantity which lies upon the sea-shore. It is this unlimited extent, this infinity of facts and truths to be known, which makes it the duty of intellectual beings to labor for their accumulation, without intermission. Even after having studied and investigated during an ordinary life time, with earnestness and perseverance, we shall find ourselves but mere children at last in our attainments of knowledge. The farther we penetrate the mysteries of nature, the wider the prospect opens before us. The more truths we learn, the more we see to be learned; as we ascend, step by step from one degree of knowledge to another, 'hills rise o'er hills and Alps on Alps arise.' Notwithstanding the vast discoveries which have been made in science during the six thousand years that the world has stood; notwithstanding the mighty improvements which have been made in art; notwithstanding the extension of literature, civil freedom and religious liberty, yet, when these advances are considered with reference to future progress, we cannot avoid believing that society is still in its infancy. It is not fancy, but a sober conclusion, drawn from the history of the past, to say, humanity is just at the starting point of its career, just commenced its onward, upward movement towards perfectibility.

I say nothing about the advantages of knowledge. I assume it as a settled point, that its advantages are admitted, its benefits to the individual and to society, acknowledged. My remarks are founded upon the supposition that all who read this, appreciate the uses and benefits of intellectual attainments sufficiently, to make some efforts to possess them. My object is to induce you to infuse more energy into those efforts, and to continue them without unnecessary relaxation. The difficulty of the work is no objection. The vastness and variety of subjects to be considered are no objection; but this infinite variety, this unbounded extent, these formidable difficulties, make the strongest of all possible reasons for the vigorous and continuous intellectual activity, which I am recommending. If the road to learning were made smooth and easy; if it were skirted with shade trees, and ornamented and perfumed with flowers; if to possess knowledge and attain to intellectual excellence, required no pains, no efforts, no sacrifices, no struggles, no exercise of indomitable will, no stern agony of thought—more than half its value would be lost. The mental effort—the intellectual contest with obstacles—persevering, unwavering activity—it is these that make intellectual attainments of so much value.

The glory and happiness of a human being are not to be found in rest, inactivity and ease. These are necessary only to increase the elasticity and energy of his powers of body and mind. We live not in accordance with the laws of the universe, when we yield to the feelings of indolence and sloth, which too frequently steal over us. The innumerable hosts of heaven are continually revolving in their orbits, or around their respective centres. The earth rolls on in its endless path forever. The tides of the restless ocean ebb and flow, and never cease their motion. The winds play freely round the earth, and never tire in their work. Vegetation performs its functions without intermission. All nature is opposed to inactivity, and man is not in harmony with its laws when he ceases to be active. Lose not one moment, then, in indolence and ease, since there is so much to be done, and so little time to labor in. With our most prompt, vigorous and constant efforts, we shall still be infinitely below that height of intellectual excellence, to which our imaginations reach and our desires tend.

Again; man should not only be prompt, energetic, constant in bodily and intellectual labor, but he should be so in moral and religious effort. I need not undertake to show that man is a moral and religious being; that morality or a sense of obligation to do right; that religion, or the idea of a God and our relation to him, are implanted in our constitution; are as much a part of our nature as are our physical wants and appetites or our intellectual powers and capacities. The simple idea which I wish to impress upon you in this piece, is, the necessity, the duty of laboring in this department of life, with the same promptness, energy and constancy, which I have urged with regard to physical and intellectual action. Man's moral nature is to be developed and perfected in the same manner as his intellectual, viz. By contending with difficulties, encountering obstacles, overcoming temptation.

Though the religious sentiment is an instinct of our nature, yet unless it be used and cultivated, it will be of no advantage to us; and if it do not die out, it will become dormant if we do not employ it on its legitimate objects. So it is with the moral faculties, they, too, must be used. And the more these religious and moral powers are employed, the more they will be improved. The moral and religious nature of man, (for I now consider them together) are universally conceded to be the highest and most important part of his constitution; and if vigorous and constant action is required of the intellectual faculties on account of the difficulties attending the pursuit of knowledge, and the extensiveness and variety of its subjects, for the same reason equally vigorous and constant activity of the moral faculties, is demanded. We are surrounded with temptations wherever we may go; from infancy, through manhood, to old age, we are liable to be led astray. We are encompassed with moral dangers on the right hand and on the left. Vice throws around herself a thousand fascinations to lure us from our fidelity to virtue. Wealth and luxury dazzle and blind us by their splendor and the homage which the world pays to them. Ambition holds out her honors, and fame proclaims with syren voice, her rewards. Pleasure presents her flowery walks, her voluptuous arbors, her sparkling cups. Our open honesty of purpose is laughed at by friends, and our sterling integrity questioned and attacked by enemies. A thousand malicious hands scatter thorns and briars in the path of rectitude we have determined to walk, and a thousand tongues will cry, Your way is hard, because it is the transgressor's. But listen not to these voices; heed not these fascinations of the arch enemy; turn not to ponder the question on the advantages of yielding or resisting, but resist, immediately and at once. These are but trials of your moral strength—they are the means which God has appointed to bring out your moral energies. This is the method which Divine Wisdom has chosen to bring you up to the full stature of men. As no condition of life is free from these temptations, as activity and that only is the means of moral improvement, the necessity is laid upon us to be ever vigilant, ever morally active, if we would preserve our own moral nature from corruption. But there is another consideration which shows that we should never rest from our moral efforts. It is on account of the vast amount of social wrong which is practised in the world. Because of our social nature, because of our being connected with our fellow creatures by some mysterious though powerful ties, we sympathize in their sufferings, and participate in their joys. With our moral powers even but ordinarily enlightened, we cannot but feel a desire, which is frequently irrepressible, to regenerate the social and moral world.

The world is full of wrong, and the incessant and vigorous labor of the moral faculties of man, for ages to come, will not entirely eradicate it. Herculean tasks are to be performed by the benevolent and philanthropic exertions of separate or associated individuals. National and social wrongs are so numerous, so gross, so interwoven with the institutions, customs and prejudices of the people, that sometimes the most sanguine reformers are discouraged by a view of the labor before them. Intemperance stalks abroad, withering, blighting, destroying yearly, the lives of thousands, and the fair hopes and peace of millions. The traffic in a poison which produces not only physical disease and bodily death, but likewise the death of the soul, is sanctioned by custom, and protected by laws. The buying and selling of human beings, as if they were goods and chattels, the treating them as if they were beasts of burden, are practices which men justify by the Bible, and uphold by written social compacts. War and its horrors—the avenging of evil and its consequent woe,—men justify by christianity, and sustain by religion. The working classes are doomed to incessant toil, while others secure the greater amount of its fruits. In a word, moral evils are so abundant, they are of such depth and turpitude, that to be true to our moral and social duties—true to ourselves and to our fellow-men—the most unremitting, prompt, and energetic moral action is required of us all. What our hands find to do, let us do with our might. In this lower world, where events transpire in such rapid succession,—where moments, days, and years flee by us with almost lightning speed—let us not be slow in deciding what we shall do for ourselves, or for others. And let us not labor either with our physical, intellectual, or moral powers, as if it were a matter of indifference whether we prosecuted our labors with feebleness or performed them with energy. We should ever remember that every step we take in knowledge or virtue, the better are we qualified to take the second—that mental power by its activity, generates and augments itself—that the intellectual, moral and religious faculties, are strengthened by use, enlarged by practice, expanded by exercise. What thy hand findeth to do, do with thy might. Suffer no moments to be lost, no hours to be wasted, no years to be mis-spent in feeble efforts, or unmanly pursuits. Confine not your thoughts to one branch of knowledge, but endeavor as far as may be, to grasp them all. Limit not your desires for moral advancement to yourselves, but extend them to the race. Circumscribe not your philanthropy by the geographical bounds of your own country, but let them embrace the world. Look not to the good of a part of your fellow-men, but to the interests and well being of the whole. These are the views which will incite you to prompt, vigorous, and unceasing activity.

Social Duties of Universalists.

BY REV. A. B. GROSH.

To advance our cause, it is well to be zealously affected in keeping up all the forms and feelings of social intercourse, among all who are within the sphere of our influence. I was much struck with the remark of a warm-hearted brother from the South. 'Your Universalists are not sociable enough—more converts are made, and more friends are kept warm and zealous, by social intercourse, than by public preaching.' The censure and the observation are both very correct. I do not say that we are behind our partialist brethren in social kindness—for we are far before them—but we are not kind and social ENOUGH.

Though the time has passed by, when people expected to see some signal mark of Divine disapprobation stamped on the forehead of any one who professed a belief in Universalism—though the belief of our depraved and immoral condition, in consequence of our faith, is fast being weakened by an exhibition of our acts—yet still, our religious characters and our religious sentiments are perfectly abhorred by a large portion of the christian world around us. Being ignorant of our sentiments, they abhor them—and abhorring them, they will remain ignorant of them. It is a dark picture for our hopes to look upon, but it is a correct one. They will not read our books and publications—or if they do, it is to pick out defects and pass by beauties—to read with prejudiced eyes, and a determination not to understand and believe. They will not attend our meetings; for they deem Universalist meeting-houses the synagogues of satan—or if they do attend, it is with ears stopped, that they may not hear what is said. Are they not deserving of your compassion? Can you not remember when you were as miserably prejudiced as they are? And will you do nothing to release them from their narrow prison? O, mingle with them kindly—converse with them affectionately—instruct their ignorance, soothe their fears, calm their opposition, gently bear with their weaknesses, and by an exhibition of the truth, show them how far you agree with them, and how important is the agreement—wherein you differ from them, and the reasons of that difference. There are but few—very few partialists that may not be won to Universalism, by such a course of conduct on our part.

How often, in preaching in a new place, have I heard some one say, who had heard Universalism preached for the first time, 'Is that Universalism? Why, how very different it is from what I have always heard it represented!' Now, it is not often that your preachers can get such persons to listen to them—but you may find them and converse with them often. O, then, deal mildly and gently with them; for they have been cruelly deceived. Carefully remove their prejudices from their understandings, and explain fully and clearly and repeatedly, the glorious truths you profess. Make them know the surpassing loveliness of God, and Jesus, and the Bible, and religion, and duty, and morality, in our sight; and learn them that instead of hating, despising, or feeling coldly toward them, they are most dear to our hearts and precious in our estimation. And not only do this by precept, but by example prove it to them. In your daily walk and conversation with them and each other—at the domestic fireside, in the social circle and in the public sanctuary, let your actions draw forth the merited declaration, 'See how these Universalists love each other!' And when you have succeeded, in part, in removing their ignorance of us and our faith, and consequently in breaking down their unwarranted prejudices, then let your influence be exerted to bring them to unite with you in the public sanctuary, and in hearing the instructions of the Gospel from your preachers.

I know that nearly all Universalists feel a delicacy on this subject; nor would I have you officiously and impertinently to intrude your invitations, but kindly offer them as a reciprocation of that anxious civility with which partialists invite you to their meetings. To the young, particularly, these remarks are respectfully submitted for consideration. In them, friendly and social attachments are peculiarly strong and lively—unaccustomed to separations, they follow, with yearning hearts, the footsteps of wandering associates. And on that day of days, when all nature seems awakened to devotion and praise, their affections are also awakened, and they have a strong desire to walk to the house of God in company with the youthful partakers of their week-day joys. Owing to the rigid, narrow views of partialism, and the illiberal sectarianism it inspires, this longing of the soul is easily suppressed in partialist youths and maidens. But Universalism, kind, lenient and tolerant in its views, and liberal in its practices—yea, even in its forms of devotion—is not so unyielding. Hence, it frequently happens that Universalist young men and women become almost constant attendants on partialist meetings, to please their associates; when those associates will scarcely ever (if ever) be seen in Universalist meetings, to please their Universalist friends in return. Is such conduct the equality of friendship and mutual affection? or is it the inequality of slavery, and of the reciprocal duties of master and slave? Are there not reciprocal duties and mutual obligations, in every relationship and union which can be formed between one moral being and another? And are not these duties and obligations equal, on both sides, in that relation called friendship? If so, how can friendship exist where the obligations and civilities are so unequally laid and paid, as in the case we have just named? Surely a partialist young man cannot respect the faith, or virtue, or moral honesty and moral courage of his Universalist friend, when he finds him so weak and pliant, so accommodating to partialism, so cold and indifferent to Universalism. Nor can he regard him as his equal, when he finds him so willing to submit to every caprice and whim, so willing to give up all his rights to oblige his partialist acquaintance, without ever asking a reciprocity of the civility. Depend upon it, my youthful friends, when friendship becomes all demand and authority on one side, and all compliance and submission on the other, it is only another name for degrading inequality and moral slavery. Never, then, give up your privilege of equality in friendship, and never wholly forsake your own meetings, until you forsake the faith there taught.

To reciprocate occasional attendance at other meetings, is both good and proper for you; but to give your own up wholly, to please another, is base, cowardly, and weak in any one, in partialist or Universalist, in male or female, in the child or in the parent. If, in the performance of any act, the dictates of judgment and conscience should be obeyed, they surely ought to be in the public worship of our heavenly Father. And cold and ungrateful to that kind Father of all, must that heart be, which can deliberately forsake the places where He is worshiped in spirit and in truth, to attend wholly on ministrations where God's highest glory and praise is withheld from him, and where his character is blackened in the most shameful manner, by ascriptions of tyranny and cruelty unutterable! Oh, if it were possible for God to be as vindictive as his children slanderously report him, the hottest fires, the deepest agonies, and the severest tortures of his wrath would surely be the portions of those cowardly hypocrites who knew him most lovely, and yet thus desecrated him—who knew how to worship him, yet wilfully and habitually united with others in slandering his holy name!

While, then, you assert and freely exercise your rights, let it be done with kindness and civility for the rights of others. Cherish that spirit of social intercourse which makes you equal with our opposers, and them equal with you. Remove their prejudices, by approving all that is true in their faith, and correct in their conduct—by pointing out clearly the differences between their faith and your own, with the reasons why you thus differ from them—and win them to a candid and full examination of the truth, by showing the liberal and salutary influence which it exerts on the conduct and affections of its believers. And if to do thus be good in itself, and good in the end it is calculated to produce—and who can doubt it?—then remember that 'it is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing.'

To a Departed Friend.

Not with the scenes where the festive meet,
Not with the crowds of the bustling street,
Not with the haunts of fame,
But with shrine, and altar, and house of prayer,
And the temple of God, (for thy work was there,) —
With these hast thou linked thy name!

Not where the gay and the worldly throng,
Mid the giddy dance and the careless song,
Is thy memory cherished yet;
But in sorrowing hearts, where the tears flow free,
And in lowly homes do they think of thee—
They cannot soon forget!

Not on foreign shores, nor in distant climes,
Do they waken for thee those mournful chimes
Which sound for the lordly dead;
But the broken lyre in thy father's breast,
Sighs a vesper hymn for thy peaceful rest
In thy lowly church-yard bed.

Be the sunbeams bright on thine early tomb,
Be the spring-flowers earliest there to bloom,
There balmiest be their breath;
For thou wert good, and each gentle thing,
Some tribute of love to thy grave should bring,
To scatter the gloom of death.

Friendship on the Nail.

WHEN a certain individual contracted a friendship for another, which was a rare thing, he was wont to say, 'I have him on my nail.' When he said thus, he had in his mind two ideas;—First, that the person would always be present, nothing being more easy than to look on his nail; and, Second, good and true friends were so scarce, that he who had the most, might write their names upon his nail. What an exaggeration of language is this latter remark, and what a miserable disposition does it manifest! And yet we meet frequently with such sentiments—the effusions of hearts which have never learned rightly to estimate humanity, to make allowances for earthly imperfections, and to moderate extravagant desires. We doubt—and we feel we have sufficient reason to doubt—whether these would ever be ranked among the real, self-sacrificing and exemplary benefactors of their race. They must be pebbles in an inch-pond, the centres of small circles indeed, undesired as much as they undesire.

We can pity one who says, as David of old said, in his haste, 'All men are liars'—all are deceivers and faithless. We pity him, because we know the thoughts and feelings which lead to such expressions of hasty emotion—the thoughts and feelings of wrung affection and abused confidence, that so overspread with gloom every mental conception, as to picture the world but as a prison of criminals. But we have no sympathy with those who are perpetual and sarcastic revilers of their race, and often deliberately, not in haste, say, 'All men are liars'—all are deceptive and none are to be trusted. Not one root of their mental being is 'grounded in love'—christian love. The command to love our neighbor, is to them narrower than it ever was to the narrowest Jew. From such minds sprang the doctrine of 'total depravity,' which transforms the angel child into an embryo fiend; and from such came the doctrines of infant condemnation, outraging every parent feeling and torturing to every benevolent affection. And such are the veriest foes of all social progress—social progress based on man's confidence in man; and the philanthropic dictates of christianity are smothered for want of air, or frozen to death from the cold, in their breasts.

Poetry has too often lent its radiance to gild such dark thoughts,—and the Muses miserably muse when they pronounce friendship 'but a name.' Many who thus style it, have doubtless been deficient in the exercise of some of the most essential attributes of a friend, and complain of wants they never could supply. Friendship has indeed proved sometimes to be but a name, as falsely applied. So has love—so has christianity. But still love and christianity are more than mere names. They are realities—divine, glorious, heavenly. Thanks be to God! And so is the fact with friendship. There are warm hearts beating around us, and we shall know it, if we have a sympathetic cord tuned to answer thereto. We must clothe ourselves more in the garments of amiability and goodness—throw more soul of kindness into our manners—exercise more generosity in our estimates of human beings, and be more what we desire others to be; and then shall we find friendship enough—if we do not create it, we shall bring it out to our sight and rejoice in its beauty. Emma Beaumont.

BY A NEW CORRESPONDENT.

'WHERE hath not woman stood,
Strong in affection's might? a reed upborne
By an o'er-mastering current!'

'ANOTHER tremendous failure!' said Mr. Egerton, as he joined his family, who were collected round a cheerful fire;—'the house of Beaumont & Co., thought to be the best and safest in the city, is down—a complete smash! Poor Beaumont! I pitied him from my soul—with his large family, and brought up in such style as they have been. It must be a terrible stroke.'

'I wonder how his dashing wife will bear this reverse?' said Mrs. E. 'To give up her splendid house, and furniture, and the rich dresses she prides herself so much in, must be severe indeed.'

'O I suppose they think that Miss Emma's beauty and accomplishments will get her an establishment,' said Mary.

'Yes, but there are few gentlemen disinterested enough now-a-days, to marry a portionless beauty,' said her sister, 'and I—'

'Come, come, girls, no more scandal,' said their brother, 'or I shall think it is because you envy her; I won't hear Emma Beaumont talked of in this way; for let me tell you, there is one at least, who would be glad to marry her without a farthing.'

And now if you please, reader, we will look in upon another scene. In a spacious and handsome parlor, in one of the princely mansions of our city, a group is collected worthy the pencil of an artist; before the fire in a splendid rocking chair, sits a stately woman in the prime of life, dressed in the height of the last Parisian fashion, and apparently engaged in decyphering the figures of the rich Turkey carpet; on a low ottoman beside her, sit two beautiful children, evidently twins, with eyes and minds intent on a new picture book; while at the table a boy of fourteen, and a girl some two years younger, are deeply engaged in reading. But the charm of the circle is a young lady, who may have numbered some seventeen summers; she is about the middling height of females, and beautifully proportioned; yet so slender, as almost to give the idea of fragility; her eyes are large and brilliant, and of the softest hazel color, and her hair, which hangs in ringlets, round a neck of alabaster, is of that rare and most beautiful shade, which the Quaker poet so perfectly describes, as 'brown in the shadow, and gold in the sun;' add to these a smooth, fair forehead, neither too high, nor too low, a nose neither Grecian, aquiline, nor la petite retroussé, but perfectly pretty and feminine, and a hand and foot of unparalleled beauty, and you have a true portrait of Emma Beaumont. She is standing beside her harp, and tossing back her rich curls, showing her beautiful face lit up with a most dazzling smile, as she exclaims, 'I have mastered it at length, mamma! How glad I shall be when dear papa comes home, you know he says my songs make him forget his petty cares and annoyances, and I am sure this will enchant him; and this symphony on the harp is exquisite; my beautiful harp! I would rather part with every thing I have, than this; do you know, mamma, Herbert Courtney says——'

But before she could finish her sentence, the front door was hastily opened and closed, and with a step wholly unlike his usual dignified pace, Mr. Beaumont rushed into the room, and threw himself on the sofa. Emma left her harp, and flew to her father's side; Henry and Mary dropt their book, while the two younger children sat stupified with terror, and even Mrs. Beaumont was startled out of her apathy, and came forward with hurried inquiries as to what was the matter. As soon as he could speak, he exclaimed, 'We are ruined, undone—you and my children are beggars'—but ere he had finished, Mrs. B. fell to the floor in hysterics; Emma, half distracted, flew to her mother's assistance; she was carried to her room, and the usual restoratives having been applied, she soon sank into a profound sleep. Emma then sought her father to hear the extent of their misfortunes; the children had been sent to bed, and she found him alone, pacing the floor with rapid strides.

'Dear papa, is it indeed so bad as you say? Is there nothing left?'

'Nothing! not even the smallest pittance; our house, furniture, all, all must go, and what will become of you, I know not.'

'Do not fear for us, papa, we are young and healthy, and surely you have friends, who will not see us want.'

'Ah, Emma, you have not lived long enough to learn the deceitfulness of the world; prosperity will always make friends, but adversity is the season to try them.'

'After several vain attempts on her part to comfort him, the heart stricken man blest her, and sought his chamber. The next morning he was found dead in his chair. It was supposed that on leaving Emma he had gone to his room, and instead of seeking rest, he had sat revolving plans, and thinking of his entanglements, till his over-wrought brain had sunk beneath the struggle, and brought on an attack of apoplexy, and the husband and father had gone to his final account. The widow gave way to her feelings in hysteric sobs, and bursts of grief, mingled with lamentations over her fallen fortunes, and Emma was left to see to all her affairs. With an aching heart, but a calm brow and voice, she gave the necessary directions respecting the funeral, and when all was over, with the assistance of the surviving partner of the house, she set about adjusting her father's business. At length the day came when the sale of furniture was to take place; Emma had reserved only some of the simplest articles to furnish their new abode, but she could not bear to part with her harp. It was her father's gift, and she had taken so much pleasure in learning his favorite airs, and playing them to him, that she felt it was too much to yield that, but then came the thought of her helpless brother and sisters, and her still more helpless mother—who, nurtured as she had been in the midst of luxury, and gratified with every refinement for more than forty years, could not submit patiently to her misfortunes. Emma thought of this, and the harp was placed with other articles for sale.

The sale-day came, and past, and before evening Emma ushered the family into their new abode. Humble enough it certainly was, and vast the change from the luxurious mansion in the most aristocratic part of the city, to a wooden domicile in a narrow street; their apartments consisting of one room, which served for kitchen and parlor, and three small bed-rooms. The larger room was covered with a cheap carpet, the shutters were closed, and the neat white curtains closely drawn, and a cheerful fire gave to it an appearance of comfort, humble though it were. Into this place Emma conducted her mother, and bitter were her complaints against it. 'What would our friends, the Selbys and the Delanos say to us in such a hole as this?' was her constant reply to Emma's attempts to win her to something like contentment. It was in vain she sought to draw her attention to the little comforts of the room, and placed her in the large, well-cushioned rocking chair, the only article of luxury they possessed, and which Emma had sold her trinkets to procure; her only answer was, 'That ever I should live to enter such a hole as this! I, who was born to such different prospects!'

As soon as they were settled in their new home, Emma began to lay plans for their future support. She applied to some of their former friends with a proposal of teaching music, an accomplishment in which she was a proficient; her voice was remarkably fine, and had been well cultivated, but—'She was so young, they feared she could not command sufficient respect from her pupils.' Then she applied for fine needlework, but was equally unsuccessful; they were truly sorry for poor dear Mrs. Beaumont and their dear Emma, and would be delighted to assist them, but really, just now, they had no sewing to put out; or they had a sempstress in the house, as it was so much cheaper, and in these distressing times, it behooved people to be economical; and with compliments to poor, dear Mrs. B., Emma was civilly dismissed from the houses where her presence had been so warmly welcomed a short time before. Poor Emma turned her steps homeward after her last application, sad, and weary; her funds were nearly exhausted, and a severe winter was setting in; it was November when her father died, and it was now near Christmas. In her better days Emma had occasionally met with Mr. B., the manager of one of the theatres; and he had frequently, after hearing her sing, expressed a wish that she were in a different station of life, that her services might benefit his establishment. When she reached home on the evening after her vain attempt to get employment, she found a note from Mr. B., in which, in the most delicate terms, he stated that having heard she wished to devote her talents to the service of her family, he would offer her an engagement on the most liberal terms, to sing in a new opera, about to be brought out, if she could bring her mind to accept it. At first Emma was shocked at the proposal. Her delicacy revolted at the idea of exhibiting her person before the gaping multitude, and more especially did she dread the sneering remarks of the companions of former days. She was half inclined to refuse the offer at once; but she looked around on the group whose sole dependance she was, and strove to overcome her reluctance. She then, with an anxious heart, made known the contents of the note to her mother, who, as she expected, entirely disapproved it; indeed she considered the proposal as the height of insolence; 'as if it was not bad enough to be obliged to live in this miserable hovel, without being insulted in this manner.'

'But my dear mother,' said Emma, to whom the project seemed more feasible, now she was called upon to combat her mother's prejudices; 'we shall be unable to retain even this place, unless I can find some employment; all my exertions to-day have been unsuccessful—our money is nearly gone, and why should not the talents which God has given me, and which my dear father so carefully cultivated, be devoted to the service of the dear ones he has left? There is no disgrace in the employment, and why should we care for the sneers of those who formerly courted our society.'

Many objections had Emma to combat, but at length Mrs. Beaumont gave her consent. The next morning Emma called on Mr. B.; her trembling ring was answered by a servant, who ushered her into a handsome apartment, where Mr. B. was writing; he rose and saluted her courteously as she entered, and after some trifling remarks, she proceeded to speak of the business which brought her there. Soon the preliminaries were gone over, and the services required of her and the remuneration, were settled. The worthy manager then introduced her to the leading members of the company with whom she was to be connected, and she returned home to study the part assigned her. The thoughts that awakened a strong struggling between duty and inclination, may be in some degree imagined; but little can the reader know the feelings she experienced as she wended her way home. She seemed to be in a dream, and the moving world around her was all unreal. But the dreaminess did not long continue, for the strength she had invoked God to breathe into her soul was felt, and once more her purpose was firmly fixed and the resolve renewed to sacrifice everything that filial duty required.

At length the night of her debut came; the theatre was crowded almost to suffocation, and intense interest was manifested by both young and old. The curtain rose, and amid the buzz of admiring voices, Emma came forward to the footlights and commenced her song. A dead silence reigned in the house, and every note of her clear, sweet voice, though it faltered at first, could be distinctly heard; as she proceeded, she became inspired with the beauty of the music,—her tones by degrees gained strength and richness, till at length they swelled into strains of divinest harmony. Her song was succeeded by thunders of applause. Through the whole evening she supported her part as she had begun, and the eyes and hearts of her audience proclaimed her triumph complete.

* * * * *

More than a year has past, fair reader, since we were first introduced to the Beaumont family, and now, if you please, we will look in upon them again. We find them in a small, but genteel-looking house, in a neat and respectable part of the city; Mrs. Beaumont is nearly reconciled to her lot, and only repines occasionally; Henry is about to enter the navy; and Mary, with the assistance of the younger girls between school hours, is able to earn a small pittance by her needle. But Emma! ah, she is sadly altered, yet still how lovely! her form appears even more fragile than usual, she is more sedate, and those who love her best, perceive, with anxiety, that her eye is dim and her cheek pale, save when under the excitement of her professional duties. It is near the close of her second season; to-night is the last of her engagement. She has more than fulfilled the promise of her debut—she is the brightest star in the musical firmament—more than one excellent matrimonial offer has she refused; for who would support her family, if she were gone?

But hark! there is a ring at the door—and a gentleman, apparently fifty years of age, enters their little parlor. After the customary salutations had passed, addressing himself to Mrs. B., he said, 'I perceive that you do not know me; have you forgotten Charles Beaumont?' Joyful was the recognition—it was indeed the only brother of her husband, and an early playmate of her own; but twenty years spent beneath the burning sun of a tropical clime, had browned his skin, and whitened his hair, and so altered his whole appearance, that we cannot marvel if none recognized him. I said that his outer man was changed, but the inner man was still the same. Frank, free, generous, and kind hearted was he, when, at six and twenty, he left his native land; and equally kind and generous was he at six and forty; he went to India almost penniless, and he returned rich, yet with no other desire than to lavish his wealth on those whom he loved. The story of their misfortunes was soon told, and Emma's conduct elicited expressions of the warmest admiration from her uncle.

'She is a noble girl,' he exclaimed, 'but I shan't have it so any longer. You must leave the opera now, Emma, and if you will you may sing to me, and in return I will take upon myself the task you have been performing; what say you, Emma, shall it be so?'

'Most gladly, dear uncle; this is the last night of my engagement, and then I am at your service?'

'Remember, it is the last night,' said her uncle, as he handed her from the carriage at the entrance of the theatre. She little thought then that the words were prophetic.

Never had Emma Beaumont looked so beautiful as on that night; and when the curtain rose, the burst of admiration that greeted the fair vocalist, told the power of her charms. Her graceful form was arrayed in a robe of pure white satin; her rich hair was parted on her fair forehead, and drawn into a knot at the back of her head, while here and there a straggling ringlet fell on her neck, as if to relieve its dazzling whiteness, and her large, glorious hazel eyes were brilliant with excitement. After the first round of applause, the house was still, and when the low, sweet voice of the songstress commenced a wild and plaintive melody, every heart seemed to stop its pulsations; by degrees the air changed, and the strains became clear and loud as the notes of a bugle, and gradually increasing, ended in a peal of triumphant melody, the last note unheard in the general burst of ecstasy. But, in the midst of the excitement, while a thousand voices were calling for the popular vocalist, the worthy manager made his appearance, and announced to the waiting multitude, that Miss B. had ruptured a blood-vessel, and could not return! Her nerves had been wrought to the severest tension, and in the midst of her triumph, death had set his seal on the devoted girl. She was borne to her home by her agonized uncle, and the best medical aid was procured,—but in vain! She lingered, and a change of air and scene was recommended, and it was eagerly tried; for a few days she seemed to be better, and sat for a short time every day in the piazza before the cottage, and even walked out once or twice, supported by her uncle and her mother; but her strength soon failed—day by day she grew weaker and weaker, and faded like a stricken flower before their sight.

It was toward the close of a bright summer's day, Emma had been unusually weak and languid, but as the day declined, she seemed to revive a little. Her anxious family were seated round her bedside, watching her pale countenance, when suddenly she raised herself from the pillow, and with flashing eyes, and a voice clear and strong as in the days of her health, she began warbling the beautiful air which she had sung once only, on that fatal last night, whose triumph cost her—life. None offered to arrest her, and as the last notes died away, her head sank back on the pillow. Her mother raised her gently, but the last struggle was over, and the spirit of Emma Beaumont had passed away in that gush of heart-stirring melody.

The Nashua.

SWEET Nashua! on thy vine-clad banks,
The autumn flowers are bright,
But tell me in the dewy morn,
Or pensive evening light,
Do they not miss my well known step
Along the pleasant way,
Where thou wert wont to welcome me,
Mine own dear Nashua?

How vain the thought! yet still to them,
My heart in sadness turned,
And we are prone to think our love
Must be with love returned.
Beneath my window bloom fair flowers,
The brilliant and the gay,
More dear to me were one wild wreath
From thee, sweet Nashua.

They say thou'rt but a tiny stream
Nor can with theirs compare,

To them my earnest heart replies—
'Love makes its favorite fair.'
With silvery flow the Delaware,
Is glancing on my way,
It ne'er may be so dear as thou,
Mine own loved Nashua.

Within thy vales, sweet woodland stream!
Fair smiles my early home;—
And 'mid thy wild and sunny dells,
Where I was wont to roam,
Are there not some true, gentle hearts
In love's pure faith to pray,
For blessings on the wanderer's path,
Mine own sweet Nashua?

It must be so; my heart to them
Its changeless love hath given,
Their lightest tones have been to me
Like childhood's dream of Heaven;
And 'tis this fond undoubting trust
That bids my thoughts thus stray,
To thy clematis-enwreathed banks,
Mine own wild Nashua.

Oh, deem not this the murmuring strain,
Of a repining one,
For hope and faith around my path,
Their fairest wreaths have thrown.
Love's gentlest tones have cheered my steps,
And soothed each care away,
Since first I wandered from thy side,
Mine own fair Nashua.

Yet e'er amid their social glee,
I seem as in a dream,
If but one look or tone recall
Thy vales, wild woodland stream!
They playful chide my wandering thoughts,
And ask me where they stray?
'Unto mine own New England home,
Mine own dear Nashua!'

Then, gentle stream, be thou to them
As thou hast been to me,
A friend in every varying mood,
Of sadness or of glee.
And bid them sometimes think of one
Who now is far away,
From her sweet cottage home beside
The deep blue Nashua.

A thousand pleasant memories dwell
Amid thy forest flowers.
Of gentle friends who still may rove
Amid thy woodland bowers.
I would that none save their fond eyes
Might rest upon this lay,
For they will love it for my sake,
Who love the Nashua.

Memories and Friends.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON. May

I DWELL in the midst of 'haunted ground.' The voices of the loved are lingering in every pleasant spot around my home. I hear the echo of familiar steps in every nook of the dear glen, and gentle eyes beam on me from thicket, and bower, and from the corners of my own apartment, so consecrated by precious memories, and by local associations.

Do you remember, mon compagnon, and you, gentle spirit of 'Home Vale,' that far-away bank of green, where Spring had thrown her earliest violets, and the yellow cinquefoil looked up at us and smiled as we seated ourselves lovingly down at its side? The tall trees swept over us, and far off in the pine woodlands the mellow voice of the thrush rang out like spirit melody, moving us almost to tears. It is haunted there, and the spirits of the absent meet me as I walk, and take my hands in theirs, and lead me back to days forever past.

When the wind-flowers were no longer whitening the hill-side, and the cardinals were lifting their blushing heads from the middle of the stream that laves its base, the form of a gentle and a beautiful one was at my side, and her merry laugh mingled with the songs of the birds, and the rippling of the waves. The spirit of poetry was in her pure soul; it beamed from her eyes, and revealed itself in the articulate melody of her lips. There is a path through a sweet woodland that has known her step; and her spirit still haunts the shadow of a tall tree that swung its branches over us as we sat there, reading and talking of God and of Heaven.

Bright Spirit! leave me not alone! In woodland and garden walk let me still recognize thine attendance. Thou hast known my weakness; thou shalt yet know my strength. I will mould my thoughts to thy thoughts, and my spirit to thine. Thou art true; and I will be true. Thou art real, and in this world of falsity, God bless thee that thou art so! for the substantial and the tangible, even though unlovely, is worth far more than the beautiful that is illusive. Leave me not ma chère, for thou art no shadow; and to lean upon thee, is to rest.

Others came and went, leaving memorials as they passed—memorials upon the heart and the mind, as well as upon more tangible objects that were around me. Records that are seared into the very soul have been left to do their work; a silent and a painful work—God grant that it be not in vain!

But 'let the dead past bury its dead;' there are enough of the 'essentially immortal' to people life's solitudes; and these are yet remaining to me. Ye leal spirits, mon frères, who annually gladden my village home with your cheerful voices and smiles, permit the simplest tribute from one not ungrateful for the blessed influences you have left behind. You have left 'footprints,' not only on 'the sands of time' but in the green oases of a heart that aspires to be true, and that owes half of its strength to your counsels, and half of its sunshine to your kindness. May God lift upon you the light of his countenance, and bless you forever and forevermore!

From another and a fairer land came a pilgrim bearing the palm branch of the New Jerusalem. 'A bright little isle' over the seas gave him birth, but the flowers of the prairie had beguiled him to the land of the setting sun, where he had built him a home, and brightened it with human flowers. Ah, mon bon père, I owe thee many a debt of gratitude for thy counsel and kindness; and I pray thee be lenient to my transgressions, which are so frequent and so manifold. Peace be in thy country home; and a blessing on 'Crichton Cottage' forever!

Among the Green Mountains of the North are ringing merry voices, and sparkling merry eyes that lately sung and glanced within my home. Music and song have ceased; and we have grown suddenly 'deaf' to all melodies but the gentle home-voices, and the fitful strains of my neglected accordion.

'The robin and the wren are flown,
And from the shrubs the jay,
And from the wood-top calls the crow
Thro' all the gloomy day.'

A vision, half-real and half the spirit of a dream, is gliding before me. A gentle hand beckons me, and I follow. A kind eye smiles on me, and I am in tears. Ma chère Louisa, it is thy footstep which has latest crossed our threshold, and it is thou who hast latest left me lonely. Thou haunter of my solitude, thou intruder into my dreams, thou guardian spirit of love and truth, abide with me, I entreat thee, and learn me to be strong as thou art strong, and wise as thou art wise. Sweet be the music of thy loved Oriskany, and soft be Dian's beam upon thy home; but suffer thy spirit to turn from these, at times, and to shed its holy influences upon the heart of thy simple friend. I will listen for thy voice at night, and 'in thy orisons, be all my sins remembered!'

Spirits, beautiful and blest, abide with me till the hour cometh. Suffer me to follow you in the march of life, toilsome and rugged though the way may be. 'Entreat me not to leave you, nor to return from following after you—for whither you go, I will go; your people shall be my people, and your God my God. Where you die will I die, and there will I be buried. The Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part you and me.'

New Exposition of 'Lord's Prayer.'

MR. LEE in his controversy with Br. Thomas, in treating of God as a father, says of the Lord's Prayer,—'It was designed for those who are the children of God by adoption, as were the disciples whom Jesus taught thus to pray, in which sense I have shown all men are not the children of God.'

If this be true, then parents have been engaged in a useless and wrong labor while they have taught their young children to use this prayer—they should have waited till they were spiritually adopted as God's children.

Again, if this be true, then the term our, designed to awaken the social feeling in prayer, has but a very limited meaning, signifying the spiritual brotherhood; and there is no intimation that it is the duty of the christian to think of, or pray for a larger circle of human beings than those he regards as the adopted children of God. When he prays—'Give us this day our daily bread,' he is to think of and feel for the temporal well being of the brotherhood only; he is to pray only that the brotherhood may not be led into temptation, or overcome by evil.

On such an interpretation is the very stamp of partialism. It breathes the very spirit of aristocracy, and is directly opposed to the generous philanthropy of Jesus.

O how it does take away the beauty and glory of the Lord's Prayer, and how unworthy it makes it of him who was the friend of sinners, who tasted death for every man, and who is declared to be 'the same yesterday, to-day, and forever.' What spirit would be begotten in a child whose heart should be fully imbrued with such a narrow spirit! And when the faithful would obey the exhortation—'Supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men,' they must not use the Lord's Prayer, lest they forget the contracted meaning of 'Our Father!'

When the minister rises to pray for the 'great congregation,' where all characters are assembled, and opens his prayer with the words of our Lord as noticed, does he mean the unregenerated shall not understand him as using the expression—'Our Father, which art in heaven,' as including them in the feeling that impelled the choice or use of those words? This matter should be understood; and if Mr. Lee's interpretation be adopted, we shall perceive more consistency between the sermons and prayers of our limitarian salvationist brethren. B.

Obituary.

DIED, in this city Sept. 10th., Mrs. Hannah, wife of Capt. Wentworth Knights, aged 58 years. During a painful illness of ten years, she bore the sufferings she was called to endure with christian resignation, in humble submission to that Power whose dealings with his children are all-wise and good in their issues. While we sympathize with the afflicted husband and children, we rejoice with them in the manifestations of the worth and power of the religion of Jesus Christ by which they enjoyed her counsels and admonitions till the last moment of her earthly existence, and we pray that they may know as fully and experience as happily the goodness and love of God. Romance of Woman. No. 3.

THE MAID OF DAMASCUS.

DURING the siege of Damascus by the Arabs, two betrothed lovers attempted to escape from the city at night. One horseman passed the gate in safety, but was immediately seized by the enemy without. He gave a warning to the lady, and she hastened her return to the city. But the captive lover, being carried to Khaled's tent, was offered his choice; 'death, or the Koran.' He swore allegiance to the Prophet; and his bride, in disgust, retired to a nunnery within the city. Here her lover met her with entreaties to return to him; but she was firm. Having afterwards fallen into his power, she coolly plunged a dagger into her bosom, preferring death to life in the arms of an infidel and a traitor. The following poem supposes her at the nunnery.

PHOCYAS.

COME to the Moslem's tent, my gentle love!
There from the deadly scimitar and spear
Thy life shall be secure; there shalt thou learn
The sweet Arabian songs the houries sing;
And I will teach thee to repeat to me
The wisdom of the Koran. At the call
Of muezzin shall thou kneel in private prayer,
And count thy beads, and call on Allah's name.
Come, sweet Eudocia, leave these gloomy walls
Where love can have no voice, and learn the bliss
That waits thee in the Prophet's paradise.
I pray thee haste! the fearful tocbir* sounds

* The Arabian war-ery.

Within the city gates; and Khaled's troops
Are merciless as demons. Let us flee
Ere yet it is too late—Oh let us flee!

EUDOCIA.

Go, feeble traitor! thou art safe from wounds;
The crescent and the turban are thy shield.
Go, seek in kisses from the Islam maids
The pleasure that alone can satisfy
Thy craven love. The ties that held thee once
To country and to God, thy reckless soul
Hath broken; think'st thou, then, our hearts were bound
With stronger links? No, Phocyas, thou art free!
As thou forgettest Heaven, forget thy bride!
I have a higher troth—my nuptial torch
Is lit in Heaven, and thou canst never draw
My spirit from its holy rites away.
Go call on Allah—I will seek my God!

PHOCYAS.

Nay, sweet Eudocia, thou hast little dreamed
The dangers that await thee shouldst thou fall
Within the Arab's grasp. For worse than death Might be thy destiny.

EUDOCIA.

And who art thou
That talkest of the Arab? What worse fate
Than dwelling in thy treacherous arms
Could e'er befall me?—Leave me to my lot;
Be it or death or slavery, it were bliss
To what thy love would proffer! I am free!
Talk to the wild bird, battling with the storm,
Of shelter in the cage; or woo the kid
From the bluff rocks to nestle at thy feet;
But mock not me with bribes! I dare defy
All terrors save the knawing worm that feeds
On traitor's hearts. My peace I find with God.

PHOCYAS.

But home, Eudocia; beautiful Damascus,
Where the Barrada flows in light and song,
And palms and olives weave their verdant crowns
To shade thee from the heat. Thou canst not leave
This sweet oasis, which had power to tempt
The Prophet with its beauty;* 'tis thy home.
Here hast thou played in childhood; here thy heart
First owned its gentle love. By the bright founts
That sparkle in the glades, and 'neath the vines
That hang their wreaths from giant sycamores,
Thy lips have breathed their vows, and thy sweet eyes
Gazed on me through their tears. And is it past,— Forever past—the love that once was mine,
Mine only? Nay, it must not be. For thee
I deigned to live; for thee forswore my God
And bowed at Allah's shrine; and wilt thou spurn
For this the faithful love of by-gone years?
Damascus now is trodden by the feet
Of strangers; and the crescent from her towers
Will soon be gleaming; whither wilt thou flee
To find a shrine for prayer? The desert is around—
The wide, drear desert that can yield no rest;
There will they hunt thee, and the crucifix
That lies upon thy breast will be no shield.

EUDOCIA.

I care not for all this; enough for me
That I can still be true through pain and death.
Thou talk'st to me of home—my home is Heaven
Since thou art false. Damascus has been loved Almost like Paradise; but little care I now
For fount, or garden, or Barrada's songs.
I journey on to the Eternal Home

* When Mohammed first descried Damascus, he exclaimed that he only desired to enjoy one paradise; and for fear of estranging his feelings from the one he had in anticipation hereafter, he would not enter this.

Beyond the grave, and little care how soon
The weary march is o'er. Go, speed thee back
To Khaled's camp, and seek a meeker bride.
In vain thy prayers, thy warnings, and thy tears.
Sooner than be thy wife, I'll bare my breast
To every sword among the Arab host!
Return thee to thy treachery and thy strife—
I seek for peace with God. Phocyas, farewell! S. C. E.

Education.

EDUCATION is a very comprehensive term. It includes the whole course of physical, moral, religious and scientific instruction and discipline.

The first great object of a scientific and literary education is, to expand and strengthen the intellect—to cultivate and improve the mind. This object is not always kept in view. Many in a course of instruction, have respect only to those studies, which give a superficial knowledge of a few subjects connected with some particular business or profession. Many a student is satisfied with a mechanical knowledge of those sciences indispensably necessary to transact the ordinary business of life. If we would encourage him to follow up the stream of science to its fountain head, and from thence trace, through all their meandering courses, the thousand rivulets which issue from it, he meets us with the question, What use will it be to me? Is it of no importance to you, by a course of studious discipline, to acquire a command over your own mind, so as to bring it to bear on any subject you please? Will it be of no use for you to develop the resources of the mind, to bring its powers to maturity, and to make it what it was designed to be, the greatest, the noblest work of God? Who has measured the extent of the powers of the human mind? Who knows the force and energy of its operations? Follow it in its bold and daring flights: See it bringing the heavens down to the earth, and subjecting to its examination planets, and suns, and systems of worlds of endless variety. Escaping from its earthly home, it darts away beyond the borders of our own world, to the distant regions of space, where Saturn, the exiled monarch, reigns over his attendant moons, or far distant Herschel pursues his tedious and solitary way, or the fixed stars from age to age pour their brilliant rays upon the worlds which revolve about them. The powerful mind of Newton extends its irrevocable laws over the sun, and wandering comets. The dominion of mind is more extensive and lasting over the world of men, and often more effective and powerful in its control, than ever was the sceptre of the mightiest monarch. Alexander conquered the world; but no sooner was he dead, than the subdued nations returned to their former state. But Aristotle, his preceptor, by the mere energy of his mind, exercised unlimited control over the opinions of men for sixteen centuries. All the projects and plans of conquest of Charles 5th, terminated at his retirement from power; but in his time, Luther, a man in the common rank of life, but of a giant mind, commenced the reformation. At his word, as if by magic touch, the world arose from its long sleep of a thousand years. The impress of his mind was stamped on the reformation, and his influence will be felt, till the glories of the millennial day shall consummate his labors.

The works of human art and grandeur perish. The trophies and monuments of victory, the splendid domes and edifices of antiquity, have crumbled to dust; but the imperishable works of mind still remain. The land of Eneas, with its Xanthus and Ida, would have been hidden in oblivion, and the heroes who fought on the plains of Troy would have been forgotten, had not their fame and fate been rendered imperishable by the powerful genius of the Grecian bard. Greece, with her Parnassian hills, Tempean vales, Acadian groves, her warlike cities and brave souls, would scarcely have been known to us, but for the eagle genius of her poets, the acute investigations of her philosophers, and the thrilling energy of her orators. Virgil, Cicero, and Tacitus, by their mental efforts, have done more to make their country remembered, than Cæsar, with all his conquests, and Augustus, with all his power. When in future ages the British empire shall have become what the Roman now is, and Cromwell forgotten, and the conqueror of Waterloo scarcely named, Milton and Scott will continue to be read and admired, and to recall the fast fading images of other times. And the time may come, when the monument on Bunker's Hill shall have crumbled to dust, and the 'Father of his country' be all but forgotten, while the philosophical trophies of Franklin, and the intellects of those whose powerful minds have been devoted to the interests of science and literature, shall still remain more imperishable than marble or granite, to tell future generations what we have been.

This World.

THIS is an agreeable world, after all. If we would only bring ourselves to look at the objects that surround us in their true light, we should see beauty where before we could behold nothing but discord. To be sure, there is a great deal of anxiety and vexation to meet, we cannot expect to sail on a summer sea forever; yet, if we hold a calm eye and a steady hand, we soon can trim our sails and manage our helm so as to avoid the quicksand and weather the storms that threaten shipwreck. We are members of one great family—we are travelling the same road—and shall arrive at the same goal. We breathe the free air, we are subject to the same bounty, and we shall lie down on the bosom of our common mother. It is not becoming then, that brother should hate brother; it is not proper that friends should hate friends; it is not right that neighbor should deceive neighbor. We pity the man who can harbor enmity towards his fellow; he loses half the enjoyment of life; he embitters his own existence.—Let us tear from our eyes the colored medium that invests every object with the green hue of jealousy and suspicion; turn a deaf ear to the voice of scandal; breathe the spirit of charity from our lips; and from our hearts let the rich gushings of human kindness swell up as from a fountain—so the 'golden age' will become no fiction, and the 'island of the blessed' bloom in more than Hesperian beauty.

Our Book and Memoranda Table.

IMPORTANT MATTER. It is of great importance to me that delinquent subscribers and those indebted, on account, for more than six months, should give attention to this call. I have several large sums to make out next month, and I depend on those indebted to me, for the means. Bills will be sent in this No. to those subscribers who dwell in places where there are no regular agents, and I hope that the sums due will be promptly transmitted, or the delay will be charged according to our terms. Agents will confer a great favor by making an effort to collect what is due, and sending immediately. And to preachers I strongly appeal, and to others indebted on account from six months to two years. To each, the extension of credit may not seem a matter of any considerable importance, but to one having a large number of debtors inattentive to the terms of business, and thereby perplexed in not receiving remittances as he has a right to expect, the matter is a serious one. Each should so regard it, and it is essential to an honorable trade that it should be so regarded. I must not, therefore, extend, in general cases, the credit of book accounts beyond six months, and let all concerned take generous notice of this. ¶ Let each person intended in this notice, ponder well the call, and not put it away till he has honestly decided upon his duty. I do hope that I shall have my confidence increased more and more in my regular customers, by the manner in which this notice will be answered. The great want must be answered before the 15th of December. A. T.

THE POETRY OF THE SEASONS. In press, and soon to be published, a small volume entitled as above, from the pen of a lady whose poetical contributions have been well received by our readers. We have not seen the work, and therefore can only say, that it contains stories for every month in the year—probably illustrative of the peculiarities of each month, or their respective seasons. The theme is a grand one, and we have reason to believe it will be found well treated. It will be published in a good style, and be out in time for Christmas and New Year's Presents.

ROSE OF SHARON. This Annual continues to receive the favorable notice of the press, and a good degree of attention from purchasers of the season books. We have not seen an unfavorable notice of this work thus far, and do not expect to meet such,—therefore we continue to remark that it will give satisfaction to those who may select it for a parlor book or a present. Price $2.

COUSIN LUCY'S STORIES, COUSIN LUCY'S CONVERSATIONS. We have received from the publisher, B. B. Mussey, copies of two very neat juvenile works with the above titles. They are by the author of the 'Rollo Books,' a series that has been very popular indeed, large editions having been sold. That series was intended particularly for boys, but the series commenced by these volumes is intended for girls. We doubt not that these volumes will receive the same favor as the others, and therefore we commend them to public attention. We shall read them at our leisure.

ALETHES, OR THE ROMAN EXILE; AND LEISURE HOURS, by John K. Laskey. We acknowledge the receipt of a neat volume from some friend, containing 'A Tale founded upon incidents in the reign of Marcus Aurelius, emperor of Rome,' and a collection of poems. The tale we have not read, though we mean to; but the poems we have examined, and they have the true fire. The author is a poet. In his poems are some fine and magnificent strains, that bespeak a mind rich in true poetic wealth, and he cannot keep from increasing the store. From intimations in the volume, we are led to expect something of a more labored execution than the present, and we are ready to give it a true welcome. We know not where the volume is to be found on sale.

PORTRAIT OF REV. OTIS A. SKINNER. We acknowledge with pleasure the present from Br. Tompkins, of a copy of a very elegant, engraved portrait of Br. Skinner—engraved by Sartain, from a painting by A. G. Hoit. The likeness is most excellent, though, to our eye, the form is too massive, representing the person heavier than the original. This may not strike another so. The expression is very natural, so that the portrait will be recognized at a glance, and it will be very highly valued by a very large circle of friends. May our brother ever possess those kind and generous affections that give the pleasantness the painter transferred from his countenance to the canvas and the engraver to the plate.

CHRISTIAN GRACES. We are pleased to perceive that this little volume has received universal commendation from the press, similar in character to the following from Br. Drew of the Gospel Banner:

'Christian Graces. This is the title of a new book lately put into our hands for examination, by Br. A. Tompkins of Boston. It consists of a series of Essays, which were originally published in the "Ladies' Repository," from the pen of Mrs. Bacon, wife of Br. H. Bacon of Marblehead. It is a very neat affair; we have read enough of it to be satisfied that it is a valuable book; and a daughter, who knows better the merits of such things than we do, absolutely declares to us it is one of the best things which ever came into our family. The illustrations of the Virtues, as laid down by Paul in Gal. v. 22, 23, are made peculiarly interesting by pertinent stories which are happily interwoven into the work.'

We commend it to our friends as a good present book for the coming holidays. Neatly printed and bound.

THE UNIVERSALIST. We should have noticed the new—the 3d—volume of this periodical, formerly the Connecticut Universalist, had we had the first No. to remind us of the courtesy. But the fourth or fifth No. is the earliest we have seen, and therefore now take the opportunity to say that the paper is published by George W. Concklin, Middletown, Ct., and is edited by Brs. John Moore, A. A. Folsom, and Merrit Sandford, which array affords sufficient promise of an interesting and profitable work. The new volume commenced in August, and we wish the publisher and conductors success.

GOSPEL MESSENGER, Providence, R. I. We have received by mail, a copy of the Prospectus for the second volume of this periodical, edited by Br. Z. Baker. Br. Baker has been active, and (we have every reason to believe) well meaning in conducting this work. We wish him all desirable success, and a willingness to receive with good feeling all criticisms. We welcome them in reference to ourself. The Messenger is published every Saturday, at one dollar a year, in advance. Agents are to be held responsible for subscribers, and all business letters are to be post paid or free.

NEW YORK CHRISTIAN MESSENGER. About the time our next No. will be issued, this valuable periodical will have entered a new volume, and we earnestly desire to call attention to it. And this we do, because we esteem it as, at least, one of the best papers in the denomination, judging from a review of the whole—during the past year. There has been a closeness of editorial application, and a vigor of intellect, which have given to it a valuable and ever interesting character. The mass of good, sound reading has been great, and its variety most commendable. While controversy has occupied much of its space, the wants of those who love calmer reading, and the young, have not been forgotten. Br. Price should be encouraged by a large and good addition to his subscription list. Br. Sawyer deserves the considerate thanks of the denomination for his industry and energy of mind given to these columns, while his lady should be honorably mentioned for the interest she has added to the work in the Ladies and Juvenile Department, Brs. Rayner, Williamson, Hallock, and a large number of contributors, furnish a great and good variety. The Messenger is always well printed, and on good paper. It must be well sustained. Published every Saturday, at two dollars, in advance—large folio size. Address 'Union and Messenger, 130 Fulton St. New York. Same paper octavo form, $2.50, strictly in advance.

PHILADELPHIA NAZARENE. This useful periodical commences a new volume on the first of January next, and will continue to be devoted to the advocacy and inculcation of sound doctrine and pure morality, under the editorial care of Brs. A. Moore, T. D. Cook, John Perry, and John H. Gihon. Price $2 per annum. Weekly, folio. Gihon, Fairchild, & Co. publishers. Is there a difference between 'Universalism' and 'Practical Christianity'? It would seem so, by the Prospectus.

ESSEX QUARTERLY CONFERENCE. We wish we had space to speak of the excellence and power of the last meeting in Georgetown. It was rich—the friends did well, and all were satisfied. We must refer to it again. The adjournment was to Danvers—with Br. Austin's Society.

STATUARY. E. BRACKETT. We intended to have expressed our admiration of the works of this artist ere this, but have been prevented by want of space. We cannot resist the impression that Mr. Brackett is a son of genius when we look upon his productions; and the more we examine, the deeper is our admiration of his skill. His most prominent work is the group of the 'Binding of Satan,' [Rev. xx.] the effect of which is fine, illustrating 'the ascendancy of the spiritual over the natural, and the triumph of good over evil.' 'I have,' says the artist, 'endeavored to contrast the Satanic energy of evil with the angelic influence of goodness. While the former is writhing under the agony of hatred and revenge disarmed of their power, the latter does not glory in the superior strength which he is conscious of possessing from above, but approaches as the holy messenger of Heaven, commissioned to restrain the might of evil. I have endeavored in the one figure to express the apparent superiority of evil, and in the other the actual superiority of goodness; hence the spiritual or moral character of the one figure, contrasted with the natural or physical character of the other.' In accomplishing this he has been eminently successful; and his work gives great promise for the future. But the success of his efforts will be more apparent to general observers in the busts he has executed. We could not wish him better success than is seen in the bust of Sprague the poet, which is recognized in a moment by those acquainted with the original, and is praised the more it is examined. The naturalness of his busts is confessed by all with whom we have conversed who have visited his rooms; and one, that of Mrs. Seba Smith, is enchanting. When did we ever see a sweeter face than hers! One so full of a happy home and domestic affections!

We wish our friend all desirable success. He has chosen a difficult profession, and one that will subject him to 'the stern agony of thought;' but we trust the spirit of his noble art will impel him on and give him the elasticity of a hopeful mind.

STEPHENS' TRAVELS IN CENTRAL AMERICA. A very slight notice of the above mentioned work lately appeared in the Repository, and I then hoped to see a more extended one from the same pen, but as that is not forthcoming, I fear, I will venture my humble opinion on its merits. The portion of country visited by this now celebrated traveler was but little known, and this circumstance gives a novelty to his descriptions of men and things rarely to be found. He is evidently not romantic in the common and misapplied use of that word, and the reader feels sure that the scenes described really exist; and will more than answer the expectations of subsequent travelers whose curiosity Mr. Stephens has helped to awaken. As far as natural scenery is concerned, Central America may be considered the Eden of earth, but a more degraded class of people than its inhabitants, it would be difficult to find. The country was enduring the horrors of civil war, and a licentious soldiery, with Carrera at their head, were triumphing over the lives and liberties of their fellow citizens.

With a perseverance few could imitate, he surmounted difficulties that would appal a stout heart, and returned to his native city to pour out the treasures of his rich experience, and raise another, perhaps the most glorious monument to his not unhonored name. The most interesting part of his work relates to the remains of ancient cities which are scattered over this remote portion of our land. Their inhabitants, their very names have perished, and strangers tread the pavements of their stately palaces and temples and speculate upon the probable causes of their desolation. Hours passed among these ruins must richly repay for months of arduous toil. These noble books are ornamented with engravings that do credit alike to the designs and execution. Mr. Stephens' coadjutor, Mr. Catherwood, to whom we are indebted for the embellishments, sustains his well earned reputation. One of the most pleasing features of the work is the kindly feelings with which these two experienced travelers regard each other, and the noble heart which beams from every page, enlists our sympathy and good wishes 'ere we are aware.' To one and all I would say, read these volumes attentively and you cannot fail to gather profit and pleasure. IONE.

A FEATHER IN OUR PRINTER'S CAP. Br. Baker, in noticing our Sept. number, says, (the italicising is ours)—'The Ladies' Repository for Sept. is unusually interesting. Rich in thought, beautiful in expression, and what is of more consequence, exceeding in mechanical execution any Magazine we have ever seen.' The style of typography is of more consequence than richness of thought or beauty of expression!

TAKE NOTICE. When in New York city Br. Odgen paid me $2 for Miss Freeman of Troy, formerly of Saratoga. I find by reference to the books, that she is already credited for vol. 10. What shall we do? Place it to her account for vol. 11, or is there a mistake? B.

ANCIENT HISTORY OF UNIVERSALISM. It is well known that H. Ballou 2d's history is one of the most excellent volumes in our libraries, and is of great interest and value. It has long been out of print, and a new edition has been loudly called for. It seems that now we are to have our wishes satisfied, as Br. Z. Baker of Providence, R. I., has issued proposals for publishing a new edition in good style at $1 per copy. The work has been revised by the author, and additions have been made, so that the value of the work will be enhanced. We trust that the publisher will find this a profitable investment, and that in this hope he will send the work forth in a good dress.

CONVENTION SERMONS. Br. Price of the Messenger and Union, New York, proposes to publish in a volume the Sermons delivered in that city, during the last session of the United States Convention. The work will be a good one and valuable, and we shall be glad to hail it. It will make a neat 18mo. volume, and will be sold at from 50 to 75 cts. per copy. Mr. Tompkins will have the work as soon as issued.

TEMPERANCE ALMANAC. We have received the Temperance Almanac for 1842, published by Wm. S. Darnell, Boston, and from a glance at it, regard it as an interesting affair—i. e. a good Almanac, with temperance articles and 'picters to match,' as Major Downing has it.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE LAW OF KINDNESS. Our notices were all made up when this work was put into our hands, and we defer a notice till next month; but in the mean time give the following from the Mercantile Journal of this city.

"The Law of Kindness," is the name of a valuable work by Rev. G. W. Montgomery, and for sale by Tappan & Dennet, in this city. It is full of illustrations of the power which the law of kindness exercises on the human heart—that kindness which is everywhere inculcated by the lessons and actions of our Savior—that kindness which should be a conspicuous trait in the character of a christian."

TO CORRESPONDENTS AND READERS. We earnestly hope we shall soon hear again from our new correspondents 'Charlotte' and 'G. R. L.' Their favors are very acceptable. The story by the former is written in an easy, flowing and good style, and though it be the first composition of the kind by the writer, it contains great promise of future excellence. The poem by the latter, which will be published in our next No., will, we opine, be received and read with interest, and will be found suitable to be recited in many of our Sabbath Schools.

We are glad that Julia remembered us in the city of brotherly love. Her musical poem will be read with pleasure. We hope early to hear again from her. Some sketches of sights seen and sounds heard, would be acceptable. Philadelphia is full of wonders, and people love to read of them. Will she gratify our readers in this?

The lines on page 218 to S. C. E., must be gratifying to sister Sarah, as the lines 'In answer to a Remark,' on page 223 must be to her whose tribute to the author shows that she has admired the strong religious spirit that has characterized S. C. E.'s poetry. May they both rejoice with the same enthusiasm of faith that now gladdens them.

We should be glad to hear from J. A. J. again. 'Elegiac Stanzas' by F. H. W. in our next.

SECOND VERSE.

How sweetly bloomed the gay green birk,
 How rich the hawthorn's blossom,
 As underneath their fragrant shade,
 I clasp'd her to my bosom !
 The golden hours, on angel wings,
 Flew o'er me and my dearie ;
 For dear to me as light and life
 Was my sweet Highland Mary.

THIRD VERSE.

Wi' mony a vow and lock'd embrace,
 Our parting was fu' tender ;
 And pledging oft to meet again,
 We tore ourselves asunder.
 But oh ! fell death's untimely frost,
 That nipt my flower sae early !
 Now green's the sod and cold's the clay
 That wraps my Highland Mary.

FOURTH VERSE.

O pale, pale now those rosy lips,
 I aft ha'e kissed so fondly !
 And clos'd for aye the sparkling glance
 That dwelt on me so kindly !
 And mouldering now in silent dust,
 That heart that lo'd me dearly !
 But still within my bosom's core
 Shall live my Highland Mary.

CHAPTER VI. MERCY.

‘BLESSED are the merciful; for they shall obtain mercy.’

IF God were not more merciful to man than man is to his fellows, how abject would be his state! This thought has awakened startling emotions in the mind of the reflecting, and made them pause in sadness to contemplate the moral aspect of our world. It is a thought full of wise meaning, leading, as with the spell of an awful enchanter, to many and various scenes in active life, arraying before us the past history of man, bringing forth the dead of the battle field and the prison graves, and exhibiting the power and fearfulness of those passions that knew not, and would not know, aught of mercy. The monuments of human wrath are not few, and the records of its desolations are many among the ponderous tomes of the past; and when the fierce vulture flies onward for its prey, casting its dark shadows on the green earth and the bright waters, it will ever be a type of man's unmerciful power over man.

God not more merciful than man! the thought were maddening, calling up from the vision house of imagination spectres as awful as guilt ever created. He is more merciful, as he is wiser, holier, more compassionate than man; and it is ours, as well as the lamenting Jeremiah's, to exclaim, ‘It is of the Lord's mercies we are not consumed!’ And upon those compassionate mercies which are now our preservation and joy, rests the hope of our world-embracing faith respecting the eternal destiny of our race; and while cherubim and seraphim veil their faces before the brightness of that mercy which radiates heaven, and streams down from the eternal throne the light of life to every creature, the heart and soul may rest strong in their confidence in the universality of redeeming and sanctifying grace.

In order to honor God in our conceptions of his mercy, it becomes us to recognize it in harmony with all his infinite and adorable perfections—the mercy of an infinite God. We must become impressed with the reality of the divine mercy, with its constant activity, universality, and eternal continuance as such, ere we can rejoice in the fullness of hope; and possessing these ideas, we shall understand how truly the divine mercy accords with the spirit of those noble and philanthropic commands of the christian scriptures, which require a constant expansion of the affections and continuous increase of human sympathies.

The apostle Paul in one of his epistles, styled the Deity, ‘the blessed,’ or happy ‘God!’ By connecting this with the beatitude to be considered, there is a holy thought excited in the mind. Happy are the merciful; the happy God. The one in degree, the other in perfection; because in the one mercy is not pure and free, while in the Deity it is without mixture of enmity, and free and boundless as the need of it. How well then can we sing—

‘But though Thy brightness may create
All worship from the hosts above,
What most thy name must elevate
Is, that thou art a God of love!
And mercy is the central sun
Of all thy glories joined in one.’

How vain is the declaration often made, that ‘a God all mercy is a God unjust!’ As well say, that a ray of white light cannot contain other colors. And men have had and cherished their false and degrading ideas of the character of God, simply because—deny it if they will—they have not believed that the attributes of his perfections are in harmony and unite in one, as all the colors unite in one white ray of light. ‘God is light, and in him is no darkness at all!’ is the language of John, and what sublime language! How descriptive of his perfection! How elevating the feeling of the soul that grasps and holds in clear view the idea it enfolds, and gazes till by its own transfixing power it is engraven on the eternal tablet of thought! Who would deny in the presence of Newton and science that the red, the blue, and the green—types of justice, faithfulness, and jealousy, and the other colors—emblematic of other moral qualities—cannot be concentrated into one? Darken the room—let the light enter through a small aperture—fall through a triangular prism upon a white sheet, and you will behold all the colors there painted; take a lens and concentrate on one spot these different colored rays, and they will reproduce colorless light. Or paint upon a wheel the seven—scripture type of perfection—primitive colors,—turn it swiftly, and a circle of pale white will only be seen. Let this be spiritualized according to the testimony that God is light and in him is no darkness at all, and what will become of those doctrines of men that exalt justice, like a frowning tyrant, to the throne of the Deity, withering with his dark scowl the hope of millions? They perish, as perishes darkness before light. God's attributes are separated by man's wants, but united in one by his own perfection. Some of the colors of light abstractly considered seem to promise little union with the beautiful white without affecting its purity, yet we know that in reality there is no opposition; so with some of the attributes of the Deity separately considered. As we look upon them as divided by the mental prism between the Perfect and the Imperfect, they appear so diverse that it is difficult to believe they can be united in one and that love. But the lens of divine truth will prove it; and faith and hope will rejoice with exceeding great joy while they recognize mercy as being blended with every purpose and design of the Deity toward man; and from the depths of affection and reverence will go up a song of praise to unite with the heavenly anthem of 'Alleluiah, the Lord God omnipotent reigneth!'

Through how many channels runs blessedness to man from the mercy of God! So with man's being merciful to man. Shakspeare has said, and his words are familiar—

'It droppeth, as the gentle rain from heaven
Upon the place beneath: it is twice blessed;
It blesseth him that gives, and him that takes;
'Tis mightiest in the mightiest; it becomes
The throned monarch better than his crown.

Earthly power doth then show likest God's,
When mercy seasons justice.'

And is not this in harmony with the christian teachings? Certainly it is; and what higher recommendation can be needed or given to persuade us to exercise that mercy which is twice blessed?

'Happy are the merciful; for they shall obtain mercy.' This declaration is grounded in the common infirmities of man, and that, created and situated as he is, he both needs mercy and to exercise it. A non-remembrance of the first necessity, is the cause, in a great degree, of his not obeying the other. He forgets how much he needs, and is miserly in his gifts to others; for let but a man consider, with concentration and seriousness of thought, the imperfections of his temper, feelings, and conduct—let him recall how much he has been unmindful of the feelings and interests of others—and how often he has erred from the standard of the Master, and he must feel, with deep sorrow of heart, how much he needs of mercy from God and man! If the human eye were to judge of his character without mercy, what would be the judgment? A judgment from which he would shrink, as guilt flies from thought; and shall this creature be unmerciful towards others? Hear the lesson of the sweet parable of German origin, entitled, Man the offspring of Mercy. When the Almighty said, Let us create man! he called the angels of the attributes, and they stood in their brightness before the glorious throne, and spake as the spirit of their nature dictated. Create him not! cried the angel of Peace, for he will deluge the earth in blood and wake the demons of war; the first born of his race will kill his brother. Create him not! cried the angel of Justice, for he will oppress his brethren, the weak will rule the strong, and the cunning the ignorant. Create him not! cried the angel of Truth; he will be false to his vow, treacherous in speech, defiling thy sanctuary with hypocrisy, and will learn his fellow to deceive. When they had spoken, and the earnestness of their voice, look, and manner, proved that they would that paradise might not know man, the angel of Mercy, the loveliest of the train, and that ever with meek eye and compassionate speech, lingered near the throne, uttered her plea,—Create him, Father! in thine own likeness, and the darling of thy love. When all thy angels forsake him, I will seek and turn his faults to good; because he is weak, I will incline him to compassion, and to reconciliation with the erring; when he strays from peace, from truth, from justice, his wanderings shall not satisfy him, and he shall seek to return, and I will lead him to them again, and he shall be thine forever. Father, create him!—He was created, a weak, faltering being, but in his waywardness the pupil of Mercy—Mercy, the child of ever ameliorating love. Remember thy origin, O man! when thou art hard and unkind to thy brother. Mercy alone desired thy existence; Pity and Love nursed thee on their bosoms. Forget them not, but repay their tenderness by mercy to thy fellows.

Mercy is required of us in three ways; Charity to the poor; Pity for the degraded; and Candor in judging human characters. How essential to our best good is the cultivation of this three-fold mercy! The poor we have always with us; the eye of Mercy scans with lenient kindness their errors, if errors have made them needy; her heart does not study to seek excuses for withholding, but gives to do good and tries to animate to virtue. She does not give with ostentation, for that is haughty Pride's manner, who gives for the credit she hopes to gain; nor does Mercy give with many reproofs and wordy lessons and with an air of superiority, for so does Self-importance, more desirous to show self than to relieve; but she gives with the look and manner of the angel that brings down from heaven the answer to prayer, all sympathy and with a delicate discernment how to touch the deepest and tenderest feelings, without waking from repose the harsher and unfriendly passions.

'She makes excuses where she might condemn,
And tho' oft baffled, will still hope for them;
Not soon provoked, however stung or teased,
And, if perhaps made angry, soon appeased,—
And injured, makes forgiveness her delight.'

Pity for the degraded, is another beautiful form of mercy. How much is it needed, and how limited its exercise! In its full perfection, it is not incompatible with the deepest abhorrence of sin; for in truth this abhorrence of sin gives it its activity and strength. Who abhors sin the most and pities most the degraded? He that sits upon the throne of heaven. He knows the nature of sin; and because he pitied its degraded victims, he sent forth the ministers of his holiness and gave man the Word of life. That book of God, so full of mercy for man, with such exhibitions of pity and compassion, treats from beginning to end of sin—its origin, deceitful action, awful effects, remedy, encouragements to become victors, and descriptions of the glory of conquest. And, in one word, what could show more the close union, and the activity the one borrows from the other, of pity for the degraded and hatred of sin, than the gift of Jesus Christ, by the Father, to a sinful world? And in that Son how beautifully were the same excellences blended and exhibited! O if we have not pity for the degraded, we are not his disciples, and need much to linger over the tender incident in his history, where he bade him that was without sin cast the first stone at the guilty woman! and as there we read and think, we should question conscience if we also would not have shrunk away with the throng before the majesty of that tone and with it ringing in the brain!

Man was never made to be contemned. Hate sin—love man! are four words that embrace the whole of christian morality and the true philosophy of benevolence. Yet how often are the latter two forgotten by the influence of the two former! It should not be. Man will pause before the ruin of an ancient temple, where around him, like the scattered fragments of a broken crown, are the remnants of its ancient grandeur. Fancy will employ herself in restoring the ruins to the splendor of past time, till before her eye the temple rises in its former beauty, and he beholds the priest and the sacrifice, the altar and the incense, and hears far in the holiest the sound of praise and prayer. He almost venerates what he beholds; and when fancy plumes her wings, and leaves him to cold reality, the associations which intellect, by the aid of history, throws around the fragments of departed glory, make them sacred, and the relics are dear and prized—to treat them with contempt, were desecration in his sight. And shall it be less so with contempt for ruined man—the temple that once had its beauty, its priest, its altar, its sacrifice, its prayer, and its song of praise? And will contempt do for it, what king Hezekiah did for the polluted temple of Zion—will it bring back the priest to the right service, purify the altar, prepare the sacrifice of the contrite spirit and the thankful heart, and cause to ascend from the inner sanctuary the voice of prayer and praise? No; contempt was never yet the soul of a good act, and from its nature it never can be. We must, like the ancient Jews, love the temple though the spoil of the enemy, and desecrated though it may have been by unhallowed rites; yea, with the poet we must feel—

'Tis nature's law
 That none, the meanest of created things,
 Of forms created the most vile and brute,
 The dullest or most noxious, should exist
 Divorced from good—a spirit and pulse of good,
 A life and soul, to every mode of being Inseparably linked. Then be assured
 That least of all can aught, that ever owned
 The heaven regarding eye and front sublime
 Which man is born to, sink, howe'er depressed,
 So low as to be scorned without a sin;
 Without offence to God cast out of view;
 Like the dry remnant of a garden flower
 Whose seeds are shed, or as an implement
 Worn out and worthless.'

A remembrance of the high estate from which they have fallen, will incline us to pity the degraded. Our mother's son may perhaps become like them, if we ourselves do not; and would we that man should despise our brother, though sin has betrayed and made him captive? Who would mock the chained slave! A few years make strange revelations, and teach lessons that are bitter in the soul. They have in their flight torn from many a brow the chaplet of its glory, robbed the moral being of its purity and charms, and left the victims to mourn the absence of that mercy which they in their higher estate refused to others. He that is a stern judge over the faults of others, should be pure himself, or judge not, lest he be judged; for men will require much of those who require much from frail humanity.

Blessed are the merciful! for they are candid to the character of others. Who are more unhappy than the sensorious, the severe, and the uncharitable? They permit the entrance of the most vexing and unsatisfying passions; and in their haste to point out and lament with heartless sighs the faults in another's character, they forget all his good qualities. There is pleasure in noting the existence and exercise of good qualities, if we have candor to appreciate goodness in others; it is pleasant to know that by another's benevolence a widow's heart has been cheered, and the needy fatherless provided for; to see the weak helped by the strong, and the desponding comforted by the cheerful; but the evil eye does not see these in the light candor does, and enjoys them not—the chord of social sympathy is not touched, whereby he might have participated in the joy of mercy's deeds. Ever suspicious and jealous, he cannot exercise that charity which would believe the best, suffering long and is kind, but sees evil where evil is not, and has all the unhappy consequences to repay his anxiety to be miserable. Happy alone are the merciful to characters, for the unmerciful do by their censures and severity attract attention to their own temper, disposition and conduct; and woe to him who thus brings himself before the judgment seat of men.

The want of that mercy we now treat of, has been the chief cause of the rashness of many reformers, and has retarded the work of man's true freedom. They fix their attention upon a social evil—it may be a great and extensively prevalent one; they contemplate it, think upon it, and discuss it fully; they can do this candidly, for its existence may not affect their interests, neither may its extirpation; and now armed and nerved they go forth to the contest against it, and what is the character of their measures? They treat all concerned in the evil, against which they are set, as though each and all have no more temptations to resist than themselves; forgetting the power of education, habit, and custom, and that these make one familiar with an evil so as to reconcile him to it, which to another not accustomed to it, appears at once loathsome and vile. Men are not to be treated as though they all had the same moral training, although the principles of right and truth are the same. Much is to be considered in reference to the moulding and forming influences that have been about them—the moral atmosphere they have breathed, and their natural temperament and cast of mind. The neglect of this, is what lies at the foundation of most of the errors in modes of education, discipline, and reform. Men have been treated too much as though they were animals, instead of beings endowed with reason, affections, and conscience, educated by surrounding circumstances, and much affected by custom and habits. In short, according to the progress of the union of true mercy with schemes of education, discipline, and reform, will be the actual advance of society, and no faster.

Let us seek the blessedness of being merciful, that from God and man we may be assured of receiving mercy.

'Then gently scan your brother man,
 Still gentler sister woman;
 Though they may gang a kennin wrang,
 To step aside is human;
 One point must still be greatly dark,
 The moving why they do it;
 And just as lamely can ye mark,
 How far perhaps they rue it.

Who made the heart, 'tis He alone
 Decidedly can try us,
 He knows each chord, its various tone,
 Each spring, its various bias;
 Then at the balance let's be mute,
 We never can adjust it;
 What's done we partly may compute,
 But know not what's resisted.

The Expansion of the Word.

BY A NEW CORRESPONDENT.

THE child had paused in his wild, boyish glee,
And pushing back the thick and clustering curls,
Had bathed his sweaty brow in the clear stream.
His bow and arrows, all his instruments
Of mimic warfare, and of childish sport,
Lay on the grass beside him. He had played
Amid the wild flowers, and beneath the clear
Blue sky, since morning; and the golden sun
Was now high in his daily course. The boy
Grew wearied of his play, and laid him down
In the cool shade, close to the sparkling stream,
Which made glad music to his childish heart.
His brow grew thoughtful, and his earnest eye
Lit up with holy feelings, as he drew Forth from its resting place the Holy Book
Of inspiration; his young heart drank in
Its sacred truths, and as he sat and read
A deeper spirit seemed to breathe and shine
From the boy's earnest face and thoughtful brow.
A thrill of happiness and holy joy,
Passed through his heart as he there read of God's Impartial love and sacred promises,
And of the blessing Jesus bore to such
As he.

That glad fair child in life's bright morn,
Had found the only fount of happiness
That gushes out upon the spreading earth,
Whose waters leave no bitter taste, nor void
Unto the traveler who drinks thereof.
Free and all holy, like to God's own love,
It gushes out, and childhood there may come
And with its tiny hands the waters bear
To its unsullied lips, and they will be
A safeguard to the heart, a cooling draught,
Amid life's hot and hurried fever strife.

Years passed away,—and to the cool, deep shade,
Close to the sparkling stream, there came a form
With all life's joy and freshness gathering round.
He came, and left the busy world behind.
Its cares, its turmoils, jarred upon the ear,
And e'en the breath of praise which followed him,
And fame, who placed the laurelled circlet
On his brow—all, all, he tired of all,
And sicken'd at the multitude's strong voice;
And his heart longed once more for the cool shade,
The sparkling stream, the sky, the very breeze
Which there in childhood's hour had fanned his cheek,
And lifted up the curls from his young, sunny brow.
And as he sat and read from the same book,
He found its promises were still as bright,
Its truths as clear and soothing to the heart,
As when a boy his eye had scanned the page.
That boy had mingled with the world since then;
Its cares, its pleasures, both had touched his heart;
Yet still through all, 'mid dazzling praise and fame,
'Mid all that lures the heart from holiness,—
He still had kept that one spot bright, his love
For God and his all holy word—and now,
That love shown bright within his soul, a light,
A ray from Heaven, a holy stream of joy
Amid those founts which never quench the thirst!

Years passed again,—and o'er the brow of youth
All manhood's cares and thoughtful shades were thrown.
Since last he sat beside the sparkling stream,
He had seen much of sorrow. He had found
How vain and fleeting is the world's caress,
How like to idols, images of clay,
Are the frail worldly things in which man puts
His trust, and finds with sorrow and with grief,
That e'en the slightest breath had power to mar,
And that a touch can scatter and destroy
The hopes that we have cherished for long years!

Ay, he had known, had felt all this. The world
Had turned a scornful eye upon the one
It once had favored. Friends had forsaken,
Enemies had risen, cares had grown up
Around his path, and death himself had stood
E'en at his threshold, and had called away
One of his heart's best loved unto its God!
These were stern things, and sternly had they tried
The strong man's heart, and he had wept at times
E'en like a child. Ay, and there had been hours
When he had almost murmured at the will
Of God. But then his heart would turn again
Unto that same clear fount, that sparkling stream
Of which he drank in boyhood and in youth.
Yes, sacred still, and soothing to his soul—
Were now the words of Holy Writ. Its truths
Fell on his wearied heart like dew from Heaven.
The world's cold voice unheeded passed;
His enemies were all forgiven, cares ceased
To fret his soul, and death was now no more
The dread, destroying messenger, but one
Who calls our spirits to a brighter home.

Again, and there were furrows on the brow
Of manhood. His hair was thin and silvery,
His eyes were dim, and his weak palsied hands
Almost refused to do the old man's will.
For age had come,—and the young boy we met
Beside the sparkling stream, with sunny brow,
Has grown to that old, feeble man with step
Fast hurrying to the grave. And so time flies.
The old man feels it as he totters on,
But still his brow is calm, and still his heart
Is childlike in its trust and confidence;
And though his dim eyes may not read that book
Which oft has been his comforter in hours
Of grief, still doth his heart remember well
Its precious promises; and that old man
Hath now nought else to do, than thus to sit
And ponder o'er the word of God, he learned
So well in boyhood, that it is still Familiar to his heart as if the words
Shone bright before his dim and aged eyes.
It is his solace still, his comforter,
His all of joy on earth. Ay, it has cheered
His boyhood and his youth, nerved up his heart
In manhood's trials, and it stands now
Around his dying bed and points him on
To brighter worlds, where age may never come,
But where the old man's heart will find the God
In whom he trusted, is his Father still.

Affectation and Simplicity in Writers.

AFFECTATION always denotes a want of real merit, in that peculiar branch or subject to which it is applied. It is a garment intended to hide the defects of the form upon which it is thrown. In literature, there is nothing which so unequivocally betrays a want of genius as affectation. In this age of writers, we have, of course, many who would never have thought of writing, but for certain extraneous inducements, such as a thirst for renown, or a desire to procure an easy livelihood. Some who have become reduced in their circumstances, have taken up the quill, who never took it up from inclination, in the days of their prosperity. But they are not subjects for our animadversion. We must feel for their misfortunes, and although they may have launched upon the tide of literature with broken paddle and tattered sail—and give a plenty of evidence that they are out of their natural element—still we should help them all we can. Common humanity counsels this. Although we may be obliged to wade and struggle through their borrowed imagery, their hackneyed thoughts, and vapid elegance, still we should rather pity than blame; and if the little public which comprises their particular friends, are disposed to aid them in their endeavors to procure an honorable support, I do not know that we should too sternly criticise their imperfections, or endeavor to shatter their tinselled fabric by a strong blast of truth. All men and women are not thinkers; and some prefer a nicely arranged phalanx of pretty words, to ideas for which language serves but as a necessary vehicle.

If, then, a part of mankind can be suited with the vapid effusions of these would-be writers; or, rather, can be pleased for awhile by the perusal of them, they answer a purpose; and so far they have their uses. The literary world is unfortunately made up of parties or circles, who make it a point to applaud and keep each other in countenance: but the mind of sterling genius will belong to no party. It will not try to admire what is worthless, though it come from one who is both loved and respected.

The office of censor is never taken up by a generous mind; and, therefore, I am not disposed to pass judgment upon individuals. I would merely speak of palpable defects, such as appear in many authors of the present day, who are destined to pass away like the fogs of a summer morning; and in so doing, I shall aim at no particular work or writer—but at classes of writers. I would compare these with those writers who have founded claims upon the respect and admiration of mankind, and hope I shall not draw the contrast in vain.

The great fault in works of the present day is, a scarcity of ideas—wordy nothingness. I do not say that the ideas are bad, that the sentiments are false, and the moral injurious. I am not now to speak of the demoralizing effect of novels or of ribald verse. There are many individuals who have garnered up a good stock of words, by much reading; and they can tell you what this and that author has to say upon this and that subject; and they can write the same thing in their own words. They admire this poet and do not like the other one; and we find sufficient evidence of their partiality in their own productions. Of course such persons are mere copyists; but their partial friends call them authors.

A great deal of stress is placed upon words; nay, some writers imagine that a very fair hand, and a very fine sheet of white paper are indispensable to good authorship. Then the language must be excessively delicate. A very mean idea—or no idea at all—will answer every purpose, so that a few rare words are thrown in to give the sentence a learned sound. Some classic allusion will affix to the tamest and most vapid paragraph the indisputable stamp of genius, and a Latin quotation sends the author to the very top of Parnassus in a twinkling.

Such writers would not know that John Bunyan possessed a particle of genius, if some kind friend did not inform them of the fact; simply because he says nothing about ottomans or silver tooth-picks, and because he does not praise the virtues of some exotic flower which none but the rich can afford to possess, and which brings an enormous price at the garden shops.

A stranger to our literature might imagine, on reading some modern writers, that he had got hold of an inventory of the articles in some china shop or upholsterer's store, so careful are some authors to convince the public that they have seen the inside of rich men's houses, and know how they are furnished.

Genius addresses itself to the world of mankind, and is desirous of being understood by all. It would fain stamp the burning impressions which fire its own brain and heart upon the minds of every rational being. It gives its energetic thoughts the plainest language—and goes forth in its majestic simplicity captivating alike to the native of the palace and the indweller of the cottage. It scatters, in its fiery course, the thoughts of other men from its path, like the spray-wreathed prow of the gallant ship, flinging to the right and the left, the dead waters which impede its course.

What a pity that Homer had not made himself acquainted with pretty words! Alas! he makes no mention of Turkey carpets and embossed visiting cards. Wonder if he wrote on gilt-edged paper?

It is true that Homer describes the dress and equipage of kings; and we are indebted to him for those descriptions. Sir Walter Scott also gives us graphic views of the manners and dress and furniture of ages that slumber. All this is as it should be—and in attempting the description of men and manners, it is requisite. But here everything is described. The humblest utensil of the peasant; the collar of the slave, is pictured to the eye of the mind with the same impartiality as the sceptre of a prince or the armor of a hero.

But who would deny the award of genius, who would express a want of interest in Homer because his kings wore a bull's hide, or their dishes were not served up by a French cook? None, but those weakly minds who think insipidity and affected politeness the marks of genius.

Genius uses no words for effect, unless, indeed, those words embody a valuable idea. Genius will rather draw its comparisons from things which are familiar to the reader, than from those of which we read in ancient authors—provided the resemblance can be as well made out. The man who writes to be understood, will not speak of an obelisk when a sugar-loaf will answer every purpose, nor put a wand into the hand of a peasant boy who is accustomed to handling a fishing rod. As it is injurious to the fancy to compare mean things with noble ones, so it is degrading to give noble names to mean things: yet some writers are so excessively anxious to be thought refined, that they can hardly call any ordinary animal or utensil by its proper name. All this betrays a thorough misapprehension of true sublimity and correct style.

Rural Rambles. No. 3.

BY MISS L. A. PEABODY.

A WALK TO AUNT MILLY'S.

'Twas a pleasant summer's evening;—the setting sun just gilding the tops of the trees, and streaming oft-times through their openings, imparted a richness and mellowness to the landscape, making it more lovely in its declining rays, than in the brighter glare of its noon-tide beams. At such an hour, cousin Lucia and myself (each with a basket of blue-berries in our hands, which we designed as a gift to Aunt Milly) entered her lowly habitation, receiving our accustomed welcome from our, apparently, aged friend.

'Bless you! bless you! you are nice good gals,' exclaimed the old lady, as she took the proffered fruit. 'It's very kind in you,' she continued, 'to remember a poor old woman like me; I remember when I was young, like you, young ladies, how I used to scramble through the bushes and over the rocks to pick berries; but dear me! that time's past, and I'm nothing but a poor decipied old woman now, of not much use to myself, nor nobody else.'

'Oh, don't say that, Aunt Milly,' replied Lucia, 'so long as your visitors learn from you so sweet a lesson of patience and contentment, and all amid your indigence and many privations.'

'Oh, I've a gret deal to be thankful for, I'm sure, that I'm allowed to live my last days in the old hut where I was born, with so good a child as my little James is, to live with me.'

'Jamie! Jamie!' called the old lady, and as a little curly headed urchin, some seven or eight years old, made his appearance, she exclaimed, 'Come Jamie, run into the garden and get a bunch of flowers for the gals;—that's a good boy. I ha'nt got much that I can give you, that would be acceptable, I know, young ladies, yet I think that you would like a nosegay, for I remember that I have often seen you with a whole handful of wild flowers,—such common ones too as grow round by the road-side, and in the pastures.'

We assured the good old lady that they would be very acceptable; and by this time little James returned with a nice boquet for each of us, made up of marigolds, lavender and bachelor's buttons, with various other kinds of flowers, which decorated their little garden. We thanked our little friend for the pretty gifts which we received from him, and after promising Aunt Milly we would soon call again, we bade her good day, and turned our steps homeward.

'I love old Aunt Milly,' said Lucia, 'she is always so kind and affectionate; yet she hath been the child of sorrow, her trials have been severe, and her griefs many and bitter.'

'Tell me somewhat of her life, dear Lucia, I would like to know more of her.'

'Well, cousin, I will endeavor to grant your request. Pamela Williams was the daughter of poor parents; her mother was an honest and industrious woman, who labored hard for the improvement and support of her children; but her father was a man of dissolute habits, who spent all the earnings of his poor wife, in purchasing the torments derived from the intoxicating cup. Mrs. Williams had but little time to devote to the education of her children, as she was obliged to toil early and late, to supply them and her wretched husband with food. Aunt Milly, as we now call her, was but about fourteen years of age when her mother died, and her oldest brother, and the only one of the children who was older than herself, was seventeen. The whole care of the younger children and of the poor helpless inebriate, their father, necessarily devolved upon them; and it was only by the strictest frugality and untiring exertions on their part, that they were enabled to keep the remainder of the family together in the small cottage where their mother left them. For awhile they were successful in their exertions, but at length Alfred, their chief support, was taken dangerously ill, and now, indeed, was poor Milly obliged to use every exertion to keep her poor brother from actual suffering. The younger children were sent to the alms-house, so her burdens were much lighter. But a new source of affliction was opened to her; just as her brother began to show signs of returning health, and her spirits were gladdened by the prospect of his speedy recovery, her father was brought home dead one cold morning. He was found a stiffened corpse by the road side, where it was supposed he sank down in a state of intoxication and died of cold. This produced such a shock upon the weakened nerves of poor Alfred, that it brought him to so low a state, that his physician gave up all hope of his recovery. Now was Pamela's cup of bitterness full. She struggled awhile to bear up with her misfortunes, but at length lunacy came to her,—not with terrifying visions and constant mental torture, but bright and peaceful dreams blessed her crushed heart, and her imaginings, though wild, seemed like sweet fantasies, softly breathed into her ears by angel visitants. For many years she was as a little child running amongst the flowers, plucking the fairest and sweetest, and chasing the wild bee and butterfly from their golden bells, laughing in her heart's joyousness, as if never a cloud had come over the sunlight of her existence.

*As Pamela's mind became so much alienated as to incapacitate her for performing her accustomed labors, the alms-house, where her sisters had previously gone, became her home. Years passed on, and poor Milly seemed ever the same, and no one thought she would ever regain her reason. Her sick brother recovered his health, and after some years, married. The little boy who is now with Milly, was his only child. He died when it was only three years old, and two years after, his wife followed him to the better land, leaving little James with his Aunt Milly, in the cottage which had been her childhood's home. About a year previous to the death of Alfred, Pamela's long delirium left her as suddenly as it came to her.

'How old is she now?' I asked.

'Not far from fifty, yet, on account of her misfortunes and sickness, she looks and appears much older than she really is. She possessed too much natural energy of character to wish to remain longer in a situation so dependant on others; therefore she went to her old home, where her brother then lived, partly earning her subsistence by knitting and doing coarse needle work. When her brother died, he left his farm and what little property he possessed, to his wife and child, with the provision that Aunt Milly should have a home there as long as she should live. Dear old Aunt Milly! I love her, ever patient as she is, and I deem the blessing with which she always greets me, as a benison from the lips of one of far more enduring christian faith and meekness, than the most of earth's sorrowing children. O, my dear friend!' she continued, taking my hand, 'take pattern from her gentleness and lowliness of heart, so that when old age, and misfortune, perchance, shall come upon you, you may be able to give the same lessons of humility and gratitude to others, that she so sweetly imparts to her friends.'

The silver beams of the moon had already begun to fall upon the quiet earth, when we reached home; somewhat fatigued, 'tis true, with our ramble, but with our hearts made happy, and our benevolent feelings awakened by our visit to our good old friend Aunt Milly.

God's Voice in Nature.

BY MRS. SARAH BROUGHTON.

FATHER! thy voice is heard in nature's bowers,
When smiles Aurora o'er the misty height,
And whispering zephyrs wake the dew gemm'd flowers,
To fill their velvet cups with roseate light.

How the soft murmurs swell along the grove,
As matin warblers raise the choral hymn;
Through glen and glade, the seraph-tone of love
Wakes the wild echos 'mid the woodlands dim.

We hear it in the cascade's silvery play,
As o'er the sylvan lake the breezes swell,

Shaking the crystals from the bending spray,
While thrilling lyre-notes steal along the dell.

Each chiming wavelet, rippling gently by,
With its unceasing cadences of song;
Speaks but of Him, who through the midnight sky
Marshals the hosts of many a shining throng.

We hear it too, when tempests piping loud,
Peal their shrill anthems through the troubled sky;
When leaps the lightning from the dark storm-cloud,
And thunders roll the dread response on high.

Lowly the reverent spirit bows before
The Eternal power that rules the fierce-wing'd storm;
Hearing Love's tone amid the whirlwind's roar,
Whose giant strides each beauteous scene deform.

A Thought on Female Culture.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

I THINK woman greatly misjudges her own happiness in making it depend so entirely upon the chances of her fortune, and the gratification of her affections. She is too much inclined to the belief that she is a dependent creature—that she cannot make herself, and her fortunes. I would not inculcate the absurd doctrine of physical independence; nor ground my arguments on the supposition that woman can render herself indifferent to exterior circumstances. But that same good Being who has given to the minutest insect some instrument of self-preservation, sent not into this world the most beautiful creation of his hands to be the sport of circumstance, and the victim of feeling.

I am not intending at this time, nor in this place, to give full expression to the opinions that are gaining daily strength in my mind, respecting the proper culture and discipline of the female character. It seems to be a prevalent idea that something is wrong either in the education or in the position of woman. Her rights are discussed, her sphere disputed, her very privileges seem to be subjects of doubt and inquiry. One claims for her a place in the halls of legislation, in the pulpit, the lecture-room, and at the polls. He would see her clad, like Joan of Arc, in the iron panoply of war—with helm on her head, and shield at her heart. Another, not less devoted to her happiness, would make her, like the Lares, a household divinity, presiding at the hearth-stone—the mother of children, the tender nurse, the frugal housewife, and—nothing more.

I think these contending advocates for the sex are both at fault in making exterior condition the source of female influence and happiness. If woman's mind and heart are right, it is not of essential importance whether their operations are in private, and upon her household, or whether they take a more open and bustling sphere of duty. The most she wants, is a character, a power, an independence. Not that independence which erects 'Liberty-poles,' and shouts 'Freedom!' from the forum; but the calm, still, holy consciousness of mental and moral power; the elevation and strength which is born of knowledge, of thought, and of just self-reliance.

The education which will fit woman to be the companion of man in intellect as well as in feeling, will not subtract, in the minutest degree, from those qualities which render her lovely in domestic life. Indeed, can any woman be so valuable to a husband, as one who is capable of sharing the confidence of his mind as well as his heart? She is but half-wedded who cannot enter into the intellectual sympathies of her companion. It is only when he feels, that she is his wife; when he thinks, she is alone.

And then, again, woman is not necessarily born for marriage. She has the birthright of an independent existence; and to this birthright she owes reverence as to a holy gift. Her motto should be, 'equal to either fortune'—and at all times let her remember that though it may be expedient for her to marry, it is her privilege to be single. I hope, in another place and at another time, to give a clearer and better expression to these opinions. I wish to exhibit woman as she can be, rather than as she is—a being of noble capacities and powers, educated to be useful, having individual resources, unshaking self-reliance, and a knowledge of happiness not subject to exterior contingences. In a word, as the poet has beautifully described her—

'A being breathing thoughtful breath,
A traveler between life and death;
With reason firm, and temperate will,
Endurance, foresight, strength and skill;
A perfect woman, nobly planned,
To warn, to comfort, and command.'

On the Death of a Child.

DIED in Concord, Mass., in August last, CLARISSA JANE, daughter of William and Jane Fogg, aged 17 months. The following poem is, we suppose, a selection, and is addressed to the bereaved parents. ED.

'REJOICE! your child, so beautiful, no longer
Droops 'neath disease!—Rejoice! her throes are o'er;
Your bowed and broken flower is raised, and stronger
Blooms where the storms of sickness beat no more.'

Let not a tear ungratefully be given;
 Let not a murmur linger where she trod :
 Your child of earth is now the child of heaven,
 Your heir, O parents, is the heir of God !

Lift up your spirits with this seraph vision,
 That she so pure, so beautiful, hath fled
 From our dim home, unto a home Elysian ;
 The paradise that waits the sinless dead !

And yet, forget not ! but, when early morning
 Like a bright bird lifts up her golden plumes,
 Think of your child !—think, thus her soul returning,
 Glows in the heavenly East as morning blooms !

And still, forget not ! But when flowers are sighing,
 And evening sunset fades along the West,
 Think of your child ! yet, oh ! not pale and dying ;
 But living, smiling, radiant 'mid the blest !

Unconscious Worship.

THE purest part of our religion is, perhaps, that which is least recognized by us. It is not alone the devotional excitement of prayer, nor the audible thanksgiving of the heart in song, which constitutes the beauty and purity of worship. There is a quiet sense of love and spiritual holiness within us, awakened by the bland sunshine and the balmy air, the music of winds, and waves, and birds, which, silent and involuntary as it is, gives unto the Father a vow of gratitude more true and holy than even the conscious heart can yield.

When we lift the soul in prayer, it is for ourselves we worship ; when the heart is stirred to audible music, it has a tribute for itself as well as for God ; but when the deep fountains of the soul are brightened by sunbeams, and silently and quietly they reflect the image of the Divine, is there not a beauty in this unconscious worship which the Father will seal with his most sanctifying love ?

This gentle and impulsive devotion should be cherished, not only as an acknowledgment of the divine goodness, but as one of those silent and far-reaching influences, which, like the dew that instils into the earth and calls the bud and blossom into being, will be continually nourishing in the heart those gentler virtues and aspirations which render us so 'essentially immortal.'

S. C. E.

THE people should always know their servants before placing their trusts in them.

CAN all men be content with their lot ? is a very grave question. The true philosopher alone can solve the query.

'Their Path shineth after them.'

BY IONE.

WHO has not in his heart a place consecrated to the memory of the dead ? The aged dropped around us, blasted by the breath of many winters ; the strong man fell even while rejoicing in his strength and prosperity ; the matron laid aside her cares and slept in calm unconsciousness ; and the young and beautiful passed away like flowers which, exposed to an early frost, laid their petals in the dust, and revived no more beneath the genial breath of summer. Alas ! alas ! many of these are united with our dearest recollections, and constitute the most precious jewels in the great store house of memory. Do their paths shine after them ?

It is evening, and dark clouds veil the bright stars from mortal eyes. My room is but dimly lighted, and my thoughts are busy with the past. 'Come forth, beautiful visions, that have slumbered in the glare of day ! come forth, one by one, a slow and solemn procession, and permit your soft, lustrous eyes to look into mine. I would speak of your sojourning here, of the thorns that goaded your brows beneath coronals of flowers, of a current of sadness beneath the surface of the sparkling waters of pleasure. Pause with me, for my thoughts are rapidly traveling the past, and striving to gather each memento of your worth and loveliness.'

There is one whom I had known from childhood, a gay, bright being, with a light laugh and playful jest ever upon her lips. She was an only child and the idol of a widowed mother. Handsome she was not, but overflowing with good feeling, and she seemed to move in an atmosphere of sunshine and joy. There was one who knew and loved her with all the strength of manly affection, and would have lain down his life to serve her, but she returned not his love, and bestowed her heart upon another. We marvelled at her thoughtless choice, but it was made, and could not be recalled. He who loved her with a strength and purity of affection seldom surpassed, was compelled to look on and see her willingly sacrificed. She had been married but a few months, when the mask of virtue which her husband had speciously worn, was thrown aside, and the world knew him as he was, a reckless, dissipated, and worthless man. Two years passed away, and she clasped to her bosom a helpless and beautiful infant; but they, who clustered around her bed of sickness, saw that the lamp of life burnt dimly. She lingered, however, some months, withering in the grasp of fearful consumption. She expressed no wish to live, and the grave, with the eternal world beyond, were more desirable than all that life could offer. She seldom asked for her child, whose feeble weight was too much for her reduced strength. He who had destroyed and parted from her while health sat upon her brow, saw her no more till she lay within her coffin—a broken, wasted flower. Her pathway was bright and shining till the last, because the record was full of duties faithfully performed and trials borne with uncomplaining fortitude. Often in daily experience we see the sun rise in cloudless splendor and soar unveiled to the zenith, then lose itself in shadows and storms, nor pierce the clouds to bestow a parting smile ere it sinks below the horizon. God grant the light of his countenance to illumine our hearts when earthly comforts fail.

There is another who stands before me even now, as he stood but yesterday in manhood's early prime. His active mind was full of anticipations, plans and hopes for the future. His foot was upon the threshold of the great world, and he was about to enter amid the stirring scenes of conflicting interests, when the hand of death was laid suddenly and heavily upon him, and he prepared to partake of that rest that knows no interruption. He was beloved, honored, trusted, and the few who cherish his memory, turn to it as a bright and pure star, whose rays will guide the trusting wanderer to a holier and happier home. His death was regretted by the community, but mourned by the few who treasured him as a household gem of rare lustre and value. He left a spotless and luminous path, terminated indeed on earth, but opened in exceeding glory in the spirit land.

Again the cloudy pillar is withdrawn and another form glides before me, slight yet perfect in its proportions. It is that of a young lady with whom I became acquainted subsequently to my school days. When we first met she was about sixteen, and very youthful in her form and manners. The dignity of the woman had not succeeded to the playfulness of the child. There was one numbering almost twice her years, who loved her or professed to do so, and when his feelings were made known, pleased and gratified she referred him to the decision of her parents.

As no objection could be urged, he was allowed to devote to her his time and attention, and an engagement was formed which lasted but a few months. Unhappily her lover was of a fickle disposition, and soon wearied of the bonds that bound him to one so young and tender. When he announced his intention of deserting her, she fainted; but from that time showed no emotion when speaking of him or hearing his name. She once said to me, when conversing about her unfortunate engagement, 'I believe I mistook gratified vanity and ambition for love, else I could never have withstood the shock.' A few years after the above event, I was told that she was fast failing in a consumption. It was too true. Previously to her illness she approached the table of our risen Lord, and gave herself in the innocence of youth to the service of her God. I need not say that she was sustained in the last great struggle. Twenty summers had not strown their flowers at her feet ere she laid down the burden of life to awaken in a home where life can no more be wearisome. Two sisters and an only brother survived to mourn over the youngest bud upon the parent stem. Her large dark eyes are even now bent upon me, and her arch and playful smile is indelibly impressed upon my memory. Her predominant trait was freedom from selfishness—perhaps the rarest attribute of humanity. 'Rest thee, young, guileless being! But one cloud gathered upon thy path, and that gave way before the smile of the Sun of Righteousness. Thy hopes grew brighter and brighter till lost in fruition, and thy feet linger in the bowers of Paradise.'

Bear with me, gentle reader, while I speak of one more form in the shadowy procession. This last had numbered but two years when her tiny form yielded to the decree of her Maker, and all unconscious, she too was early doomed to tread the dark valley. Some one may ask, 'Can those so young, be said to leave a shining path behind them?' Oh, yes! for hers was a holy ministry, appealing to the best feelings of our natures, and smoothing the roughness which intercourse with the world sometimes fastens upon the finest spirits. The household names were familiar to her infant lips, and an uncommon memory enabled her thus early to repeat a childish hymn. The youngest of a numerous family, she was the pet and idol of all, and the heiress of a mighty kingdom might have sighed in vain for the heartfelt homage that was hourly tendered unto her. A disease of the lungs, which produced no violent anguish, slowly but surely sapped the fountain of life. It was a clear, cold morning when we met around her, fearful yet not certain that her end was near. She lay upon a pillow, and her little hands were folded upon her breast. Her father bent above her with sorrow such as parents only know, and when his grief mocked control, he turned away to indulge it in solitude. The little sufferer watched his retreating form, and when he was no longer visible, she murmured 'father.' Oh! how sad, how solemn was the cadence with which that one sweet word was uttered! It was her last effort. In a few minutes the delicate lid fell languidly over the shining orb, the silken lash rested upon her colorless cheek, and all was peace. No sigh, no groan broke from her pale lips, and her spirit commenced without a struggle its untried journey to the home of the angels. 'Sweet innocent, the love we bore thee was unlike all other love, so pure, so engrossing, so tender! The world was too rough a home for a spirit so guileless, and we gave thee, with many longings, but in perfect faith, to thy God. We feel assured thou hast joined the unspotted band who bathe in the river of life, and though we shed no tear for thee, we weep for ourselves, thus early left without thy hallowing influence.'

Fellow traveler upon earth, in thy past experience, are there no passages like these? Canst thou trace no lost treasure to the portals of heaven? As one by one we step upon the spirit shore, may we be greeted by cloudless faces whose memory was with us even when we glided over the river of death.

The last of his Tribe.

BY T. B. READ.

THE sun had sunk behind the hill,
The stars were twinkling in the sky,
The moon's bright horns began to fill,
And shone with splendor from on high,
While on the sombre veil of night
Glitter'd the fire-fly's golden light.

The wood where long the deer had stray'd,
And roved in nature's freedom still,
Now slept in silence and in shade,
Save when the lonely whip-poor-will Pour'd from the giant old oak tree
Her song of mournful melody.

Beside the Mohawk's waters stood,
Bending its glassy surface o'er,
A weeping willow; while the wood,
The distant hills, and verdant shore,

Seem'd moving in the rippling wave,
That back their dusky features gave.

Beneath the willow's drooping bough,
Half hidden by the o'er-hanging green,
And by the bank's dark rugged brow,
An Indian cot was dimly seen;
The hunter's tent a bison's hide,
And wild deer skin a roof supplied.

Beside the tent an aged man
Sat in the moon's inspiring beam,
The breeze of evening came to fan
His silver locks, and on the stream
He gazed, and musing seem'd to trace
The story of his long lost race.

He was the last of all his race,
The Sachem of a thousand braves,
And 'twas the scene, the very place,
Beside the Mohawk's gentle waves
Where slept his sires; and with them soon
He hoped to lay life's burden down.

His bow and arrow by him lay,
A bison's robe was o'er him thrown,
And as the moon's soft quiet ray
Upon his tawny features shone,
He seem'd the emblem of the fate
Of his proud race, now desolate.

Awhile upon the stream he gazed,
Awhile he looked upon the sky,
Then to the silver moon he raised,
With solemn look, his troubled eye,
And chanted in a low, sad tone,
His tribe's dark hist'ry and his own.

Margaret Leslie.

'If there be

One eye thou fear'st to meet—one human voice
Whose tones thou shrink'st from—Woman! veil thy face,
And bow thy head—and die!' HEMANS.

GENTLE reader! dost love to muse on the lights and shadows of woman's life, and to hear the simple chronicles of a country hamlet? If so, come with me to 'our village;' is it not a lovely spot? There is the neat white meeting-house—for happily we have but one—and our little community hear with pleasure the word of God expounded by our venerable parson, who has labored here nearly all the years of his life, which are now many! There is his dwelling peering through those beautiful elms, quiet and secluded, humble and unpretending, as its beloved master; and there is the school-house, and scattered round, are the flourishing fields, and substantial dwellings of our farmers. But let us turn down this shaded lane, and we shall soon come to an old fashioned cottage; the little garden in front is neatly kept, and the woodbine which nearly covers the house, gives it a romantic appearance. Some dozen years ago, that humble roof was the centre of attraction in our village; it was inhabited by an aged couple, who had lived a quiet and blameless life; the old man had been a carpenter in his younger days, and the united industry of himself and wife, had enabled them to purchase the little farm and cottage, where they had ever since dwelt, contented with their humble lot, and thankful for the blessings they enjoyed. Of a large family, which had been born to them, one only had lived beyond infancy; she had now grown to womanhood, and at nineteen, was the pride and joy of her parents, and the undisputed belle of the village. Queenly Margaret Leslie! my heart glows as I think of thee, in thy swan-like and glorious beauty! I remember thee in thy sunny girlhood—in the expansion of thy haughty womanhood—at the altar—among the gay and the wealthy—in thy coffin—in thy grave! I have said Margaret was beautiful—in person she was tall, and stately as Cleopatra—her hair was black, with that soft bluish tint which marks the wing of the raven; her eyes were large, dark and dazzling, yet at times soft and melting in their expression; and rendered even darker by long, silken jetty lashes, which swept in a gentle curve, like a veil upon the fair cheek; her complexion was of that soft, rich cream-like hue, which beautiful at all times, lights up at night into marble whiteness, and gives to dark eyes an additional lustre. Her features were small, yet finely moulded; pride was stamped on her lofty brow, and her small, compact mouth bespoke a firm and determined spirit. Such as I have imperfectly described her, can you wonder that she was eagerly wooed by almost every swain in the village? It was not entirely the effect of her person, but there was an irresistible fascination in her manner, which impelled them onward, even when they felt that there was no hope, and that it must end in a refusal. It was not vanity that prompted her—No, no! Margaret Leslie was too proud to be vain! She well knew the power of her charms, but she never exerted them for such conquests. She was the slave of ambition; her proud spirit longed to be away from the home of her childhood—all was too quiet, too same for her; she panted to go forth into the world—to be one of the actors in the busy walks of life; she pined for wealth and grandeur, and for nobler subjects than the plodding inhabitants of a country village. The unbounded indulgence of her parents had allowed her access to a circulating library, and she had eagerly read, or rather devoured, all the trashy novels of the day, and had dwelt upon the elaborately wrought scenes of high life, till she yearned to be one of the motley throng of fashion.

About this time her wishes were gratified in a very unexpected manner. She had reached her twenty-first year unwedded, and having refused, one by one, all the beaux of the village, she began to fear lest she should be obliged to 'waste her sweetness on the desert air.' It was near the close of a bright day in June, that the village was set in commotion by the arrival of a gentleman; he was riding through the place, on his way to a town a few miles distant, when the chaise broke down and he was obliged to go to the nearest tavern to wait till it could be mended; the stranger was a man of some forty odd years, and excessively ugly. He was short, and thick-set; his face was bloated, his eyes small and grey, his hair inclining to red, and the expression of his countenance almost repelling. It was soon discovered that he was a man of great wealth and high standing in society, and consequently every attention was paid him by the landlord. He was in a hurry to depart, and while the chaise was repairing, he stood at the parlor window of the inn, looking out on the road, and conversing with the landlord about the village and its inhabitants; when his attention appeared to be suddenly drawn to some one passing, and with a look of admiration, he exclaimed, 'Pray who is that splendid looking girl?'

'That is Margaret Leslie; she lives down the lane yonder, in the brown cottage, with her father and mother.'

The stranger followed her with his eyes, till she was out of sight, and then, as the landlord left the room, he muttered to himself, 'Faith! she's a stately creature! what an excitement she would raise in Washington; I must see her again!'

Instead of proceeding on his journey that night, the stranger expressed his intention of remaining a short time in the village, and it was soon noised abroad that a rich bachelor was staying at the inn. His arrival was on Saturday night, and the next day a longer time than usual was devoted to the toilet by the single females of the hamlet. When the bachelor was seen, however, nearly every matrimonial dream was put to flight; and he was viewed almost with terror. I said nearly every one, for in spite of his age, and his extreme ugliness, there was one who could entertain thoughts of captivating him; and that one was Margaret Leslie! She closed her eyes to his person, and thought of the charms of his wealth—of the circle in which he moved, and of which alone she had read, thought, and dreamed for so long, and she bent her whole mind upon the accomplishment of her object. As for Mr. Dalrymple, for such was the stranger's name, he had been struck with Margaret's appearance, and left no means untried till he gained an introduction to her. From that time his visits to the brown cottage became frequent; his stay in the village was protracted, and when at length he departed, it was as the affianced husband of Margaret—he was going to Washington to prepare his residence for the bride, and was to return in a few weeks to claim her.

The wedding day came; the bridegroom having arrived the night before in a splendid barouche, drawn by a span of beautiful horses. The village was all a-stir—the church was crowded, and the bridal party soon made their appearance. Never was there a greater contrast than between that ill-assorted couple; Margaret's stately figure seeming even more majestic beside the insignificant form of the bridegroom; she was arrayed in snowy satin, and her raven tresses were ornamented with a bandeau of pearls, which, with a necklace of the same, was the wedding gift of Mr. Dalrymple. The hectic of excitement burnt on her cheek, and her eyes sparkled with unusual lustre; yet during the service, her lip sometimes curled as if in scorn, and an expression of disgust passed over her beautiful face, which gave the lie to the solemn vows she was pronouncing, 'to love, honor, and obey.' At length the ceremony was over; they returned to the cottage, where the wedding dress was exchanged for a traveling habit; they entered the barouche, and amid the tears of her aged parents, the sneers of some, and the envy of a few, Margaret Dalrymple was whirled from the home of her childhood, to enter upon the gaieties and dangers of a city life. * * *

We will pass lightly over the next two years, which were spent in a round of fashionable dissipation. And was Margaret happy? Alas! for her who, brought up in the quiet of a country village, is cast at once into the vortex of worldly pleasure, without any fixed principle to sustain her, and without that surest of safeguards to woman,—her husband's love! But Margaret had no right to complain; she had married her husband for his wealth, with a perfect knowledge of his character; knowing him to be ugly in person, disagreeable in manners—knowing that he sought her for her beauty only; and regarding him with a feeling little short of loathing and disgust, she had yet chosen to marry him, and she had received all that she had anticipated. He had placed her in an almost princely mansion—surrounded her with luxuries—introduced her to the circle in which she had so longed to move, and had her instructed in every accomplishment—all this was true, and yet—Margaret was not satisfied!

'You must put on your sweetest smiles to-night, Mrs. Dalrymple,' said one of her morning visitors.

'Why so?'

'O you will go to Mrs. Selwyn's, of course, and Mr. Aubrey is to be there!'

'And pray who is Mr. Aubrey?'

'Is it possible you have never heard of him? Why, he is an artist of great celebrity, and moreover, he is rich and handsome, and a great favorite with the ladies.'

At one end of Mrs. Selwyn's drawing-room that night, stood two gentlemen; one of them intently observing a lady, who was carelessly turning over some engravings.

'There is the most splendid woman in the room,' said he to his companion; 'can you tell me her name?'

'That is Mrs. Dalrymple—yonder is her husband.'

'Not that old, ugly man, surely?'

'The same.'

'Heavens! what a sacrifice!'

'Not so much a sacrifice, as a bargain,' replied his companion. 'Old Dalrymple found her in an obscure country village; he fell in love with her beauty—she with his wealth—he purchased the one with the other, and so they are about on a par; but come, shall I introduce you?'

In less than an hour, William Aubrey and Margaret Dalrymple found themselves conversing as familiarly, as though they had been acquainted from childhood. That night commenced a new era in Margaret's life; she had invited Aubrey to call at her house, and his visits became frequent; no party was complete without him, and she cared to go to none unless he was invited. When not engaged in his professional duties, he might always be found escorting her in her rides and walks; dancing with her at every ball, and admitted to her house at all times, on the most familiar footing. Thus month after month went by, and under the specious name of friendship, Aubrey and Margaret were entangling themselves in the meshes of an unholy love, when some one hinted to Mr. Dalrymple the impropriety of Aubrey being the constant gallant of his wife. He had seen with perfect unconcern, the progress of the acquaintance, but though he had long since ceased to care for Margaret, himself, he did not choose that she should bestow her affections on any one else, or bring any disgrace upon his name. Accordingly when Aubrey called, the next morning, to escort Margaret on horseback, he was received by Mr. D. and forbidden to act longer as cavalier to his wife. Mortified and angry, Aubrey left the house, breathing imprecations on the husband, and more than ever in love with the wife. He wrote to Margaret in the most impassioned terms, telling her of his reception, and begging an interview. It was granted—and from that time stolen visits passed between them, and frequent letters were exchanged filled with expressions of hatred to Mr. Dalrymple, and of devotion to each other. But at length the crisis of affairs came. Margaret had gone to a ball where she expected to meet Aubrey, but some unforeseen event taking place to hinder his going, he sent a note, which not arriving till she had gone, her husband opened and read. Filled with rage, he awaited her return. Not finding Aubrey as she expected, she returned earlier than usual—she entered the drawing-room, and there stood her husband, holding in his hand the open letter, while on the table stood a little cabinet, containing chiefly Aubrey's letters and his miniature; the lock broken, and the contents scattered about. For a moment Margaret stood confounded, but at length she found courage to demand by what authority he dared open her letter case?

'By the authority of an insulted and outraged husband; did you think because I was old and ugly, as you please to term me, that I was blind also?' and with bitter revilings he left her presence.

That night Margaret Dalrymple left her home, her husband, and all that woman should venerate, and threw herself on the protection of her lover. Mr. Dalrymple procured a divorce, and the guilty pair took up their abode in one of the southern cities. Separated forever from the man she loathed and despised, dwelling, though as his acknowledged mistress, with the man she worshiped, Margaret for a time fancied herself completely happy. Her low sweet voice seemed to gain additional melody as it breathed forth words of passionate tenderness—her large, dark eyes were fascinating in the softness of their changed expression; and the color came and went on her fair cheek as it had not done since the days of her sunny girlhood. But alas! for the victim of illicit love! beauty without virtue soon loses its hold upon its votaries. Aubrey was a man of little principle, and having no respect for the woman who had renounced her domestic ties, however hateful, he soon grew tired of the beauty, which had attracted him. * * * * *

Two years have past since Margaret's fall from virtue—one marked by the wild excitement of guilty love, and the other by its gradual decline from the ardor of passion to coldness and indifference. Let us enter this splendid apartment—the thick Turkey carpet gives back not the slightest sound, and we may safely take a survey. It is furnished in princely style, and in a rich crimson fauteuil, sits a superb woman, dressed in a robe of costly black velvet; jewels are upon her beautiful neck and arms, and flashing from her imperial brow and amid the luxuriant braids of her glossy raven hair, yet scarce matching the lustre of her magnificent dark eyes. She is turning the leaves of a richly bound volume, yet there is a troubled look about her, which tells plainly that her thoughts are not with its contents. Ever and anon her eyes fill with tears as she raises them to the face of the other inmate of the room—a handsome man in the prime of life. His lip curls as he gazes on his beautiful companion, and he is speaking in a low, suppressed tone. Now his voice grows louder, and he taunts her in bitter terms with her passion for himself, with her desertion of her husband, and finally with her degraded position as his mistress. Margaret Leslie had risen from her seat as he went on, and she now stood erect with folded arms; her cheek and lip were bloodless, and her eyes flashed with unutterable indignation, as she replied to his taunts.

'William Aubrey,' she exclaimed, 'till I knew you, I was a proud but an unsullied being; you won me with your sophistry and I loved you; for you I forgot my matron dignity—for you I forsook my husband, my home, and virtue! and with you, had you remained what I then thought you, I would have been content to live in the most abject poverty; disgrace, the loss of name, and fame, were as nothing compared to your love; but that for which I gave up all, I have seen decline, day after day. This hour you have set the seal to your villany, and she who has loved you with all the fervor of a first passion, now loathes and detests you, and spurns you from her, as the veriest worm beneath her feet.' And having poured out the torrent of her measureless scorn, she gathered up her drapery and left the room.

But when Margaret gained her chamber, the spirit which had sustained her through that trying scene forsook her, and throwing herself into a chair, she buried her face in her hands, and burst into a passion of tears. When the first outbreak of grief was over, the tide of memory flowed back; she thought of the happy days of her childhood, of her cottage-home, and her venerable parents. Long she sat there in silent thought. At length she arose, and placing herself at her writing-desk, she penned the following note:

'WILLIAM AUBREY: When this meets your eye, I shall have left your roof forever; the scene of this night can never be forgotten. Deeply as I have sinned, surely your hand should not have been raised, to crush the fallen. Yet am I justly punished! I will return to the humble home of my childhood—to my kind old father and mother, if my shame has not already brought down their gray hairs with sorrow to the grave! They, at least, will not cast off their only child, bitter though her transgressions have been. I will sue humbly for pardon, and it may be, that my efforts may at length make atonement. Farewell, William! may God forgive you, as truly as does

She folded, sealed, and directed her letter; then taking off the jewels which decked her person, she returned them to their casket, locked it, and placed the key with her note; then disrobing herself of her costly dress, she put on a dark and simple morning dress, and taking a little bundle of necessary clothing, and a small sum of money, she arrayed herself in a large mantle and bonnet, and left the house in silence.

It was the evening of the fifth day since Margaret Leslie's departure, when a female traveler was seen entering our quiet village. She was closely enveloped in a sort of mantle, and her face was entirely concealed by a large, coarse straw bonnet; she walked slowly and painfully as if worn down by fatigue, and now and then stopped to rest on the banks by the road-side. She turned down the little lane, and went on till she reached the brown cottage; she stood gazing upon it for a few minutes, then suddenly pushing open the wicket gate, she passed into the little garden. But on the threshold she paused—the window was open—for it was a warm balmy evening in June; the curtains were not closely drawn, and she took a survey of the inmates, herself unseen. At the clean deal table sat an aged man, reading aloud to his wife from the word of God which lay open before him. The part he had chosen was the parable of the 'Prodigal Son,' and as the wanderer drew nigh to the window, he was reading the words of the erring son, 'I will arise, and go to my Father!' The trembling woman leaned for support against the wall, and had any one beheld her face, they might have seen the terrible workings of her mind. The old man went on, till he came to the return of the prodigal, and the joy of the father, and raising his eyes to his wife, he exclaimed, 'Would we not in like manner receive and rejoice over our prodigal child? guilty though she be, would not we forgive her, and clasp to our hearts, the miserable penitent?'

The wanderer could bear no more—with trembling hands, she raised the latch, and entering the humble room, Margaret Leslie fell senseless at the feet of her parents. The old woman raised the stranger, and removing the bonnet from her head, she cried—'Margaret—my child! my child!—she has returned! she is given to our prayers!' Her old father and mother lifted her from the floor, and having placed her on a bed, and applied such simple restoratives as the cottage afforded, Margaret opened her languid eyes upon them—forgiveness was asked, and cheerfully accorded. She was suffering from hunger and fatigue, she had traveled nearly all the way on foot, save now and then, some kind hearted wagoner had given her a lift of a few miles, and after she had partaken of some slight refreshment, they left her to gain needful rest.

Now that she was alone memory commenced her work; she was in her own little bedroom—her head was on the same pillow which her fair cheek had prest nightly for many a year in the bright season of her girlhood; every thing was as she had left it, nothing had changed save herself—and what a change was there! not five years had elapsed since she had gone forth from that very room, attired in bridal splendor, dreaming of the gaities of the world, and longing to partake them; she had gone forth proud, beautiful, and buoyant in spirit—and she had returned with branded name, faded beauty, blighted hopes, and a broken heart! From thoughts like these little rest was to be obtained, and Margaret awoke in the morning, after a short and unrefreshing sleep, exhausted, and ill at ease, in both body and mind.

Great was the excitement in the village, when it was known that Margaret Leslie had returned to her home; some cavilled, some sneered, and a few benevolent ones pitied the poor creature; but of all the parish, none went to the cottage, save the old minister and his kind hearted and gentle wife. Before they arrived there, however, Margaret was delirious; exposure, fatigue and grief had brought on a fever; the minister's wife, went to her house, and soon returned with medicines for the sufferer, who continued through the day to grow worse; she wandered constantly, but her talk was all of her youthful days, and her village companions; for a week she remained in this state, and her aged parents watched in agonized suspense—fearing to lose their restored treasure. At length the fever left her and though very feeble, it was thought she might eventually recover. The visits of the good minister were frequent; he administered comfort and consolation to the poor penitent, and bade her look for mercy and pardon to Him who has said, 'Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow!' and whose dear Son breathed the tender invitation, 'Come unto me, ye who are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest.'

Six weeks had elapsed since Margaret's return; long weeks passed on the bed of sickness and suffering, which combined with grief and mental agony, had terminated in a rapid decline. One evening, after a long and interesting conversation with the worthy pastor, she had sunk back exhausted, and lay for some time so absorbed in thought that her parents, who sat by her bedside, fancied her asleep; when suddenly, she exclaimed—'Mother it will be five years to-morrow since that miserable day, when I left you a gay and smiling bride!'

'Hush, my child!' said the poor old woman, 'do not speak of it!'

'Nay, dear mother, it will not harm me now; though since my return, I have never but once alluded to the events of the last few years, it has often been the subject of my thoughts. Attracted by his wealth and station, I married a man I did not love, and soon despised and hated; I possessed every thing my heart had desired, yet I was unhappy;—then I met with one, who was all my imagination had pictured, and I loved him with an overwhelming passion;—when I left my husband for my lover, I fancied I was changing a life of misery for one of unmixed happiness; but I have found alas! that there is no rest for the guilty, no pang like that of remorse! and oh! I bless God, that sinful and miserable as I was, he had mercy upon me, and gave me strength to break from the fetters that bound me, and to return, humble and contrite, to the home of my childhood, and that the hands of my earliest guardians shall at length close my eyes. And now, my dear parents, this night I would be alone, to hold communion with my own soul, and my God!'

They left her according to her request, and the next morning, when they entered her little bedroom, they found her apparently sleeping, calm and tranquil. They went to her bedside, and called her name, but she answered not—they opened the little casement, and the sun which had risen clear and bright, on the anniversary of her wedding-day, shone full on the beautiful face of the dead! The event was soon known, and the minister and his wife came speedily to the cottage, to pray with and comfort the bereaved. For the departed one, they had no fears—for though deep had been her sin, yet great had been her sufferings, and sincere her penitence; and the friends who now knelt around that humble couch, felt that God had accepted her repentance and her tears, and that Margaret Leslie was at rest!

Romance of Woman. No. 4.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

THE LAMENT OF MAISUNA.

MAISUNA was a Bedouin lady, married to one of the Caliphs of Damascus. 'The pomp and splendor of an imperial court could neither reconcile her to the luxuries of the harem, nor make her forget the homely charms of her native wilderness. Her solitary hours were consumed in melancholy musings; and her greatest delight was in singing the simple pleasures she had enjoyed in the desert.'

Crichton's History of Arabia.

Oh give me back my maiden haunt
Beside the desert brook;
I weary for the simple scenes
My foolish heart forsook;

I weary for the mountain chase
Among the wild chamois;
Alas, how little knows the heart
The fountain of its joy.

A couch beneath our hair-cloth tent
Gave calm and sweet repose;
I never wakened then to weep,
Nor slept to dream of woes.
My dear old camel knelt for me,
And bore me o'er the sands;
And food to her was always sweet
When taken from my hands.

Now dwell I here, a slave 'mid slaves—
A kid within a fold;
Alas! I do not love my chains,
Although they are of gold.
I do not love these gaudy rooms,
This incense-laden air;
How sweeter far the mountain rocks,
And wild winds breathing there.

These silks and jewels have no charms
To my poor tearful eyes;
I yearn to gaze upon the fields,
And watch the jewelled skies.
I'd rather view one soft bright star
From Araby's rough hills,
Than shine in all the fine-wrought gold
That Qomar's treasury fills.

And he who wooed me from my home,
With soft entrancing words;
Who told me that my voice to him
Was sweeter than a bird's;
Who loved to wander at my side,
Or wreath my hair with flowers,
And talk to me of houri charms,
To cheat away the hours;

Alas! I little deemed that time
Would wean his heart from mine;
That he would lay his love's sweet gifts
Upon another's shrine!
I little felt my gilded chain
When Omar held the links;
But now they drag upon the earth,
And my worn spirit sinks.

Forever more my soul will yearn
For my rude desert home;
Will yearn among its mountain rocks
And burning sands to roam.
It may not be—my life must waste
Within this gorgeous cage;
Already droops my nerveless wing,
As if o'erpowered by age.

But soon on angel wings away,
My heart shall take its flight,
To dwell forever 'neath a sun
Of everlasting light.
There 'mid the wild gazelle and kid,
I'll chase the mountains o'er—
And gather flowers in maiden joy,
Remembering grief no more.

The Influence of Christianity on the Mind.

In the development of the intellectual faculties there is a great diversity among men. There are some tribes of the human race, among whom reason appears but little in advance of instinct.

So wild are their habits; so ignorant are they of the most simple arts; so uncultivated are their manners; so ferocious their tempers, that one can hardly believe they possess a human soul. Yet in the darkest savage bosom there is a taper, whose light can never be extinguished. That breast which appears more barren than the African desert, holds deep in its dark recesses a germ of celestial origin. That degraded, cold heart contains a latent spark of intelligence, which, by the influence of favorable circumstances, may be kindled up into a living, brilliant flame. Mind, as well as matter, is inert. Without the operation of exciting causes it remains in a state of inactivity. Yet let force be once applied; let an impulse once be given, and the human intellect marches forward in strength and victory, until it extends its dominion over the hosts of heaven, reduces systems of worlds to its authority, and maintains undisputed control over the universe. Let the seminal principle of reason be subjected to the influence of causes favorable to the animation of its powers, and it will start from its embryo sleep; its germs will appear; it will increase in strength and beauty; extend its branches; put forth its flowers; and bring to maturity its abundant fruits.

The superior attainments of those luminaries of science, who have shone in every age as stars of the first magnitude!—the scientific and literary character of those nations, who in the history of the world have appeared, like a brilliant constellation in some part of the heavens, in the midst of surrounding darkness and gloom; those dazzling eras of literature, which have occasionally burst at once on the astonished view, like the meteor in the darkness of midnight; and those happy periods of intellectual improvement which have approached gradually, like the morning, preceded by twilight, and growing brighter and brighter still until the perfect day, may all be traced to the influence of causes, either general or particular, which have exerted a specific influence in producing these effects.

A high state of intellectual refinement is incompatible with the degradation of the moral feelings. Who does not know, that the depravity of the moral feelings and the triumphant reign of the vicious passions, degrade and enervate the mind? How many, who might have been the wisest, the happiest, and the best, have, through the influence of vice, been the most wretched, and the meanest of mankind. Genius, springing up in a soil, destitute of virtue, is impeded in its progress to maturity, by the interference of many noxious plants. It may shoot out rapidly into many wild excrescences; but like a plant deprived of the light, it soon becomes sickly, and feeble, and falls to destruction. But let genius draw its nourishment from a pure heart; let the vicious passions be eradicated; let the moral atmosphere be purified from noxious exhalations, and then it arrives at a state of maturity, bringing forth in the greatest abundance the richest fruits. The moral influence of christianity is necessary to restrain the eccentricities, and correct the erring flights of the mind. Remove from the mind the regulating influence of christianity, and the most brilliant geniuses, instead of distributing, like the sun, light and comfort around their path, would, like comets unrestrained by central attraction, cross each other's orbits, and rushing furiously together, shake the universe with violent convulsions, and involve themselves in the common ruin. How many an accomplished and splendid genius has been wrecked and ruined by the unrestrained violence of the passions which it carried in its own bosom! We lament the fate of such, as we would that of some beautiful world, whose own internal fires had overwhelmed it in irremediable destruction. But christianity corrects the eccentricities of passionate impulse. It so tempers these internal fires, that they refine, purify, and animate the mind, while they do not, by excessive or irregular action, endanger either the safety or the appropriate operation of the intellectual machinery. To the unquiet and disturbed spirit, agitated by the disappointments, vexations and commotions of life, devotion is like oil to the troubled waters. It smooths the ruffled surface; it infuses through the soul a deep pervading tranquillity—a sublimity of feeling, which nothing can disturb. Under its healthful and purifying influence, the mind gathers strength and energy, and comes forth to its task, bright and beautiful as the morning of summer, when the pure breezes of night have driven away the remnants of the storm.

How deficient is every system of education, which has not for its basis the broad principles of the christian religion. Strike out christianity from modern education, and the whole fabric of mind would totter and fall in terrible ruins. We are no advocates for associating sectarian bigotry with education. Bigotry is the mother of ignorance, and ignorance of intolerance. But we consider christianity as the guardian genius of education; the purifier of the fountains of knowledge;—the enemy of prejudice and illiberal views. She unrivets the fetters of the mind, and bids it go free as the eternal Spirit that made it. Spirit of christianity! thou who art the inspirer of genius, and the friend of humanity! May the literary institutions of our happy country ever be thy chosen home. Thou shalt reign in peace, in glory, in honor, in the classic halls of New England; guiding thousands to knowledge and to happiness.

A Vision of the Night.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

BR. BACON: I had been looking over the pages of a little book entitled 'Allegories and Divers Day-Dreams,' by our faithful brother, A. C. T. Probably this circumstance might have induced the dream which follows. I am not ignorant of the fact that it is but a poor imitation of excellent models; nevertheless, I hope you will not deem it altogether worthless and unmeaning.

I stood in a beautiful garden, by the brink of a stream that went sparkling and singing among the flowers. The trees were large and luxuriant, and wove themselves into arches over my head. The air was fragrant with the breath of roses and geraniums; and the dewy freshness of morning was added to its sweetness. On a mossy bank, studded over with violets, reclined a beautiful creature, such as we see only in dreams. It would be impossible to describe the purity of her complexion, the delicate carmine of her cheek, and the deep blue of her heavenly eyes. Tears, not of sadness, but of holy thought, trembled upon the soft lashes of those eyes, and a meek, almost a gay smile, played around her dimpled mouth. I loved her—I loved her for her very beauty's sake; but most I loved her because she turned her eyes toward heaven. Among the curls of her soft, golden hair, a few white rose-buds were entwined, and flowers as sweet as they were beautiful, were fastened in a knot upon her bosom.

I stood looking at her, and loving her as much as the poet loves his Muse, when I was startled by the approach of another person, who threw himself rudely down beside the maiden. The flowers withered, and the grass turned sere and yellow at his touch; and I marvelled not that they should, when I for a moment glanced at his horrid countenance. Grim as a ghost, with eyes glaring like a madman, and hands dripping with blood, he sat there like some terrible incubus, immovable as stone. A snake lay coiled in his bosom with poison on its fangs, and worms were crawling around his heart. I shuddered as I looked at him, he was so horrible; and I trembled for the maiden, at whose side he had thrown himself. But to my surprise, she did not seem alarmed. A soft look of pity took the place of her smile; and the tears that had been of worship were changed to tears of compassion.

"Your name is Guilt," she said, in a sweet, low voice, turning her mild eyes upon his, which quailed and were downcast before them; "I knew I must meet you, but I had hoped to have found you less horrible."

"It is to Innocence, only, that I appear horrible. There are those who find in me something to admire—and I have many guises to deceive the unsuspecting. Sometimes I put on your form and mien, fair maiden, and then I can enter the holiest sanctuaries with safety. But now I am without disguise—you see me as I am by nature—and you call me horrible."

"So horrible that I wonder how any disguise can screen you," answered Innocence, covering her eyes for a moment with her hands, to shut out the frightful vision. "But what is your work among men? I hardly know the object of your enterprise in this world, though I have heard reports of your cruelties. Please enlighten me."

"Cruelties? Yes, I am cruel—more cruel than the worms that gnaw forever at my heart. I am cruel; and yet the world is apt to think me kind. To one man I go, and whisper him to commit some deed of blood. I promise him that his reward shall be gold, station, power; and he believes me. He commits the crime, and turns to receive his meed. I yield it. Gold, station, power, all are his. He rises early from his splendid couch, and goes out upon his ornamental grounds. The images of frightful dreams still haunt his mind, and the rustle of every leaf causes him to tremble, and become pallid with fright. The soft footsteps of the young rabbit, and the low warble of the thrush alarm him, and he steals back into his house that he may shut out all sounds and sights that have power to disturb. There meet him his fair young children—bright beings of love and joy. But the glances of their clear, laughing eyes pierce him with unutterable anguish; and he hides himself from their presence, as the vampire hides from the sunbeams. Even the tender looks of his anxious wife serve but to increase his sufferings. And his faithful dog that sits meekly down at his side, and licks his hands, and whimpers at the sight of his haggard smile—even his affection distresses him, and he sends him away to his death. Then at night the long, dreary hours in which he tosses upon his bed of down—the terrible thoughts which will not permit him to sleep—the grim spectres which he fancies he sees gliding around him—the groans of the murdered that ring in his ears—these, these are the glorious harvest of his crimes; this is my work among men!"

"How different from mine," exclaimed Innocence, again lifting her beautiful eyes, humid with tears, toward her native heaven. "I prompt to no deeds but the gentle deeds of love; I promise no reward but a happy heart and tranquil thoughts. Sweet is the sleep of those who fulfill my law. They awake at the song of the birds, and lift their own hearts to God in a hymn of praise. They love the sound of the waving leaves, and the voice of the running water. All the young creatures of the wood are dear to them, and their hearts have sympathy even for the lowly flowers. All gentle affections are sources of joy to them, and nothing is sweeter than the voice of laughing childhood. Their days are sunny and glad, and their nights are holy seasons of repose. This is my work among men—and it is a work that my Father approves. I would it were not so often checked by your operations, oh bloody-handed Guilt!"

"You wish in vain, poor child! still shall I go on teaching the hollow heart to wear your smiles, and the purged hypocrite to breathe your prayers. Still shall I go on cheating men into the belief that my rewards are all that I declare them to be—and that in my service, only, can they attain to the highest honors of life."

"Must it, indeed, be so?" sighed Innocence, turning a pleading eye toward the throne of Love; "poor victims! they will find when it is too late, how much they have lost in losing me; and how richer far is one approving smile of mine, with the quiet repose and gentle hopes that I bestow, than all your treacherous rewards, earned at so hard a service, and at such fearful expense. Happy am I, oh Guilt, in the praises of those who serve at my altar. Every day do they come to me with blessings, and with entreaties to be saved from your wiles; while your votaries mutter continuous curses against your treachery, and bewail the day in which they first followed your bloody steps, which lead down to the paths of shame.'

Scarce had she uttered these words, when Guilt, like Proteus of old, assumed the beautiful form and manners of the maiden at his side. So perfect was the disguise, that even the most scrutinizing eye might be easily deceived; and yet it was not difficult to perceive that what in one was nature, in the other was consummate art; that what in one was but the involuntary expression of the soul, in the other was the effect of study and of guarded effort. Yet the illusion was so complete, Innocence herself was astonished, and burst into tears. 'Alas!' she cried, 'must so much iniquity be wrought in my name? Must my very form be made an instrument to betray? In what, then, am I superior to my adversary?'

'In thy works and in thy rewards!' I exclaimed, awaking myself by the earnestness with which I spoke; for as scripture hath declared, 'By their fruits shall ye know them!'

The Restored.

BY IONE.

'THOU hast put gladness in my heart.' PSALMS.

I BLESS thee, oh, my God!
That the loved playmate of my boyhood's years,
Fearfully stricken by thy chastening rod,
Yet lifts his head to smile away our fears.

A stranger's couch he pressed,
And met the glances of a stranger's eye!
No mother lulled his throbbing brow to rest,
No sister drew with unheard footstep nigh.

Lonely and sad he lay,
While fever fired the current in his veins.
'Oh! bear me hence where cooling zephyrs play,
And streams are gliding through the verdant plains.

'To be at home once more,
To see thee, brother, with thy quiet smile,
To hear the murmuring on our rocky shore,
Whose low, sad music would my pain beguile,—

'This is my constant prayer,
As oft in loneliness the hours depart;
I breathe my sorrows to the burdened air,
Which brings no answer to my aching heart!'

The sufferer's voice was hushed,
As nature bowed beneath the dreadful doom.
But health again with welcome fervor rushed,
And snatched our treasure from the opening tomb!

Joy, that again he walks
The paths of living men, and lifts his voice—
Though we may hear it not—and joyous talks
Of dangers past that bid his soul rejoice!

Thou who wert Israel's guide
Along the desert's wide and trackless way,
Move with sustaining arm his form beside,
And bid the tempter from his path away!

A Christmas Address.

Our temple wears an unusual appearance. Its walls are hung round with the green and fragrant wreaths, woven by the hand of taste and skill, from the product of the forest and wood. It is not the adornment of pride, but the expression of religious sentiment—speaking forth a spiritual language to all who can throw the garments of poetry around material forms, woven by sacred affection and pure feeling. A stranger to our customs would, on entering our sanctuary this evening, be impressed with a conviction that there was deep meaning in the chaste and beautiful ornaments here placed, and must indeed be strangely free from the curiosity common to man, if he did not inquire out the hidden sentiment, and seek to know all the associations connected with what he beheld. And are we all ready to give the answer in the fullness of truth—to interpret to him these mystical characters? I would fain hope it were so—that deep feeling has given to thought that inspiration by which memory is quickened, imagination made more vivid, and the beautiful scenery of faith and hope is more clearly perceived; by which we are made more deeply conscious of what Jesus Christ has been, is, and will be, to us and to the world of mankind; and how he is the perfect Example, the reflected moral image of God, the King of Truth, and the ordained Savior of mankind. Then the evergreen of the forest becomes a type of the unfading love of Jehovah, of the undying sympathy of the Christ, and the ever blooming beauty of true spiritual affection. And as this beautiful type is thus wrought into many forms, and all lovely, so we may dwell on the various, and each beautiful, manifestations of this love of Jehovah, this sympathy of Christ, and this affection in man. And as we have thus adorned the material temple with the garlands of earth, let us adorn the spiritual temple with the wreaths of the heavenly graces, and thus have the consciousness that we know we are the temple of God, and possess a taste for the beautiful in religion. It is this sympathy with the Divine that alone can give the feeling that caused the poet to declare,—

' Not a tree,
A plant, or leaf, or blossom, but contains
A folio volume.—We may read, and read,
And read again; and still find something new;
Something to please, and something to instruct,
Even in the humble weed.'

We have wreathed our house, and have gathered here, in honor of the Man of Nazareth, the Messiah of God, and the great Reconciler to the Father. Some of the many views to be taken of his life, character, and mission, are the appropriate themes for discourse on the occasion; and the fruitfulness of the study of the character, and revelations of Christ to man, can in some degree, be conceived of by considering the vast variety of names and titles associated with him in the scriptures—each affording subject matter for much thought and reflection, and bringing before the mind beautiful images and forms to delight and charm.

But the short hour allotted me requires a careful selection of a theme from the many that rise up to claim precedency; and by meditation I have been led to contrast the benefits of the christian philosophy with the Baconian; and the folly of rejecting the one, with the folly of rejecting the other.

The subject chosen is one which will show the worth of christianity—what mighty reforms the Almighty permits the impelling energies of one mind to effect—the degrading influence of infidelity, and the reasons for clinging to the philosophy of the christian scriptures as worthy of all honor. And as I speak by the request of associated young men, and as I feel that right christian principle is the soul of goodness, and the living, beating heart of usefulness, I know of no theme better suited to this occasion, while I think of the subtle efforts put forth in various forms to undermine the foundations of rational faith, and to palm on man a deceitful philosophy, that would leave him without hope and without God in the world. When I speak of Infidelity, I mean the atheistical philosophy that boasts so much and possesses so little—that rejects the claims of Jesus Christ, marks him as a creation of imagination, or an enthusiast, or an impostor, and can find no word it loves so well to apply to christianity as superstition. When Jesus Christ—the glory of humanity—is thus rejected; the most glorious manifestation of the Deity thus trodden under foot, it is but a slight step that brings the mind down into the dark cavern of atheism. And these vagaries I term infidelity, because fidelity to the simplest lofty aspiration of our spiritual nature would prevent the whole, and because these vanities make man false to the better impulses of the human soul. I would always treat this as a fallacy of the head, rather than an error of the heart, for often the heart speaks out against what the brain in its visionary hours is coining for the denier of the divine in christianity. I cannot speak but with pity for such—for why do we lament that ever Milton was blind, or that the eyes of Galileo ever grew old and dim? Simply because we know how well the one was fitted to enjoy the beautiful in nature through the sense of sight, and the other to study the mystic page of the firmament. So must I lament the blindness of mind, and the dimness of spiritual sight, in the unbeliever, because I know how well God has constituted him to admire the beauties, and enjoy the pleasures, peculiar to christianity. I speak to rational beings, and therefore I will use none but the language of soberness, argument, and persuasion.

But to the analogy that is to claim our attention. And first of the grand philosophy of study and investigation given to the world by Sir Francis Bacon. He, you well know, was the first who taught the right method of study and investigation to the attainment of truth. He waved his wand—and the true avenue to all discoveries was opened. He spoke, and the chains that had bound men to names and systems were loosed. He wrought, and tottering and crashing came down the old fabrics of scholastic subtleties and vain speculations; the rubbish was removed, and up went the foundations of a glorious temple, every stone a fact, and when the headstone shall be placed on the finished structure, the universal acclamation shall be—Truth—Truth unto it! Truth the temple, and truth the spirit of the worshippers.

Strange was the state of the philosophical world when Bacon arose in the energies of his mind. The reigning doctrines were opinions and theories; and speculation, is a better term to apply to the great mass of intellectual employment, than study; for speculation upon systems had usurped the province of investigation of facts, and nature was neglected in the devotion to doctrines. The master spirit came forth, and gave to the world the philosophy of Induction, which taught the secret of all true study of the sciences in bidding the mind to study facts, not conjectures—to place before itself an undoubted truth, however simple in itself, as a nucleus around which to gather kindred ones, and thus by carefully bringing together right materials, to bring out truth. He significantly termed his philosophy—'asking questions of nature.' And when he taught the necessity of taking a truth as the basis and centre of all study, he became the herald of wisdom in her divinest forms. The history of the sciences from that period to the present, is but a record of the success and value of his philosophy; and according as the great minds that came after him imbibed the spirit of this philosophy they were rivals, and he that had the most—even the illustrious Newton—was the wisest and the greatest apostle of truth.

How well emblematic of the world at the advent of Jesus, and the worth of the christian philosophy, are the state of the philosophical world and the importance of the philosophy of the Reformer of study! While Jesus was in humility in Nazareth, how was the outer world of teachers and religionists! All its parts at variance, all needing the true principle of sympathy that would give affinity to what was good, and cause the evil to rise up in dross and be thrown aside. Many were the standards, many the clans, and each clan had its own leader and dress, but no spirit of unity dwelt amidst them as a centering power. Jesus came forth, and gave the world the only true spiritual philosophy—'Search the Scriptures!' And he did more than the father of natural, experimental philosophy, for he gave a central truth—fixed the fact that must be the grand nucleus—the centre to which all that is true in nature and revelation, pertaining to God, human duty and final destiny, must gravitate. That truth was the fact wrapt up in those two words so often expressed and so little adequately felt by us, 'OUR FATHER.' If God be our Father, all his creations, governments, and dealings with man, must accord with the true paternal spirit. If God be our Father, the whole of human duty must be to understand what is the filial spirit, to cultivate and continuously exercise it, binding the soul to the glory of the Deity by uniting it to the promotion of man's good. If God be our Father, the consummation must be the full manifestation of the paternal in the Divinity, and the full exercise of the filial in Humanity. God must be a Father ever where and always—to each and all—through time and eternity, if our Lord spake truth. He did speak truth, and the fact is the everlasting centre towards which all that is true in morals and religion must gravitate, and repelled must be every speculation that has not an affinity therewith. Go forward by spiritual philosophy to the discovery of truth, and clear as if written with a sunbeam on the broad arch of heaven, will be seen, in due time, what is the character and purposes of God, human duty, and relations growing out of these, and the true grounds of immortal hopes. God is Father! is the idea, and infinite are all its relations, linking time with eternity, and giving employment to the thoughts, and joy to the affections, through ceaseless ages and to all mankind.

To reject the Baconian philosophy were less than to reject the Christian, even as the spiritual is worth more than the natural. To reject the one, were to give up the intellect to error and conjecture—to launch out on the broad sea of speculation and fancy, without a single guiding star. To reject the other, were to give up certainty and satisfying knowledge, for that which gives no hope and can yield no comfort. What words can picture the state of the mind that deems a better name for our sacred book would be new and old superstition, than the one it bears, and turns from the divinity there to deify the laws of nature. What is taken from the soul that deems us enthusiasts in honoring the son of Mary? The noblest specimen of humanity—yea, humanity all radiant with the divinity—the pure inner spirit making the outward glorious. To strike out Milton and Shakspeare from the world of literature would be deemed a great loss. But no more in comparison with striking out Jesus from the world of truth, than the loss of the masses of ice which form in the heavens at times beautiful mock suns, compared with the blotting out of the sun itself. They are the light of their respective worlds—the world of matter and of truth. And as the beams of the one stream down from his fount illuminating the earth, giving all the life and beauty of the verdure of the field, the tints of the rose and her sister flowers, the radiance and hues of the landscape, the glory of the clouds, and all that is attractive and beautiful in the sea or on the land, and whose light is the grand power 'without whose vesting beauty all were wrapped in unessential gloom;' the other gives that light to the moral and spiritual world that reveals beauty and harmony where all was before dark and mysterious. Would you know what it is to lose the sense of bodily sight, hear the plaintive strain of Milton on his blindness,—

'Thus with the year
Seasons return, but not to me returns
Day, or the sweet approach of eve or morn,
Or sight of vernal bloom, or summer's rose,
Or flocks, or herds, or human face divine;
But clouds instead, and ever-during dark,
Surround me! From the cheerful ways of men
Cut off; and for the book of knowledge fair,
Presented with a universal blank
Of nature's works, to me expunged and razed;
And wisdom at one entrance quite shut out.'

Would you know what it is to be spiritually blind? hear the acknowledgment of Hume,—'I am affrighted and confounded with that forlorn solitude in which I am placed by my philosophy. When I look abroad, I foresee, on every side, dispute, contradiction, and distraction. When I turn my eyes inward, I find nothing but doubt and ignorance. Where am I, or what? From what causes do I derive existence, or to what condition do I return? I am confounded with these questions; and I begin to fancy myself in the most deplorable condition imaginable, enviored with the deepest darkness.'

And is this the philosophy that presumes to compete with the christian? And is this the philosopher who is lauded by those who would make the idea of God an imagination, revelation a fable, and christianity a lie? Let those who love darkness better than light choose this philosophy—the atheistic philosophy of Hume's that environs the mind with deepest darkness, making thought a doubt, life a mystery, and death annihilation; but may Bethlehem's star never grow dim in the heavens of our meditation and delight.

'It is our Light, our Guide, our All;
It makes our dark forebodings cease;
And, through the storm and danger's thrall,
'Twill lead us to the port of peace.'

Let me fix your minds now upon particulars pertaining to this subject, so that you may have distinct impressions in reference to the degrading influence of infidelity upon the intellectual and moral man, and feel more your obligations to Jesus Christ.

1. It changes man from being a child of God into a creature of the earth. It denies him his heavenly paternity and traces his origin to forest animals, making apes and monkeys his ancestors, or leaves it all in mystery. An organized atom—a highly cultivated beast—an exquisite machine whose vibrations give birth to thought, affection, and speech, which entirely dissolves when the movement stops, so that the soul of a Milton may become the sensorium of an owl or bat! The eagle becomes a mere worm, and the child who would fain think it has a father, is left to sorrow over his orphanage.

2. It denies him the privilege of tracing out a governing benevolence where are discovered beneficial arrangements and adaptations in nature. Who has not been moved to tears in discovering some kindly arranged pleasure by the hand of love? Who has not felt emotions too deep for expression in looking around the chamber of sickness, and seeing there the evidences that a dear one had been busy while he slept, to prepare comforts to cheer him? And when we receive a kindness from an unknown source, are we not pained by our ignorance, instinctively desiring to discover to whom we are indebted? All this we have known; and shall we not apply the lesson to the benevolent arrangements in nature? We must; and is there not a vast difference between considering all the beautiful adaptations of means to ends, promoting human enjoyment, which are exhibited in the study of nature and man, with the idea of a governing and directing God, than with a belief in chance and necessity? Most certainly. An elegant writer has put into the mouth of one of his characters the following language, which is the expression of a feeling familiar to the christian,—'Whenever I feel the most, I am the most inclined to prayer. And what a delicious overflow of the heart is prayer! When I am with you—and feel that you love me, my happiness would be painful if there were no God whom I might bless for its excess.' Holy indeed is the bliss of such a heart; and whenever more insight is given to the means the Creator has provided and arranged for his creatures' happiness, a new spring of grateful and joyous feeling is opened in the soul.

But with him who knows not God how different the effect! To him nature is God, and he seeks no higher Deity; and therefore what to the christian are divine arrangements, love's harmonies, a Father's provisions for his children's enjoyment, he looks upon as the product of unconscious matter obeying laws of necessity, and designing benevolence cannot therefore be recognized by him. What an elevation of thought and feeling is he thus deprived of! From him is torn the loftiest and divinest poetry—for the sublimest poetry is the union of the spiritual with outward nature—blending the divine with the material, and thus clothing in the garments of holy sentiment the forms of outer beauty. There is no poetry amid the stars till they declare the glory of God, nor amid the flowers of earth till in their loveliness is traced the smile of Him who gave them

'To minister delight to man,
And beautify the earth.'

When christian sentiment burns and glows within, warming with devotion the whole mental being, the soul sees the glory of his Maker in every twinkling star, reads his name all over the beautiful terrestrial, and owns his goodness manifested in all the vast variety of ordinations to benevolent ends in nature's economy, while the silent hymn of deep feeling is read by the Searcher of hearts—'How excellent is thy loving kindness, O God!' The atheist may see these ten thousand proofs of benevolent design, but he is not moved to thankfulness to the designing Mind; and though he discovers he is fearfully and wonderfully made, he has no tribute of praise to the Framer of man. And thus he is degraded; for man is always degraded when the deepest affections, and the purest and loftiest aspirations of which his nature is capable, are buried and kept down by the vanities that rise from the denial of God and his own spiritual nature.

3. It deprives him of the gratification of one of the deepest wants of our nature—the desire for something more perfect and lovely than of earth. How is this deep want to be satisfied by a denial of the divinity of the religion of Jesus Christ! That religion alone can inspire the human soul with the assurance so feelingly expressed by the German poet: 'O God! thou canst and wilt give us hereafter a reality, that shall embody, and exceed, and satisfy, all that is here ideal!' O how glorious must that reality be, that shall satisfy the infinite aspirations of the soul after the Perfect! It must be placed in the future, where the mind freed from all grossness of association shall see truth in the light of the Deity's smile. Infidelity would satisfy us with earth. As well attempt to satisfy the eagle with the darkness and bounds of a prison. It cannot be—and even the unbeliever will sometimes write a hope by lightning-thought on the cloud curtain of prospective annihilation.

4. It takes from him the great and grand guard against secret sin, by taking from the mind a belief in an Omnipresent Judge. It cannot speak strongly and say, 'Be sure your sin will find you out,' for it denies the highest relations of our moral being, and all obligations to seek the approbation of a higher than man, and gives in lieu thereof a miserable morality—miserable, because it is the source of much of the moral evil in our world and the imagination that degrades man. Teach men that they are amenable to no power but man's—that there is no eye resting on their acts than that of the individual, or of society, and in the depths of secret wickedness they are flattered into security. Society—its peace, security, and progress—requires for man a religious morality—a morality that has a divine soul—that follows man with an all-seeing eye wherever he betakes him to work wickedness, and pursues him with the consciousness that though he hide himself in the top of Carmel, or be hid in the bottom of the sea, he cannot be released from the judgment of the Higher than earth's highest, who regardeth the ways of men.

Here lies the great distinction between the morality of revelation and that of atheistical speculation. The one follows man with an omnipresent and omniscient eye, the other only with the contracted and often clouded eye of man and society. The one makes him feel that he is accountable at all times and in every place to one whose judgment cannot be averted by skill and talent; the other teaches him that he is amenable to society only, whose penalties may often be averted by the sophistry and talent of skill, and are often evaded by cunning and craft. The one makes him realize that he has a spiritual nature and is an immortal being; the other only reminds him of earthly relations. The one is divine, the other human.

If mankind had never felt that they were accountable to other than human authority and power, where would be the glory of humanity—the illustrious examples of the nobility of our nature? In the ages of darkness and the despotism of the few powerful over the many weak, had not some felt deeply—their whole being being pervaded with the consciousness of their accountability to God, the greatest reformers and champions of the right, would have shrunk away to obscurity. This has been the spring of the most holy and honorable perseverance for man's good. This has made the Pauls, the Washingtons, the Howards. Take away the divine from human consciousness, and you take away the soul's chief strength and the heart's mightiest energy to meet, bear, and triumph amid perils and woes. It is that which has sent up from the retreats of solitude and exile the hymn of faith and hope—the song of the heart's confidence, and the mind's solace:

'And faint not heart of man! though years wane slow!
There have been those that from the deepest caves,
And cells of night, and fastnesses below
The stormy dashing of the ocean-waves,
Down, farther down than gold lies hid, have nursed
A quenchless hope, and watched their time and burst
On the bright day, like wakeners from the graves!'

Such have been those who felt the divine in their souls, and leaned upon the arm of God. Mere humanity is weak—O how weak!

5. It tears from the human heart the only true Comforter. 'When my heart is overwhelmed,' says the Psalmist, 'lead me to the Rock that is higher than I.' But where is such a rock, if we give ourselves up to the rejectors of all that is super-human? There is none. The drooping vine must still droop and bleed, for there is no friendly arm on which it can lean, and as it creeps along upon the earth, it must become intermingled with thorns and briars that pierce it with new wounds, till at last it dies. The christian religion alone can comfort in affliction. Christianity with its parental God and its heaven of re-union and eternal bliss, is the true genius of consolation. It speaks to the widow, 'Thy Maker is thy husband, the Holy One is thy Friend.' To the fatherless the upward glance is given while the heart speaks out to God: 'Doubtless thou art our Father.' And to every child of sorrow it repeats the ancient assurance of Jehovah: 'As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you.' And thus is given the sweet—O how sweet! assurance that 'earth hath no sorrow that heaven cannot cure.'

But alas! for him who writes other than truth on our sacred book—to whom Jesus is not the resurrection and the life—and who looks on the grave as the last home of the glorious intellect and the expansive affections, as well as of the body. As the venerated father, the idolized mother, the beloved wife, or the dear child, is shrouded for the tomb and laid there, he tries to tie down his feelings so as to say, Gone forever! With a heart of common affections it is sad enough to give the last earthly kiss of affection to a beloved one even when christian faith and hope are strong—but to give it with no pulse of immortal hope in the heart, is horror itself! Well—well has it been said: 'To how many hath the death of the beloved been the parent of faith!'

Thus have I spoken of the degrading influence of infidelity on the intellectual and moral man, and the contrast of christianity therewith, must tend, I think, to make you, as it has me, honor, love, and serve, the Author and Finisher of our faith, as the Messiah and Son of God. Christianity teaches us to look to the Creator of all worlds as our Father and Benefactor; Infidelity tells us we are only a little superior to our fellow beasts. Christianity teaches us to feel the relationship that exists between our spiritual nature and glorified spirits; Infidelity tells us there is no higher order of beings than ourselves. Christianity teaches us to look forward to a pure and blissful immortal state; Infidelity tells us the grave is the bound of our whole being—that from the perishing animal there is no distinct nature, and that alike sink into nothingness the instinct of a bird and the mind of a Shakspeare! I honor Jesus Christ and the immortal mind, and therefore cling to the teachings of christianity. I love man, and desire too much the happiness and progress of my race, not to despise, abhor, and loathe infidelity. And in full view of both—with the contrast directly before us,—it becomes us to pledge ourselves to advance its true interests by all the means available. If we would be true worshipers at the altar of human good, we must do it, and let us do it—in the name of our God set up our banner.

One great labor for us is to exhibit to the world the evidences that Universalism is but another name for pure christianity—christianity as it existed in the eternal purpose of Jehovah, lived in the mind and heart of Jesus, and flowed from the lips of Christ and his apostles. The world is ignorant of the true principles of our faith, and of their harmony with every perfection of God, and with the whole being of man, and therefore men speak evil of the things they understand not. But man must receive that faith in its beauty and fullness before the spiritual nature will be satisfied—the wrathful passions subdued—the dominion of peace set up in the earth, and the spirit of love become the governing and directing energy in man. As the Lord liveth, these things are so.

Men condemn and despise Universalism because it is christianity exhibited amid the glories of the mount of Transfiguration, rather than shaded and darkened by the smoke and the tempest, and the terror of Mount Sinai; because its voice is the voice of Jesus' blood that cries, 'Father forgive!' and not the voice of Abel's blood that cries for vengeance; and because it would move men to virtue and religion by the glories of a real heaven, and not drive them by the flames of an imaginary eternal hell. But God will protect that which is good, though men despise it; and in him is our trust for the future triumphs of our faith as the antidote—and 'tis the only one—of infidelity.

There is no power like the spirit of the Restitution faith to take hold on the human heart and turn it from the degradation of infidelity, to the sublime and elevating conceptions of the truth of the Divine character and government, as revealed in the gospel. According as systems of doctrine advance from primitive Calvinism and become disrobed of absurdities and follies, and all that is in them good and pure is seen to assimilate with the principles of Universalism, they will become antidotes to infidelity, because they will answer the wants of men—the divinely infixed desires of the soul. And these desires cannot be satisfied with any doctrine that casts one cloud over the glory of the future world as the state of happiness and purity for all mankind. Disciples of all sects would save all mankind if they could only have their own way of doing it; and disciples of all sects deem it the duty of man to have constantly a deep concern for the salvation of souls; and disciples of all sects feel that there is no cause of rejoicing like the conversion of sinners, and the wicked made holy gives them unutterable satisfaction. These are the facts that fortify and prove the assertion I have made. They prove the existence of desires and motives, of interest and concern, and capacities for enjoyment, in reference to human salvation, that can never be satisfied but by the prospective view of the final restoration of universal man. We are linked with the ungodly as well as with the holy, and we need as much a hope for the glorious resurrection of the unjust to purity, as we do for the resurrection of the just to perfection. We have wept too bitter tears over their degradation, to be satisfied with a view of its eternal continuance. David must see his Absalom in heaven ere the haven of rescued souls can be a heaven to him; and not there as Absalom the rebellious, but as Absalom a true child of God. We must have a sure hope for the salvation of the dear who were, despite our efforts, among the sinful, ere we can be resigned to God.

There is no sound in the triumphal strain of the redeemed, which does not find an echo in our hearts, as it ascribes glory to God. The glory of God! what is it? It is in the spiritual good of man; and as true as man has a spiritual nature, and love and holiness are the happiness of it, so true is it that the infinite Father will throw around man, in time or eternity, such clear manifestations of himself and his love, as to draw out into right exercise the powers of man's spiritual nature. We are creatures of progress, and if the discovery is not made in the years of time that happiness is in the practice of holiness, why should eternity be an eternity of the same waste of affection and mind—why should the child born for heaven be made evermore to dwell in an abode of darkness? Nay, nay, eternity will not be as time, a mingling of goodness and transgression, but its intenser light will reveal to the spirit the Father clearly, and love shall be born with the sight, and man be happy. This is our hope for ourselves, and our loves, for affection stops not at the grave.

'We send these fond endearments o'er the grave,—
Heaven would be hell if loved ones were not there,
And any spot is heaven if we could save
From every stain of earth, and thither bear
The hearts that are to us our hope and care.'

But we want a heaven for more than the loves of our hearts—we want it large enough for every creature of mind and affection—large enough for the one fold Christ shall gather—yea, even the heaven of which the enraptured John caught a glimpse, where tears were wiped from off all faces, and pain and sorrow were not known. The burden of every song in such a heaven is Glory to God! and the beating pulse of gratitude shall make the rush of feeling throughout universal man to be a glorious choral cry—'Alleluia! for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth!'

For this transcendantly glorious hope we are indebted to the manifestation of God's love in the gift, ministry, and mediation, of Jesus Christ. 'All things are of God'—all the influences by which the heart is touched, the mind awakened, the conscience convinced of sin, and the whole man won over to love and holiness. Let us be thankful for the abundance of these influences, improve those proffered to us, and be for God and man, in living the active, holy and benevolent life. To this end, let us wear Christ as a miniature before our spiritual vision, and seek to be transformed into the like divine image—the unshadowed image of God. B.

BOLDNESS in the defence of the oppressed, exalts humanity. But to the oppressor, degradation is upon him.

Be slow to cast even the imputation of guilt on a friend, ere it shall appear.

WHEN thine heart inclines thee to assist the needy, leave all and do it, and happy thy rest.

'Pray without Ceasing.'

God of the first gray dawn !
To thee my vows I raise ;
And on the wings of morn,
Send up my song of praise.
I bless thee for the sleep
That soothed my weary frame ;
The vigil thou didst keep,
The visions bright that came.

God of the sun's first ray !
O let its influence be
A magnet, day by day
To draw me unto thee.
I bless thee for that light,
The sun that fills the soul,
Whose beams divinely bright,
Can purify the whole.

God of the glowing noon !
My prayer shall still ascend,
And crave a heavenly boon,
Of thee, my kindest Friend,
I seek that better part,
To animate this clod ;
I would be pure in heart,
That I may see my God !

God of the morning light,
And of the evening's close,
Thy love, no shade or blight,
Or diminution knows ;
O Father ! when at length,
My earthly ties shall sever,
Be thou my staff of strength,—
Thine arms—my home forever !

Conversation on Christmas.

A. A MERRY Christmas to you.

B. The same to you—but why is the birth day of Jesus called Christmas ?

A. The term is of Roman Catholic origin, and was derived from the celebration of a magnificent Mass on the day usually called the birth day of our Lord—called the Mass of Christ.

B. What is a Mass ?

A. It is a part of the Catholic service, consisting of singing, prayers, and sometimes the partaking of the consecrated wafer of the Eucharist. It is used as a general word for the festivals as Candlemas, &c. Their Liturgy is called their Mass-book.

B. I should like to attend the service, for it must be impressive.

A. It is indeed so when celebrated in one of the great Cathedrals as in Rome, or in Spain. Travelers describe the birth day Mass as most magnificent in Rome, where the Pope attends in great pomp, amid thousands of persons of all classes.

B. I should be glad to read some of these descriptions.

A. You can do it now, for here is one by Catherine Taylor.

B. I would thank you to read it as you have doubtless read it before, and I shall catch the ideas from your voice better than from a book.

A. I will do as you wish. She speaks of being in St. Peter's Church, and continues : ' Our servant came to tell us that he had spoken to a sacristan, who had promised to admit us into one of the small galleries, of which there are four beneath the dome. Nothing could be better than this situation ; here we were quietly seated, without any bustle, looking down on the expecting crowd of ladies, who were not admitted to their places, until long afterwards. Permission being once granted them to enter, in they rushed, each one struggling and pushing her way, in no very lady-like manner ; the guard, in vain attempting to moderate their eagerness, was completely overpowered by them. I felt ashamed, for they were most of them our countrywomen.

' We had still an hour and a half to wait ; but there was so much to amuse and interest us in the novel scene, that time flew without our knowing it. Every moment offered something new and strange. Now a cardinal, with his long train of servants, crossed the aisle in his bright scarlet robes,—or returned, having exchanged them for a more sumptuous dress of white satin and gold. Now an ambassador with his suite, was ushered through the crowd with all imaginable pomp. Here a priest, returning from a side altar, appeared from one of the arches, bearing the Host in his hand—there, a group of peasants in their bright festal garments, or a solitary friar pacing slowly along the aisle. In a confessional opposite to us sat a Dominican friar, listening amidst all this gorgeous array, to the tale of penitence which a woman was pouring into his ear. Presently the Guarda Nobile arrived ; this is the body-guard of his Holiness, and consists of the sons of noble Roman families : their dress is splendid,—scarlet and silver, with graceful plumes of drooping feathers. They took their station near the altar, at the top of the avenue of soldiers, which now reached to the great western door.'

B. That must have been a singular sight when we remember that the Pope is the pretended representative of God on earth, as was Jesus. How strange Jesus would have looked with a body-guard of soldiery around him. But go on; I wish to hear further.

A. 'At ten o'clock the cannon of Sant' Angelo announced the approach of the procession, the wide portals were thrown open, and from the far end of the noble aisle, we saw it slowly advancing, at first like a moving mass of satin and feathers. By degrees, however, we discerned the figures of which it was composed; first came attendants, bearing on crimson velvet cushions the various Papal mitres and tiaras, the gold staff and cross, and the insignia of the temporal power of the Pope. Bishops and cardinals followed, each with his train of priests and servants. Two men next appeared, with large fans of white peacocks' feathers, immediately preceding the Santo Padre: these fans are carried before the Pope, and the eyes on the feathers are considered emblematical of those of the whole human race, which are directed to him as the vicegerent of God on earth. His holiness was seated in a chair of crimson and gold, borne on the shoulders of twelve men in sumptuous liveries; over his head floated a canopy of white satin, supported on lances carried by the Palfrenieri, as the persons selected for this office are called. He was dressed in magnificent robes of white satin embroidered with gold, and on his head was the triple crown: bestowing his benediction on the people, by making the sign of the cross in the air, he passed on to the high altar, where, descending from his ærial throne, he knelt for a minute at a splendid Prie-Dieu and was then conducted to his chair of state. At this moment the Mass began, the choristers chanting a glorious Kyrie Eleison. The cardinals each knelt in turn before the footstool of the Pope and kissed his hand; the bishops followed, and kneeling pressed their lips to his knee, while all their attendant priests saluted the cross embroidered on his slipper. Each as he retired, bowed first to the Pope, as the representative of God on earth, and then to the right and left, as to the Son and Holy Ghost. Then the cardinals, receiving from the priests at the altar various parts of the Pope's dress, proceeded to divest him of his original robes. Ten were employed in this ceremony, who, stripping him of all his gay attire, left him sitting in a plain dress of white linen. I could not help smiling to see the grave old cardinals acting the part of valets, as they now unrobed, and again dressed up, their master like a puppet in satin and gold: at length the weighty task was accomplished and the Mass proceeded.'

B. O to be servant to great folks is a noble office to some; and we read of a dispute which took place in England for the privilege of holding a towel for the king Richard the Second, while he washed his hands before dinner, on the Coronation day. The one whose right it was, was not of a sufficiently exalted rank!

A. Our author continues:—'I cannot follow the Mass through all the accompanying genuflections, the walking to and from the altar, the crowning and uncrowning of the Pope. Wearied out at last, I sat with my eyes closed, listening to the beautiful music; there was no organ, but the voices were rich and melodious, as they poured forth strains of delicious harmony. At last the Pope arose, and supported by two cardinals approached the altar; clouds of incense ascended from the fuming censers as he elevated the Host. That was a moment never to be forgotten; the whole multitude was prostrate, every head was bent in adoration; the arms of the soldiers fell to the ground with a clanging sound, and a deathlike silence followed. I scarcely dared to breathe; when from the far end of the long aisle the full and silvery notes of a trumpet stole upon my ear like sounds from heaven. Amidst assembled thousands the Pope alone was standing; three times he raised the cup, while a stream of glowing sunshine, falling on his uncovered head, seemed to light up the altar: then he replaced the chalice; the people rose, and loud hosannas resounded through the mighty dome. There was a power in the scene at that moment which even my heretic heart acknowledged; I forgot the weak emblem which was the object of adoration, and my thoughts rose to him who is the only fountain of life and light and all things.'

B. That must have been grand indeed, and who would not love to be present amid the witching sweetness and overpowering grandeur of the service! I marvel not that the Catholic worship is so attractive to thousands, and I would it could be separated from the gross superstitions of the church.

A. So do I. But Protestants reject the good because of the evil.

B. To what do you refer?

A. Particularly to Christmas. At one time the English Parliament voted to abolish the notice of the day because the Papists observed it; and our Puritan fathers thus decreed in the Colony;—'No one shall keep Christmas, or any Saint day, read common prayer, make mince pies, dance, play cards, or play on any instrument of music, except the drum, trumpet, or Jews'-harp! And they encouraged prize-shooting for game on that day, which continues now in some places.

B. A singular law certainly. But why, pray tell me, were mince pies outlawed?

A. Because they were associated so intimately with Christmas, being once made in a long shape to represent a manger, and were the Christmas pies. The Puritans were fearful that with the taste of the pie the old associations would return, and revive a new love for the merry rites of England's Christmas festival.

B. That well accorded with their stern character; but were those rites peculiar?

A. They were somewhat, as Irving has described them in the 2d volume of the 'Sketch Book.'

B. Can't you describe them to me?

A. You had better read them at your leisure, as the customs were many and singular, and his descriptions are rich. Christmas Eve, called the Vigil or watch, was celebrated by rolling on to the hearth the 'yule clog,' which was the name for an enormous great log, which was lighted by a brand saved from the last Christmas log, and merry songs and tales were sung and told while it continued to burn. Huge Christmas candles were also lighted; the chandlers made presents of 'Christmas candles' to children; and the houses seemed to be on fire, so full of light were they.

B. A merry time certainly they must have had, for plenty of eating and drinking always accompanies such times.

A. Certainly. The religious rites commenced about midnight, when it was once a custom to have an exhibition in the churches of a manger, a wax babe and other members of the holy family, and songs were sung and prayers made. At this time it was believed that all the cattle knelt in their stalls in homage to the child Jesus; and all the bees hummed a song. The houses and churches were dressed with evergreens, and great festivities took place, lasting during twelve days sometimes. The houses were open to all—the nobles and the commoners met as equals, and the poor were bountifully provided for.

B. So says the old description of Christmas:

'Then opened wide the baron's hall,
To vassal, tenant, serf, and all;
Power laid his rod of rule aside,
And ceremony doffed his pride;
The heir, with roses in his shoes,
That night might village partner choose.

All hailed with uncontroled delight,
And general voice, the happy night,
That to the cottage as the crown,
Brought tidings of salvation down.'

And we learn also that they had merry dances of maskers as the description ends with allusion to them:

'Then came the merry maskers in,
And carols roared with blithesome din;
If unmelodious was the song,
It was a hearty note and strong.
Who lists, may in their mumming see
Traces of ancient mystery.

England was merry England, when Old Christmas bro't his sports again.
A Christmas gambol oft could cheer
The poor man's heart thro' half the year.'

A. England's poor now need such festivals to open the hearts of the rich and those in power, for many thousands of her laboring children now groan for want of the Christmas generosity of olden time.

B. Such festivals surely do much good, and the associations of Christmas should always keep mirth under healthy restraint, lest it end in heaviness.

A. Such is the merry Christmas I wished you.

B. And such I wish you and all who are dear to us.

A. I join in your good wishes, and am glad that our Sabbath School is to celebrate Christmas.

B. It should, for how frequently are the birth days of illustrious personages celebrated, whose lives were of small importance compared with the life of Jesus!

A. We certainly celebrate the bestowment of our heavenly Father's greatest gift, worthy to fill the world with joy.

B. Yes, you remember that the angels so described it: 'Behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be unto all people.'

A. That could not have been said, if the Calvinistic doctrine of election of but a part to be saved, were true.

B. Neither could it have been said if any form of partialism be true, as the gospel cannot be great joy till it is believed, and yet it is said to be designed as such for all people.

A. Yes, and a late controversialist has said that he believes all infants will be saved and all the heathen, as they never heard of Jesus. If then he had not been revealed to any part of the world, all would have been saved; and would not that be greater joy than many have now in prospect?

B. Certainly; and thus the birth of Jesus is more to be lamented, than rejoiced in; for it was an awful calamity if it is to result in more misery than bliss.

A. It may be that is the reason so many do not celebrate the event.

B. Well, be it so, or not, it becomes Universalists to honor the season, as they have the most glorious view of the Savior's character and mission, regarding him as the perfect image of the Father's love and 'the Savior of the world.'

A. Yes, and to us there is a blessed reality and certainty about the final results of his mediatorial reign, that causes us to rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory; for all the promises are yea, and amen, sure and certain in Christ Jesus.

B. And, therefore, he claims our gratitude, and by that noble feeling he would awaken the most generous affections of our being, and attach us to his service as willing and glad subjects.

A. How few understand this. How many think, or try to think, that we have nothing to incline us to love Jesus, and practice his religion. I think we have more than any other christians.

B. I'm sure we have. We have better views of the purposes of God, of the unchangeability of his love, of the good of being controlled always by a religious, a christian spirit, and are made to perceive the present evils of sin. And more than all this, we have better views of heaven, and are permitted to look forward to purity and joy universal, when

'God's own soft hand shall wipe the tears
From every weeping eye,
And pains and groans, and griefs and fears,
And death itself shall die.'

A. Yes, and the glad spirit of our faith bids us exclaim as the poet closed his hymn:

'How long, dear Savior, O how long,
Shall this blest hour delay!
Fly swifter round, ye wheels of time,
And bring the welcome day.'

B. But if we had faith in the limited view of salvation, and imagined that the end would result in the utter ruin and eternal misery of a great portion of the human family, we should have to alter the words and cry—

'Delay, dear Savior, O delay,
The awful time forever!
Roll slowly round, ye wheels of time,
And bring the era—never.'

A. O how sad that sounds! It makes me shudder to hear it, as I fancy terrible things, and see misery and wretchedness that must never be lessened, and God unpitying and Jesus stern! O I surely am not half grateful enough for the belief I have in the universality of the redemption.

B. None can be grateful enough. I have often thought that our faith is beyond expression dear, when I have seen the hopeless mourner at the grave of the loved.

A. God pity such, and give them to believe that not in vain was Jesus born, and not in vain did he die. He shall see of his labors and be satisfied.

B. That is the declaration of scripture, and surely nothing less than the salvation of the world can satisfy such a love as Jesus has—a love that made him pray even for his murderers.

A. So let us ever believe, that we may rejoice, and find Christ precious unto us.

B. Then the gospel will be the best 'Christmas Box' ever given, and full of jewels.

A. It will indeed. But pray tell me, why are presents given at this season called 'Christmas Boxes,' and so advertised for sale?

B. Because among Catholics in olden time, sailors used to have a box for the priests on board ship, in which they put contributions, and when they arrived home, the whole was given for the priests to say Mass for them on that day as a prosperous and sacred one, that all their sins might be forgiven.

A. If so, I'll never call a present by that name, for money cannot pay for the forgiveness of sin.

B. True; God will hear the penitent though poor as mortal ever was; but to those who were like him of old, his word says, 'Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought that the gift of God can be purchased with money. Thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter; for thy heart is not right in the sight of God.'

Elegiac Stanzas.

To the memory of ANN JANETTE S. DAGGETT, who died August 20, 1838; and of CORRISSANDE L. DAGGETT, who died, January 16, 1837.

'O WHERE are they?' This question comes from all I hear and see;

O where are they, the beautiful, twin stars of memory?
'Gone—' is the sad response I meet, from each familiar thing,
Departed in their brightest hopes—their freshest blossoming.

I miss them at the silent board and in the meadows fair;
I miss them on the pleasant hills—I miss them every where!
Long years have gone since last I stood within this ancient hall;—

No outward change has come; and, yet, a dark, funereal pall

Seems settling heavily upon each dear, familiar spot, Shading the haunts of those fair girls, who were—but who are not.

Quick memories as now I write, come rushing o'er my brain;
And back the curtain of the past in darkness—furls again,
Revealing scenes of love and hope, too hallowed, and too dear
For the rough breath of earth-born winds. They grew—and perished here—

They perished—but their memory is the fairest, brightest gem,
Which fond affection places in her earthly diadem!

Dear Corissande! I see her now—mild spirit-like, and fair;
No tear bedims her soft blue eye, or wets her flaxen hair.
Her tender voice, her ringing laugh, are audible to me
As when they woke sweet echoes here with their rich melody.

She blended woman's dignity with the sweetness of a child—
High aspiration, noble thought, with manners soft and mild;
But, as the fairest flower is sought by the first-coming frost,
So soon our gifted ones decay—our beautiful are lost.

She passed away—and left a shade to darken o'er the brow
Of all who knew and loved her here. That shadow linger-eth now.

But her beloved sister mourned too deeply—and too well,
And, like a stricken bird, full soon that weeping sister fell—
She fell in all her beauty—in the fullness of her pride—
With mind, and heart, and character developed, and allied
To all that's noble—all that's true,—and left in bitter grief, Fond loving hearts, to whom bright hope alone can bring relief.

She heard her angel sister's voice—'twas calling her away—
And on this cold and dreary earth she could no longer stay;
For visions of the spirit-land broke on her raptured eye;
And her young hopes that perished here, were blossoming on high.

Yes, she too has gone. A double blow has pierced each bleeding heart;
And from each deep and cureless wound fresh drops of anguish start.

O sad and desolate to me each haunted spot appears!
The ghost of buried happiness sits here all bathed in tears;
And with her pale, cold finger, still, she points to the departed,
Mocking with bitter fallacy, the lone and broken-hearted.

But on this sad returning day, our thoughts should rise above;
For, O, we know our Father but chasteneth in love;
We know there is benevolence, though we perceive it not;
We know that kindness makes the law of every human lot.
Believing this, a healing balm shall reach the wounded part;
And peace shall fold her wings again within the troubled heart;

Our praises, then—our gratitude—shall to that God be given,
Who, when he takes our flowers from earth, transplanteth them in heaven!—

Forever—ever—in my heart your images I'll set!—
Farewell, farewell; dear Corissande! beloved Ann Janette!

Human Pride.

POPE calls pride, 'the never-failing vice of fools.'
It is very certain that, in our daily walks, we meet with many who are remarkable for their stubborn pride; for pride of opinion, and high self-estimation; who possess very little knowledge, very little talent, and very little of anything which is calculated to render them objects of love or admiration to their fellows. Nay, I believe that where merit is wanting, we shall generally find that pride supplies its place.

'For as in bodies, thus in souls we find
What wants in blood and spirits filled with wind.'

But we shall find that, independent of this fact, pride is the enemy of intellect. It is the enemy especially of true knowledge. Even if the scriptures did not inform us that 'God resisteth the proud and giveth grace to the humble,' and that it is 'the meek whom he will teach of his ways,' yet in the exercise of our observing faculties, we should have become acquainted with the fact that pride is a great bar to the acquisition of true knowledge.

Pride has often rejected the gospel, and in so doing has proved a sore enemy to the happiness of him who entertained it as a guest. When we look directly at pride, and strip it of the ornaments with which the worldly have bedecked it, we shall perceive that there is nothing noble about it. Pride puffs up man not on account of the good that he has done, or the great qualities which he possesses. For, he who hath pride is, in a good degree, rendered incapable of performing noble actions. The noblest actions are those which prove our disinterestedness and our regard for the happiness of our fellows, who are children of the same heavenly Father with ourselves. Yet pride builds a partition wall between us and other men. It induces us to suppose that we are so much better than others that we are under no natural obligation to treat them as brethren and sisters. Here it interferes with our duties as christians, yet how common is it for high professors to indulge in pride—the most selfish and consequently the most base of all the vices.
Particularly does the Savior deprecate pride; and both by precept and example does he teach humility, real, genuine, heart-felt humility. It is the ornament of the christian character, and without it, there can be no religion. So sensible have hypocrites been of this fact, that they have universally assumed this virtue when they did not possess it.
Even the monks, friars, and other ecclesiastics who lived in an age nearer that of the Savior's advent, felt the great necessity of assuming the appearance of this virtue. Hence they went about, dressed in coarse cloth and barefooted, lived on alms, and often assumed humiliating attitudes. No doubt, that many of them were sincere, and supposed that by these outward manifestations they would work out humility of soul. But not so. Those things were but a repetition of the sour countenance and long prayers of the Pharisee, amounting to nothing which could regenerate the heart. When Jesus washed his disciples' feet, he did not perform a ceremony which had been handed down by tradition, but acted from the spontaneous suggestions of his own heart. This is true humility, to regard all men—however low their condition, and however obscure their origin—as our brethren; and therefore of as much consequence in the sight of heaven as ourselves. I do not mean to say that it is sufficient to confess and to teach that all men will be saved; for if Jesus came here for anything, he came to cultivate the spirit of universal brotherhood on earth; and such is the natural effect of the doctrine which we believe. Unless it makes us feel that all men are our brethren, and inspires us with good will to men, irrespective of name, sect, or nation, it answers not the end for which it was designed. Christian love admits not of exclusiveness or sectarianism.

But perhaps that some one of my readers may be ready to ask, 'Am I obliged to smile upon men who possess coarse and vulgar tastes? Am I obliged to fellowship with crime, error, and disgusting vulgarity?' I would reply, As soon as your tastes, sentiments, and feelings become more lofty, more sublime, and more pure and noble than were those of Jesus of Nazareth, you may spurn from you the humble and unfortunate sons of earth. Then you may look askance upon the ignorant and the vulgar, and may determine that it becomes you not to hold converse with those who are unlettered, uncouth, and vicious; but until then, you are no christian, unless you treat all men with fraternal tenderness and regard. Shall it be answered, 'But I like higher and more intellectual pursuits than they. My mind has more chaste and refined views and feelings.' Then I reply that all the worldly wisdom and refinement of scholars, poets, and philosophers, is as dross when compared with christian love. There is no true intellectual greatness, no true refinement, and no true wisdom, that has not for its foundation the simple truths of the gospel—the impartial love of our brethren, even as it dwelt in Jesus, and as it dwells in the bosom of the Father.

This is true humility—to treat all men as brethren. This is the humility of the heart; and for want of this the Pharisees found a substitute in disfiguring their faces, and appearing unto men to fast. For want of this, the poor misguided monks and friars lashed themselves with whips, performed penance, walked barefooted, and lived upon charity.

But this true humility can never exist where men believe that the wicked are under sentence of everlasting perdition. No man can love his neighbor as himself, while he believes that his God does not love that neighbor; and it would seem unreasonable that the servant should love his Master's enemies, and those whom his Master intends to banish from his face and his favor forever. Hence the sectarian pride, the bitter bigotry, the persecuting spirit manifested by many professors of religion. I will risk the assertion that partialism has engendered and kept alive more cold and heartless malignity in the human breast, than any other cause.

The simple fact that Jesus commands his disciples to love their enemies, overthrows the whole scheme of partial salvation, since why should the Creator require that of the creature which he cannot do himself?

I believe that Universalism has done much to destroy this sectarian wall of division which has opposed itself so long to the harmony and peace of mankind. Let the trumpet sound its notes far and wide; let the doctrine of a world's salvation be preached until mankind shall more plainly perceive that they are brethren, and then true humility will take the place of exclusiveness and bigotry. Then we shall learn to feel another's woe; and not first ask whether they are worthy of our sympathy. Oh! monstrous thought! that any one of God's dear children should not be worthy of the sympathy of his brother; or that we should coldly pass by the unfortunate because vice, the worst misfortune, is one of their woes!

HAPPINESS. Some men ascribe all their unhappiness to the narrowness of their means; but place them in the immediate enjoyment of all that enters within the circle of their present hopes and desires, and they will no sooner have entered upon the enrapturing possession, than new hopes and desires will begin to manifest themselves. You cannot place a man in such a situation that he will not look above it and beyond it; give him the whole of this world, and like the hero of Macedon, he will inquire for another.

SOCIAL intercourse, or neighbor visiting neighbor, is a strong link in the chain of friendship.

The Minister's Daughter.

A good old man was my uncle Jeremy; his kindness of heart and cheerful loquacity always insured him a welcome from us little folks, and his chidings, even, were so mild that they never gave offence, while they called us from many devious wanderings. How he used to pause in the middle of his talk, fix his dim, grey eyes on me, when I was a wild, romping girl, and say,—‘Ah! niece, it will not always be so,—there are, in reserve for you, days of darkness, which will eclipse this joy, and sadness that will make the remembrance of this excessive gaiety bitter to you! Moderate your mirth, and sober your heart, child; for heavy affliction awaits you.’ It was wrong, perhaps, to laugh at the old man’s fears; but I did so, for I thought, in childish ignorance, that I would always hold happiness near to my heart, which I thought sufficiently well fortified to resist successfully any external enemy, and strong enough to bear, unmoved, the heaviest affliction. How ignorant we are of our weakness, till our strength is tested! How little we think of the pride that dwells in our hearts and is fostered there, till it is humbled! Singularly, indeed, were the old man’s words verified! Though I treated them lightly, yet they always seemed ominous, and threw a transitory gloom over my spirits. But they were kindly meant, and his fatherly counsels have, since, been more soberly regarded. Especially did he enjoin the duty of guarding well the lips, lest they should be defiled by evil-speaking. ‘Let not the breath of slander pass over them, he said, ‘for it will return to you with a deeper pollution, and poison the springs that now supply the fountain of truth in your heart.’ He gave me many chapters from his own experience to impress more strongly on my mind the odiousness of every species of slander. One of these, I have thought to give the reader.

On returning from a visit to a young associate, I announced to my aunt the resolution I had formed of never again visiting Harriet. The good lady lifted her spectacles, and asked what had happened? Uncle Jeremy smoothed down his grey hairs, drew a chair close to his side and said,—‘Sit down here, niece.’ I did so.

‘Now tell me.’

‘I met Caroline Benson, and she said that Harriet was mean, and had talked badly about me, uncle.’

My aunt smiled at my indignation, but rebuke was in uncle Jeremy’s eye; I felt the glow of shame overspread my face, and concealed it on his shoulder.

‘Dear uncle’—

‘Nay, none of this, child! but I fear you will never learn how to treat these idle tales;—I have a story for you.’

‘Thank you, dear uncle.’

‘When I was a child like you, my father often took me with him to hear his favorite minister preach, and I became so attached to him as to imagine him superior to every thing else human. Dr. Weymouth was a benevolent man. His countenance wore a Puritanic gravity, that would have been repulsive had not his heart been all kindness and his words all love. Whenever he spoke to me, he seemed to draw me into his heart, and I revered him as a pattern of human excellence and loved him as a parent. When a stripling youth, proud of expanding powers and growing attractions, I thought that to have access to the Doctor’s library and to be received by his family as a particular and a privileged friend, would be the acme of bliss. I knew no higher ambition, had no dearer wish. This wish was gratified; I became completely domesticated in his family, with all the privileges I had desired. Without an effort to effect it, I gained the confidence of the different members of the Doctor’s family, and became the common repository of each one’s plans and vexations. After a little time I discovered, much to my surprise and grief, that the nicest harmony did not pervade the Doctor’s house; but I carefully concealed the little defects that I saw, and tried to persuade myself that I was too sensitive to these domestic discords. I have wondered, since, that I could be so blinded; but it was a boy’s trustfulness. I do remember that I was very uneasy and my cheek became uncomfortably hot, as the captious wife, in her injudicious communicativeness, detailed to me her conjugal annoyances, and petty jealousies, exaggerated and colored as they were by a vain heart and a restless imagination. But, as the Doctor bore all this meekly, and never complained, I concluded that his wife spoke so only in moments of excitement, from the impulse of passion that soon subsided, and left her a kind and faithful wife. However this might be, I knew that both duty and honor required me to be silent respecting their domestic troubles. The pleasure of communion with the Doctor’s family had been only in anticipation. When my heart expanded to realize it, adverse qualities compelled it to retire to its own solitary enjoyment; yet the strength of my attachment abated not, and while I pitied, I loved.

The Doctor's oldest daughter was a good hearted girl, and, at first, I loved her much. As she grew in stature and in years, her mother's example and the feelings awakened by her, rendered her child less amiable, and I sometimes thought decidedly disagreeable. Myra must have suspected this; for her manner towards me changed, and she often treated me with haughtiness and even contempt. Finding so little happiness here, I sought new associates, and became acquainted with a girl whose quiet demeanor and delicate feelings I fully appreciated. You may suppose, niece, that a young fellow, such as I then was, would possess many foibles and some unpleasant habits; these Louisa soon perceived, and with the kindness and faithfulness of true friendship, she called my attention to them, and tried by all the arts of persuasion to correct them. At first, I misinterpreted her efforts, and thought her influenced by motives which never moved her; but when I asked her reasons for wishing me reformed, and demanded what good it would do her for me to be divested of these imperfections, I knew by the steadiness and deep meaning of her look that she read my selfish suspicion.

'What is the object of friendship?' asked she. Will you tell me its duties? Why are friends given us?—to be encouraged in habits that make them disagreeable, and may render them odious?—that they may have those feelings strengthened which will bring disappointment and misery on themselves?'

'The mild rebuke contained in these questions so sweetly and sadly uttered, silenced my cavils; yet, I could not understand why she should take so great an interest in me as to trouble herself about my faults, and all this with such perfect uprightness of intention. I could not defend my errors, and when I laughed at her she only repeated the reproof more kindly and firmly; but when I saw that my increased and unmeaning levity made her countenance sad and her accents of entreaty mournful and tremulous, I was subdued,—the suppressed tears were fast gathering in her eyes, and for me,—I yielded my foibles, for I would not forfeit her esteem; and I could not lose her society. Oh, how I valued her smile of encouragement, as I tried, every day, to lessen the power of my enslaving habits, and to make myself as upright and as excellent as she told me I could be. And how careful I was lest in my intercourse with society I should betray the lingerings of what she had censured, or acquire any thing that she would not approve. I owe much of my high reputation to the influence of her sympathy and sweet counsels.'

'But, uncle, this Louisa was not the minister's daughter!'

'Well, niece, Myra saw that I looked for happiness no more in the family of her father, she knew I had the confidence of her friend;—Louisa was a favorite of the family, and stood high in their esteem,—and that her society made me better. This roused in her breast improper feelings. She saw him whom in her dignity she had scorned, treated by Louisa as a particular friend, and,—think me not vain, niece,—she saw that the eyes of all her female friends looked favorably on him. Her tall, queenly figure now oftener bent in courtesy to uncle Jeremy; but he saw not its attractions. His eyes looked through this dazzling veil, and saw concealed by its beauty dishonorable designs of regaining by flattering attentions what might have been secured by the natural action of kind feelings. Still, she had more power over me than I admitted, or, indeed, was aware of, and her mother warmly seconded her efforts. Mrs. Weymouth had uniformly treated me with the kindness of a mother, except in the impetuosity of quick resentment, which I always forgave, and easily forgot. Now, she took an increased interest in my affairs, and appeared unusually devoted to Myra. She seemed to think her daughter a pattern of filial duty, though I had previously thought that all the comfort she afforded her mother was what administered to maternal pride. I will not tell you, niece, by what subtleties of detraction they turned my heart against Louisa; but they did it so effectually that I delighted to practise what I knew she would condemn. When in her presence, I found it impossible to credit their artful insinuations; but, day after day, the same tales were rung in my ears, and their influence over me was complete. Often, at her look of earnest inquiry, did my cheek glow with emotions which I could not conceal, and I felt abased and wretched.'

'Did Louisa know why you slighted her friendship, uncle?'

'She did not, for on meeting her by accident, and turning to avoid a conversation with her, she spoke of it with her usual frankness, and asked the cause. I replied carelessly; but she requested a candid answer. I said it was not proper there. 'Will you walk home with me then?' she asked. I had previously been as a brother to her, so the request was such as a sister might make; but I complied with evident reluctance. Myra was near, a critic on our words; but Louisa heeded her not, though she well knew that her conduct would be made a subject of derision. Louisa understood Myra's character, and was certain of not receiving any justice in her misrepresentations.'

'In your walk did you explain to Louisa your strange conduct?'

'I evaded her inquiries, assuring her that she had neither offended me nor wounded my feelings; I was ashamed to let her know that they could be governed, and my conduct directed by Myra's ridicule and Mrs. Weymouth's artifice. Wounded friendship found no relief, and Louisa's womanly dignity forbade her speaking of it afterwards. She told me she knew I accompanied her unwillingly, that her only object in asking the favor, was to get an explanation of my uncommon formality, and that she would not oblige me to go farther in opposition to my wishes.'

'Did you leave her in the street, uncle Jeremy?'—the old gentleman did not hear the question; he had turned his face away, for strong feeling was at work in his heart. I repeated it.

'Could uncle Jeremy be so clownish? do you think, niece. During the remainder of the walk, Louisa talked cheerfully on general subjects; but, with true feminine feeling, she ever treated me, afterwards, as a casual acquaintance, kindly, but with reserve.'

'But, the minister's daughter, uncle.'

'Myra gained her purpose here.'

'And you no longer disliked her, uncle?'

'I disliked her, but I disliked her merciless ridicule and sly hints still more. I saw not all the snares spread for me, in which, even then I was entangled.'

'How did you discover their mischievous schemes, uncle?'

'Myra invited to the Doctor's house the amiable and beautiful daughters of Mr. Rodgers; these young ladies I found, on acquaintance, to possess excellent dispositions and sensible minds. I told Mrs. Weymouth how highly I valued their characters, and that I thought them attractive and agreeable. Myra was present and replied, 'You are not so well acquainted with their characters as I am, and know nothing of their domestic bickerings.' Mrs. Weymouth rejoined: 'They are pretty girls; but we should not suffer ourselves to be misled by appearances.' As you perceive, they accused the girls of nothing, they did not even pronounce them unamiable; they well knew that these artful and cruel intimations, obliquely thrown out, would serve them better. To me, it seemed strange that they should speak disrespectfully of every girl I thought deserving, and I recollected that the traduced ones had been welcomed to the Doctor's house by his wife and daughter, with the greatest apparent delight, and treated by them with distinguishing cordiality. Here was an inconsistency that I failed to reconcile. For once, I resolved to investigate it and find where truth rested. I did so; Myra's hand and smile were ever ready for the Misses Rodgers, when she met them, and her satirical jests and refined slanders followed them as constantly. My perception was rectified, the illusions that so long had cheated me, vanished; I saw how completely I had been duped, and at what fearful cost to me. Myra was vain, she loved to be noticed and praised, and imagined all the esteem and admiration given to others, something of which she had been defrauded. This was the defect in her moral character, she was disquieted by others' virtues.'

'Why did not the Doctor correct this fault, uncle?'

'Doctor Weymouth was a devoted parent; but his authority was set at naught, and his efforts thwarted by his wilful and weak-minded wife, who in her foolish conceitedness turned Myra's heart against her father, so that she regarded him only as the minister of her wants. Myra was not wanting in outward respect for him, for she feared the steady look of his searching eye; but, that feeling of veneration which clings to a parent and feeds in delight on his wisdom and experience, and, with filial watchfulness, exerts itself to make smooth the path of a parent's anxious life, was a stranger to her heart. His councils, the fruit of deep thought and an extended knowledge of the world, were disregarded, and to her mother she ridiculed his advice as recklessly as she did the sentiments of her female friends.'

'Did Mrs. Weymouth permit it, uncle?'

'Her own example served to strengthen the propensity and encourage such undutiful conduct.'

'Was Myra really beautiful, uncle Jeremy?'

'She thought herself so; her beauty pleased only the eye, it was not such as delights the heart.'

'How did you revenge yourself for the deceit they practised upon you?'

'I left the city, dear as it was to me, for I could not meet unmoved, the warm, generous hearts that I had treated so coldly and ungentlemanly. I could not meet the calm, dignified Louisa and look on her celestial countenance, think of the benefits she had conferred on me and the return I made, without emotions that I wished to smother. Besides, the perfidy of my deceitful friends haunted me like a demon of darkness from which my soul turned with loathing and silent indignation.'

'What became of Myra?'

'Some years after I left the place, a friend wrote that, after coquetting as long as she retained any power, she married in despair.'

'But, uncle, Louisa and you were, surely, friends again.'

'I have not seen her since I came here; I thought she must despise my ungrateful conduct, and pride sealed uncle Jeremy's lips till they were opened for your instruction and warning. Remember, niece, that a person's feelings and conduct may be influenced by circumstances and motives which we cannot see; therefore we ought not to judge hastily or unkindly. Distrust scandal; never confide in one who traduces her neighbors or friends, for if she searched her own heart carefully, she would find so many imperfections that she would not desire to invade the precincts of others. Remember, niece, this severe lesson from your uncle's bitter experience, and listen to no slanderous reports.'

'I thank you, dear uncle; but—why did you not marry?—from what you said, I suppose you were quite a favorite with the ladies.'

'I could not feel their selfish attachment, and was unmoved by it. Early communion with Louisa had led me to associate with female society, advantages of improvement and high intellectual and spiritual enjoyment which I never found in the society of another. And now, Amy, keep this lesson to yourself, and profit by it.' As he concluded, his sister, my aunt Amy, came in and said, tea was ready. I thought uncle Jeremy was glad my attention was diverted from him. I never after spoke to him of the story, but I thought he knew it was remembered.

The Boy at the Convention.

MOTHER, I cannot worship here,
My spirit droops its wing;
The vanities of earth, so near,
Their shadows o'er me fling.

'Tis said the preacher's talents rare
In matchless splendor shine;
And that his gifts of language are Transcendent and divine.

I know he stands before us all
So nice, and richly dressed,
And lifts his hand and lets it fall
In tremor to his breast.

But all his words are learned and long,
For wise, big heads designed;
His labored preaching is too strong
To feed my little mind.

The lofty brilliant things he says
Send all my thoughts abroad,
I think of him whene'er he prays,
I cannot think of God.

A beamy cloud before my eyes,
Its mists obstruct my sight;
My dazzled vision cannot rise
Beyond its borrowed light.

I wish that, in our chapel small
With meek ones I could bow,
And tell in simple language, all
The feelings I have now.

There no magnificence would weigh
My spirit to the dust;
But my full heart would love and pray
With quiet, steady trust.

Oh! mother, take me hence, for o'er
My heart a sickness steals,
My senses can endure no more
The organ's swelling peals.

My simple spirit is oppressed
By all this bright display;
Amidst this grandeur is no rest,—
Come! let us go away.

And take me to your bosom, dear,
Sweet mother! you can hush
These vagrant feelings, that when here
Thro' all my pulses rush.

A MORAL. Preachers of the Gospel should at all times, when called upon, be ready to furnish a Moral, that will be useful in filling up a niche in a waste place. So should they employ the leisure moments of their vocation, that the very sight of them will act as a Moral to the world, causing the passers by to receive them as living guides.

Lowell Offering.

WE have just received the ninth number of this excellent publication. Its literary and moral character continues to be well sustained. We have looked through, as carefully as leisure would permit, those numbers of the volume which have been published, and have found in them all much to approve and admire. Do all our readers know that this work is made up exclusively of the productions of the factory girls? If not, it is time that every heart should thrill with pride and with gratitude at the knowledge of what woman, and LABORING WOMAN, can accomplish?

We question whether any magazine in our country can show upon its pages articles of a superior tone to some which have appeared in the 'Offering.' Has any writer in the 'Ladies' Book,' or the 'Ladies' Companion,' or even in the 'Ladies' Repository,' advanced more rational or philosophical views of woman's sphere, and woman's rights than has 'Ella' in No. 5 of the Factory Girl's 'Offering?' Found ever Salvaretta a more eloquent eulogist than the gentle yet martial-spirited 'Adelaide?' Among the hundreds who have declaimed and written and sung of the magic heroism of Joan of Arc, who has offered a nobler tribute to her memory than the writer in a recent number of the 'Offering?' But time and space would fail us to mention half the fine things that appear monthly in this unpretending publication. We would, however, ere closing this notice, call the reader's attention to the following extracts from an article in the last number, entitled, 'Aristocracy of Employment.' It is written in a strain of noble eloquence that would do credit to the best orator in our land; and the heart that does not thrill at its touch, can have little of dignity or humanity left. Read, and think.

'The laborer—and who is he? A man, made a little lower than the angels, and stamped with the impress of his heavenly Father; a man, and brother to him who will not soil, with slightest manual employment, his snowy hand, or costly vestment; a man, and though too often degraded to a station but little above the brute, yet may be, in some future time, the companion of angels.'

'The laborer—and where is he? Wherever the beauteous mansion of the rich man greets the admiring gaze of passing travelers; wherever the splendid temple's lofty dome is reared, and its tapering spire springs upward to the sky; wherever the giant mill-wheel groans on its axle, and myriads of wheels, and springs, and bands revolve in their lesser circles, there has the laborer been. Wherever the amateur displays his costly collection of beauties, or the virtuoso the curious productions of gifted ones in other lands; wherever the artist displays the inspired creations of the pencil or the chisel; or the poet's strains subdue by pathos or excite to rapturous enthusiasm,—there again, yes, even there, amidst that thrilling beauty, has the laborer been. Wherever some lovely paradise, some modern garden of Eden, with its labyrinthine walks, its jutting fountains, its rare exotics, its sweet perfumes, and costly flowers are to be seen, there also, amidst that choicest haunt of the lover of refined amusements, has the dirt-soiled laborer been. Wherever the organ's 'loud-resounding notes' swell upward from the worshiping choir, or the flute's soft tones steal gently on the evening breeze, or the piano's keys vibrate beneath the touch of the favored child of fortune, there also is the handiwork of the laborer. Not more surely is his presence indicated by the humble cot which shelters his head from the cold and the storm, or the rude couch on which he rests his weary limbs, than by the fretted dome of the vast cathedral, or the gorgeous splendor of the palace.'

Again, she says: 'Employment is the lot awaiting us all, as we come forth into this busy world. The earth is to be tilled; cities, towns and villages to be built; strong ships are to be made, and guided across the deep sea; there must be a ceaseless preparation of food and clothing for the unceasing demand for them; there is ever a new generation springing up to be nurtured, and taught, and watched, and an old one to be nursed, and sheltered, and cared for, till they are laid in the house appointed for all—and the living must make that last tenement; all this is to be done, and to be always doing, and man must be the laborer.'

'And he who resists this law, who would make of himself and his, exceptions to this rule, he who would go through this world without conferring one benefit upon those who have ministered to his wants, and supplied his necessities, those who have cherished his infancy, and preserved his maturer life—he who would lay down a useless existence in an unhonored grave—he who would do this, would fain believe himself a being to whom the faithful observers of Heaven's mandate should bow, and cringe, and fawn, and kneel, and thank for the listless smile, and pray for the privilege to watch and wait around him!

We are sorry—but one other extract is all for which we have room. In this she speaks more particularly of the aristocracy of labor. It is lamentable, and yet it is too true, that 'he who wields the cloth yard measure, deems himself far more worthy of respect than he who tills the ground; he who girds himself for war, and makes it the occupation of his life to slay his brethren, thinks himself an object of far greater value than he whose days are spent in the manufacture of the necessities or conveniences of life. She who sits at ease in her parlor, would fain think herself a better and nobler being than she whose every thought, and act, and moment, is devoted to her family; she who sits and fashions nice attire, believes herself of greater consequence than the individual who manufactured the article of which those garments are made; and thus, through all the gradations of employment, is this aristocracy.'

'Is it not foolish, nay, worse than foolish, to trample upon, and jeer, and scorn those who are bound by necessity's stern laws to some harder service, some less profitable toil than ourselves? Why should it be that those who do most, are so often thought to be deserving of the least? The hardest working man is really the poorest man. He who builds a palace must himself be content with a cottage.'

Do not these extracts substantiate all we have said? If not, take the work itself, and learn that this is not all, nor half that is noble, and excellent, and true. God bless the guardians and the writers of the 'Lowell Offering,' and make it an instrument of incalculable good.

Our Book and Memoranda Table.

CHRISTMAS AND NEW YEAR. This is the season for kind regards and good wishes, and we must present ours to the readers of the 'Repository,' with feelings of sincerity and earnestness. It is well for us all to consult the unalterable past, and learn wise lessons therefrom, that we may the better improve and enjoy the present, and prepare for the future. May the close of the year be to our patrons like the clear autumn sunset, and the opening of the new be as the glorious dawning of a bright day.

THE GIFT SEASON. Books have ever held a prominent place among suitable gifts for this season of affectionate tokens of friendship, and they should ever be thus regarded. A good book has intrinsic value—is of permanent worth; and a person can manifest a good taste in the selection of a book as in any thing else. The offering of a book is a better tribute to the mental and moral worth, than a mere personal ornament, even as it is better to enrich the mind than to ornament the person. The variety of suitable gift books is great, and therefore the selection is most difficult. A choice variety can be found at A. Tompkins, 38 Cornhill, where we invite our friends to call early. There they will find the 'ROSE OF SHARON,' one of the most intrinsically valuable of all the annuals issued from the American or English press this season. The publisher has some in extra binding, which are very beautiful indeed, and form an elegant and appropriate present for Christmas especially, and for New Year gifts. He has also that popular volume by Mrs. C. M. Sawyer, 'The Merchant's Widow, and other Tales.' This is a very interesting, and no less useful, work, and is issued in a neat and pretty style. He has also 'The Poetry of Woman,' by Miss Edgarton, containing exquisite sketches of scenes and characters. He has also 'The Christian Graces,' which has received so liberal a share of commendation. He has just issued a highly interesting work entitled the 'Poetry of the Seasons,' by Julia, favorably known to our readers. It will be found, we are assured, a very pleasant book, and will gratify its purchasers. He has also just published a neat little volume of 'Stories from the German,' by Mrs. C. M. Sawyer, which will, we have no doubt, be received with great favor.

But we cannot enumerate a tithe of the beautiful volumes he has in his store suitable for the gift season. Call and see, and will certainly be as well pleased as at any other establishment.

SETTLING ACCOUNTS. It is a good rule to settle all demands, as far as we can stretch our ability, at the opening of a New Year. This will enable a man to start anew with confidence in his own integrity, with a consciousness of how much he really possesses, and with a good conscience. It is our earnest wish that our delinquent subscribers would take this matter into serious consideration, for there is a great need of it. Why should the publisher be obliged to borrow, instead of receiving honest dues which would furnish ample means to prevent any increase of liabilities? Think of these things, ye who are intended by this call!

BOOK ACCOUNTS. The publisher called upon those who were indebted to him on book account in our last No., but to little avail. He has written letters to individuals concerned, and has received no answers from most of them. This is not just, nor even courteous, and we hope it will not long continue so. Give heed, feeling heed to this matter, ye who are inattentive to the requirement—'Deal justly.'

EVANGELICAL MAGAZINE AND GOSPEL ADVOCATE, edited by A. B. Grosh and G. W. Montgomery. We have received the prospectus of the new volume, commencing January 1, 1842. This is one of the most excellent and useful of our periodicals, and we wish it, as we ever have wished it, abundant success. The project for the establishment of a new paper in that section, it is to be earnestly hoped will be abandoned.

'CHRISTIAN COMFORTER.' A gift for the Afflicted and Bereaved. We are gratified in being able to say that the first edition of this work, consisting of a thousand copies, has been sold, and a new edition is out of press. This will be some evidence of the adaptedness of the work to the ends designed, to impart comfort and hope to the sorrowing and afflicted, and give a right direction to the depressed or desponding mind. It is a work that will be thought of most particularly when the spirit is wounded and the heart is bleeding, and thus has it been called for and circulated. Yet it would be well to possess the work in health and strength, that in calmness and the full possession of the reflective powers, its contents may be communed with, that its consolations may rise spontaneous in the soul in the hour of need. It is not deemed modest to praise one's own work, and we would not wish, at any rate, to lose our claim to diffidence; but the numerous testimonials we have received ed, unasked, impel us, for the publisher's sake and that the book may do more good, thus to speak of it. It has borne needed comfort to many, and the consciousness of that is sufficient reward—it is better than praise.

'The Christian Comforter,' will be a very appropriate Christmas and New Year's gift in many cases where the memories of the past year are sad and grievous. Let it be examined.

We may be pardoned in alluding here to a fact—that a large number of respected Unitarian friends, having been highly pleased with the 'Comforter,' have recommended it to others.

'SOME ONE OF OUR EDITORS,' says thus and so, is the language of our good Br. J. O. Skinner, in his notice of Wm. Jackson's book in the 'Freeman.' We don't and cannot like this indefiniteness. Speak out, and rest blame where it belongs.

BR. HENRY C. LEONARD. The friends of this young brother will be glad to hear that he is now settled in Thomaston, Me. He will be installed as pastor of the second Universalist Society on Christmas day or eve. Imperative engagements will prevent our attendance, did not feebleness of health dictate our tarrying at home. A good friendship has sprung up between Br. N. C. Fletcher and Br. Leonard, and they will work together for the good of the two societies. May God bless them, and return, spiritually, a thousand fold to Br. F. for his christian interest in one dear to us.

WE ACKNOWLEDGE the receipt of a small pamphlet of 24 pages, containing 'an essay on Prayer, or the Christian's prayer vindicated; to which is added a reason for perseverance, and the vision fulfilled; by James S. Palmer, Elkton, Md. Philadelphia, published by Gihon, Fairchild & Co. 1841.' We have no doubt that more care would have enabled the author to express his ideas more definitely, and to correct many errors in composition.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE LAW OF KINDNESS. By Rev. G. W. Montgomery. Utica, O. Hutchinson, 1841. pp. 216. This is a good book, full of interest, and devoted to an important matter—the illustration of the beauty and practicability of the great law of moral necessity—Kindness. We call it a law of necessity, because in the constitution of our being and the structure of society, God has wisely ordained that progress and reform shall be always allied to the spirit of kindness—of good will—of philanthropy. Our author contrasts kindness and revenge, then sets forth the power of the former, and then considers kindness in relation to the government of the insane, of criminals, and the ignorant, and how it attracts universal admiration. He then proceeds to treat of National Kindness; of kindness and persecution; and of kindness in the infliction of punishment, which makes even severity amiable, as God is in the character of Judge. Then the duty of practising the law, and the blessings which follow such practice, receive attention; and the volume closes with a chapter on the character of Christ. Does not this variety promise well for the interest of the work? 'Yes,' say you, 'if treated well.' And it is treated well, the style is chaste and animated, the language well chosen, and the historical and anecdotal illustrations selected with good taste and discernment. We commend it to the attention of our readers. It should be in every family and every library, and its spirit in every heart. It can be had of A. Tompkins. The publisher has our thanks for a copy.

THE CONVENTION SERMONS. We have received a copy of the work spoken of in our last as in press to be published by Br. Price of New-York. The volume contains Br. T. J. Sawyer's excellent Occasional Sermon, together with thirteen other sermons preached during the meetings of the Convention. The volume is got up in a very neat style and is valuable, containing sermons from Brs. Sawyer, Miner, Asher Moore, H. Ballou 2d, H. Ballou, S. Streeter, Sanford, Austin, Chapin, O. A. Skinner, Greenwood, S. R. Smith, H. G. Smith, and W. S. Balch. We hope the volume will have an extensive circulation. It can be had of A. Tompkins, price 50 cts. pp. 296.

SHANTY THE BLACKSMITH. By Mrs. Sherwood, Philadelphia: Gihon, Fairchild & Co. 1841. This is certainly one of the most interesting books we have ever read, and we have read it with care. No one in love with this kind of writing, can fail to be highly gratified with this story. It is full of incident, and light comes out of darkness with peculiar beauty. The work has been spoken of on account of its theology; but a very little, however, is to be met with in it, and that recognizes the depravity of human nature as innate,—the redemption of man as complete in Christ—'Christ is all.' Col. ii. 11. It can be had of A. Tompkins.

NEW BEDFORD, Ms. Br. L. L. Sadler, late of Bangor, and formerly of New York State, has removed to this pleasant town, and become the pastor of the Universalist Society. Br. Sadler carries with him good wishes and prayers from his brethren in Maine, and we trust that his residence in New Bedford will be pleasant and useful.

THE MOSAIC ACCOUNT OF THE DELUGE. By Rev. G. W. Montgomery, Auburn, N. Y. Published by P. Price, New York city. We received this pamphlet on leaving home for a journey, and meant to have read it ere this, but have been prevented by divers circumstances from doing so. We have full belief that it is worthy of consideration, as it is upon a subject to which Br. M. has given much attention, and he always writes well. It can be had of A. Tompkins.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS. We are happy in being able to present so interesting a number of our work to our readers. We must believe that it will be received with great favor, and valued by all.

The very excellent article entitled 'Margaret Leslie,' is founded on fact, as the writer says in a note, 'The enclosed story is founded on facts, the heroine having been personally known to me, and in my school days a dear friend.' It will be read with greater interest from the knowledge of these circumstances. We have on hand another article from the same writer, whom we speedily learned to value as a contributor.

In our next No. will appear:—'Sketches from Life, No. 2. The Widow and her Child,' received with great pleasure; as also a poem by the same, which we regret we could not get into this No.

'Kate Vincent,' by our new correspondent, Charlotte. We earnestly hope she will continue these articles, and receive our truly sincere commendation of her efforts. We have several poems by Charlotte, which will be given in due time to our readers.

'Absent Friends,' and 'Summer Rambles,' by Julia, too late for this No.

'The Sea,' a poem, by Mrs. Broughton, with other contributions—always received with great favor.

'Prayer—its nature,' by Rev. S. P. Landers,' too late for this No.

We are expecting, daily expecting to receive a communication from our far off friend, T. C. A. We hope he has not forgotten us; but if we have been so unfortunate as to have faded from his memory, may these brief lines restore us to his remembrance.

CHAPTER VII. PURITY OF HEART.

MATT. v. 8: 'Blessed are the pure in heart; for they shall see God.'

THE heart, though universally used as the seat of feeling, has in itself no feeling—it can be grasped without producing a sensation of pain. This is a discovery from actual experiment, which, like every other revelation of hidden truth, adds another demonstration that while we are fearfully and wonderfully made, there is benevolence also in every part of our mortal mechanism; for had the nerves of feeling been given to the animal heart, every pulsation would have been a thrill of anguish, and that which now, like the ministries of heavenly love, performs its office when we are enjoying the sweet and quiet repose of sleep, as when we are awake and active, would have been a continual tormentor. If the Creator were a malevolent being, we here see how easily it could have been demonstrated; but every part of our frame, to the eye of true wisdom, shows the benevolence of the Deity; for no where are the nerves of feeling placed, but where they are essential to the well being of the whole, and are guardian sentinels, or purveyors of pleasure, or contribute to that sympathy which is necessary to our social existence.

But though literally, the heart is incapable of feeling, it may with all propriety be metaphorically used as the seat of the affections and passions; or the action of the heart in the animal system, may well be made emblematic of the operations and influence of the passions and affections; for the heart is the fountain of life—the grand laboratory where the material is prepared to furnish what is wanting in the whole animal system; from thence issue streams of health and strength to every part of the structure, supplying the constant waste, and adapted to the different parts. If the heart be but healthy—the grand fountain pure—the machinery of the laboratory in order, the active round of the vital fluid will be most happy, supplying to each membrane, tendon, nerve, muscle, bone, and every other particular in the human frame, the sustenance and vivifying qualities needed, and the whole man will be in health. Mysterious is this circulation, but beautiful as the simple but sublime order in nature, by which from the vast surface of the ocean and waters those vapors are called up which form the clouds, and send life, beauty, growth, and fruitfulness, to every part of the lower world. Well may the ocean be termed 'the great heart of nature'; and how beautifully are the mutual dependencies of the animal system upon the heart, typified in the sacred language in reference to the mutual dependencies in nature upon God;—'I will hear, saith the Lord, I will hear the heavens, and they shall hear the earth, and the earth shall hear the corn, and the wine and the oil; and they shall hear Jezreel'—or the needy people.

We see then how well our Savior, not only in accordance with the peculiar opinions of the Jews on physics, but in reference to the discoveries of our age, might use the heart as the seat or centre of the affections and passions, out of which 'are the issues of life.' He kept distinctly in view, in all his teachings, what a mere surface purity had been countenanced by the religious teachers of the age, how dim was the 'inner light,' how their instructions were adapted to make men 'like a goodly apple, rotten at the heart,' and though by the scriptures they were taught of the peculiar blessings of pureness of heart, yet blinding others to the evident truth. He therefore dealt not with the streams of a corrupt fountain, but went to the fountain head; struck at the disease itself, not treating simply with the symptoms; tore off the lambskin from the wolf, and opened the beautiful sepulchre, exposing its corruption and deadness.—Blessed are the pure in heart! was his proclamation; and in these few words he displayed the superior excellence of his principles of morality, virtue, and holiness; how they first sought to make pure and healthy the source from whence came evil thoughts and all their defiling train, so that all that should afterward issue therefrom, should be for health and happiness to the spiritual man. By the pure heart could alone be possessed the vitality needed, to correct all that might enter through the influence of the outer world, and prevent the subtle mingling of evil with the emotions and feelings that affect mysteriously the affections and passions—the springs of moral action; as the healthy heart in the body can alone resist the mingling of the poisonous substance of the black blood, that comes unbidden, with the vital fluid that must be sent to every part of the system. Without this correcting power, the animal and the spiritual man become diseased, their powers weakened, their usefulness lessened, and life will be less enjoyed, and death be nearing.

Blessed then indeed are the pure in heart—happy indeed the pure! And what a beautiful reason does our Savior give why this pureness of heart is blessedness—‘For they shall see God.’ Holy, solemn thought. See God! Our Creator, Benefactor, Savior, and Friend! Not certainly, did our Lord mean that we should literally see God, but as we see the love, devotedness, and fidelity of the beloved one who is the sunshine of our home and the light of our days. We do not see the spirit that operates so that a thousand comforts are provided for us in our homes, our wishes supplied, and our happiness advanced; but we do see its manifestations. We come to our retreat from the world; we enter where activity has been operating in our absence to arrange and make all pleasant for us, and though all is silent and lone—no one is near—how do we behold the manifestations of an invisible love, if we have the nice discernment of the pure heart of love, and how do we see, as it were, in these arrangements and comforts, the presence of the beloved! If an audible voice should speak and tell the labors and by whom wrought, we could not know any better than we already know, or feel more the manifestations of love. But the wife or sister may labor with all the diligence of devoted love—may study minutely the comfort of the husband or brother, and seek with pious care to prepare every little pleasure the other enjoys, and make all the arrangements that are suited to please and minister to happiness; yet if the heart of him for whom all this was done, has no deep and true reciprocal love, he may enter amid these numerous tokens of an active love without emotions of grateful feeling, being devoid of that keen sight to discern labors for one's sake that can only be given by fondly cherished affection. And not only is he deprived of the enjoyment of those ‘thoughts, too deep for tears,’ which arise as we dwell on the blessings of the ministries of love, but he is vexed and tortured by the slightest offence to his taste, the least arrangement that does not suit him, and does despite to the spirit of love that has been so active for his good. Cannot this be applied to the pure heart and seeing God? It can; for we can only see God as he manifests himself to the mental perception.

The Savior spoke of the spiritual heart and of spiritual sight. And we all know that in a scripture sense, to see, is to discern, enjoy and realize. Thus, ‘taste and see that the Lord is good;’ i. e. have experimental knowledge that he is good. Thus, to ‘see the kingdom of God,’ denotes the possession of an inward perception of its truth, and enjoyment of its blessings, the same as to ‘enter the kingdom of God.’ He that is deaf to the truth, must be blind to it, and can no more see the glorious scenery of faith and hope, than the sightless can see the unfoldings of summer beauties. The blind may have a belief in the phenomenon of the rainbow and perhaps some imaginings of its beauties, but cannot have that sensation of rapt pleasure which is given to the true lover of nature who sees with the clear eye the bow in the heavens, when the clouds are glorious to behold, and the earth is decked in her richest robes, glittering with the jewels of the shower; so he who yields assent to the truth of christianity, but who bears with him the evil eye—the impure heart—the blindness of spiritual perception, cannot realize and enjoy all that is spiritually typified by that bow, as can he to whom omniscient Wisdom ascribes a pure heart and active goodness. We must have sympathy for the beautiful, if we would rightly appreciate it.

If the careful cherishing of true domestic affection—the religion of home, can alone give us the right inward perception of what is daily done for our comfort and well being, so as to make us grateful, and cause us to be less affected by the evils of life; it is also true that a pure heart, out of which love unfeigned towards God issues, can alone give us that inward perception of the presence of God around our daily paths, that sanctifies our labors, sweetens our toils, lessens our griefs, and gives us grateful feelings in causing us to discern how much he every hour does for our good. So true it is,

‘There’s beauty all around our paths,
If but our watchful eyes
Can trace it ’mid familiar things,
And through their lowly guise;
And feel that by the lights and clouds
Through which our pathway lies,
By the beauty and the grief alike,
We are training for the skies.’

And what—O what, do we need more than we need this spiritual perception of God! To feel him ever around us—to see in the light and joy of life his goodness, and to feel that every cloud and every shade hath a wise ordination to our character and lot. O what can compare with that spiritual perception by which the martyr looks up from the flames and the tortures around him, and sees heavenly countenances radiant with the reflected smile of Jehovah, looking down to cheer him, as the martyr Stephen saw heaven opened. And what a power to be sought is that which permits the mother and the father to see the hand of God in the removal of the only child, that was to their home what the flowers are to earth; and cause them, though they have watched and wept like David over his sick child, through nights and days, to say and feel, as he said and felt when the child was dead, ‘Wherefore should I weep!’ Aye, it is nature to weep when bitter sorrow comes; but he that sees his heavenly Father employing all trials for his good, will never weep those searing tears that well up from the boiling spring of the unbelieving or indifferent heart. Sorrow will wear a different aspect, and never will her countenance appear entirely devoid of brightness, which will at last reflect its sunny ray upon his tears, as when unexpected joy enters the soul and makes the eyes brighter for their tears. And this same feeling of the heart endears all the divine requirements, gives the only correct view of sin, and animates, as nothing else can animate, to progress in holiness and love universal.

Thus we plainly see the relations of this purity of heart with our happiness; but let us consider it now more fully as connected with and recommended by the Gospel.

And first of all, it is most manifest that all the operations of the Gospel tend to this one point—aim at this end,—purification of heart; and no truth is more distinctly expressed, or clearly unfolded and illustrated, than that so far as the Gospel produces this end, the peculiar blessings of christianity are experienced. Therefore freedom from sin is the liberty of holiness—man’s chief—his highest good. This alone gives him that spiritual position by which he can look out upon the works and operations of the Almighty to the best advantage, and without which the delicate traces of divine benevolence can no more be perceived, than the exquisite touches of the master artist on the canvas, or on the marble, can be discerned by him who has no sympathy with painting or sculpture. Well may the remark of Origen be often quoted: ‘A defiled heart cannot see God; but he must be pure who wishes to enjoy a proper view of a pure being.’

This is a law of our nature—it cannot be revoked. We must have an inward sympathy with that excellence whose worth and beauty it is desirable to discern. We must tune our own hearts, if we would hear the true music of nature, or we may often imagine the discord to be without, when in fact it is within. Our taste cannot make the waters of a bitter fountain sweet—they will flow on in bitterness; but correct the taste, and the bitter streams will be known, and shunned, or we be inspired, as was Moses, to search out the tree whose branch can change the bitter waters to sweet.

Here then we are led to show what is the blessedness of the three grand characteristics that belong to christianity—Faith, Hope, and Love. These all tend to purify the heart, and in this tendency their divine excellence consists; and a heart purified by christian truth, knows not unbelief, doubt, or hatred; these are all swallowed up—drowned—swept away—by that participation with the divine nature which enables us to escape all the corruption that is in the world, and see ever-present, all-operating and omnipotent, the God of love.

Faith tends to purify the heart, because it gives credence, in full, without the least reservation, to the perfect fitness of every requirement of our religion to promote our best good. Here is the moral office of faith. Selfish interest, policy, fame, the praise of man, wealth, power, dominion, and all the courtiers and partizans of the adversary, in vain plead, or entice, or persuade the heart that has true faith to swerve from duty. It teaches such a heart the superior excellence of benevolence above self-interest; duty above policy; self satisfaction above fame; the praise of God above the praise of men; the riches of integrity above wealth; the power to resist temptation above outward might; the control of the passions above dominion without; and holiness above every thing that can be promised by disloyalty to her commands. And more than this, faith takes hold of invisible things; it preserves the consciousness of the Deity's presence—of the invisible and close scrutiny into feelings, thoughts, emotions, desires, passions and affections, and that 'all things are naked and opened to the eyes of him with whom we have to do.' In short, it believes that God is holy—requires holiness, and that without holiness man's powers and capacities cannot have that free and proper action which is essential to his enjoyment of life; and therefore for holiness it seeks, and so Faith purifies the heart. 'Without holiness no man shall see the Lord'—shall have a right perception and enjoyment of the perfection and presence of the Deity.

So with Hope—the last angel that was left to man, and enough of herself to redeem him—if he would but listen to her voice and obey. Hope takes hold and applies to herself all that Faith promises. Had not faith and hope—glorious angels—supported Abraham on either side, he would have staggered as he went forward with his darling son and saw upon his shoulders the wood that was, as he thought, to be his funeral pile; but faith preserved his reason, and hope comforted his heart, and he gave glory to God. Says John, 'He that hath this hope in him, purifieth himself even as Christ is pure.' What hope is this? It is the gospel hope—the hope of which the Apostle spake when he said: 'Faith is the substance,' ground or confidence, 'of things hoped for.' It is the hope of being with Christ, seeing him as he is, and being like unto him. This John expresses in the verse previous to the one we quoted from him. Well, can any one have in his soul the hope to be with Christ, see him as he is, and be like him, and be at the same time conscious of the aids to progress folded up in his being, and not aim to purify himself as Christ was pure—by devotion to the service of God? He that, in a scripture sense, hath this sublime hope, will exert himself—put forth all the powers of his being, to assimilate his character to the object of his hope; even as he who has a deep and fervent love of an art or a profession, will make the most and best of himself in drawing out and improving his capabilities for its appropriate duties. So Hope tends to purify the heart, because the object of hope is purity.

So with Love. Love is the guardian angel of purity, and sees her face perfectly mirrored only when the Refiner's fire has removed away all the dross of impurity from the silver of the human heart; and for this cause she sits as a refiner near that heart, ready to acknowledge in the happy hour its purity. Where purity dwells, corruption cannot come; and where corruption is not, there is no evil work devising. Hence, the perfect benevolence of our Master's life. 'Love worketh no ill to its neighbor,' but is the friend, patron, and follower of all that is good and true. God is love, and consequently, God is pure; and these combined with the perfection of his wisdom and power, make certain the final purification of our race, for eternal perpetuity cannot be given to that which is opposite to the divine nature and glory.

Do we not thus perceive abundant reasons to regard purity of heart as an essential element of happiness? An impure heart! what can it enjoy? Nothing worthy of the desire of a rational being. It has no sympathy with the spirit of creation, with the absolute laws of our mental, moral and religious constitution, or the revelations of the highest and sublimest truth. 'To the pure, all things are pure'—all things are colored by the light in the soul's urn. Blessed is he in whom no impurity dwells to cloud or veil the 'inner light,' for he walks abroad surrounded with his God, rejoicing in the fond and joyous faith that

'The man
That could surround the sum of things, and spy
The heart of God, and secrets of his empire,
Would speak but love; with him the bright result
Would change the hue of intermediate scenes,
And make one thing of all theology.'

Absent Friends.

'My friends! my absent friends!

Do ye think of me as I think of you?' L. E. L.

Do ye not think of me, my absent friends,
Ye unto whom my heart in sadness clings,
With its undoubting faith and youthful trust,
As to the memory of all cherished things?
Can ye forget, to whom my soul hath given,
So much of love due only unto Heaven?

Do ye not think of me, whose lightest tones
Were more than melody to the fond heart,

Which knew no rapture save that ye were near,
Recked not of sorrow save that we must part?
Do ye not sometimes wish that I were near,
And think of me as one to memory dear?

I know 'tis much to ask—and yet for this,
I give the fond, confiding faith of youth,
Its answering memory of cherished love,
Its unchilled fervor, and its deathless truth,—
Its unchecked fount of feeling gushing free,
And only ask, do ye not think of me?

Do ye not think of me, for whose fond love,
I learned my proud and passionate heart to rule,
And taught it in its own unfettered power,
Each haughty and ungentle thought to school,
Till it became, the wayward and the wild,
A meek and gentle thing when friendship smiled.

My mind is wandering to the quiet vale
Where in its peaceful beauty sleeps my home,
For there I know beats many a gentle heart,
That kindly cares for her who thence did roam.
Should I no more that quiet valley see,
My absent friends, will ye not think of me?

Not as I think of ye, my selfish heart,
In its most selfish mood would never dare,
To ask so rich a boon of kindly thought,
Or claim such deep and sad remembrance there;
But I would have ye think of me as one,
To whom your love was a ne'er setting sun.

It is not well it should be thus, I feel
My spirit in its sinfulness hath given
Too much of worship unto earthly things,
Too little of devotedness to heaven;
All fetterless it may not soar above,
It still must bear the chain of earthly love.

In the deep sadness of this home-sick heart,
In the undying faith of memory,
In ceaseless prayers that daily, hourly rise
For blessings on your way, I think of ye;
But I would have ye think of me as one,
To whom your love was an unsetting sun.

'A CREATURE, not too bright or good
For human nature's daily food;—
For transient sorrows, simple wiles,
Praise, blame, love, kisses, tears and smiles.'

WORDSWORTH.

WHAT a host of associations are sometimes conjured up in the mind, by the repetition of a simple name! Days long past, and scenes almost forgotten, are suddenly recalled, in all their pristine freshness; faces that we have not seen for years look kindly upon us, friendly eyes smile, and old, familiar voices greet us with words of affection—and thoughts and feelings long hidden in the secret cells of memory, are awakened as by some magic incantation! Such were the sensations I experienced a short time since, by casually hearing the name of—'Kate'! Every one has some favorite appellation, endeared by pleasant remembrances and associations, from Byron, down to the least imaginative; and I confess that I 'have a passion for the name of' Kate; simple, graceful, loving, kind hearted, merry Kate! I was in the midst of a crowded assembly, but the instant that name was pronounced, the power of memory was confessed, and I was far away in the green, sunny home of my childhood; I saw the moss-covered roof of the little low browed cottage, where I was born—the old, wide-spreading sycamore, which grew beside the door and threw its branches over the humble dwelling, beneath whose pleasant shade I had sat so often; there was the brook that went singing merrily by, where we used to fish for the bright little minnows;—and the old well, with its 'iron-bound bucket'—a necessary feature in my eye at least, to the beauty of a country landscape;—and the green where we used to dance, and the little school house. I heard the music of the birds, and the ringing of merry voices; blessed scenes of my childhood! will ye never return save in dreams, to my yearning heart?

In a beautiful glen in a retired part of our village stood a little white cottage, half embowered in roses and honeysuckle, which from its romantic situation, had gained the name of the Bower; it had been fitted up in the most elegant manner by a gentleman of wealth and taste, as a summer residence for himself and his young bride—a fair flower whom he had transplanted from the sunny South to grace his home, but she soon withered in the uncongenial climate, and in a few months he laid her in an early grave! The bereaved husband could not bear to remain longer among the scenes from which she had fled, and he soon left the village, with orders to his agent to dispose of the property. About this time my mother received a letter from an old and valued friend, who had been her school-mate,—but having married an officer in the army and accompanied him to his distant station, the friends had not met for several years; she now wrote, stating the death of her husband, and her intention of returning with her only child to New England; she expressed a wish to reside near my mother, as the only friend of former days with whom she had maintained a correspondence, and requested her to look out a suitable residence. The Bower Cottage appeared just the thing to suit her, and an answer was accordingly returned, acquainting her with the situation of the place and other particulars, and requesting an immediate visit. I was then a warm-hearted child of ten years, and with all the eagerness of that age, I watched for their arrival; at length the day came when they might be expected; I rose early, and ransacked my little garden for the brightest flowers to ornament the mantel-piece; my dolls were dressed and re-dressed, and my baby-house set in order a dozen times; the stage arrived in the village about two o'clock, but our cottage standing on a little elevation, I could see it nearly half an hour before it arrived; on the day in question, I was posted at the window which commanded a view of the road, and Oh! how anxiously I looked for it; at length it came lumbering up the hill, and I strained my eyes to descry some one among the passengers, who could answer the idea I had formed of our expected visitors; soon the rumbling of wheels came nearer and nearer, and in a few minutes the stage stopped at our gate; the steps were let down, and a tall, fine-looking woman descended, followed by a little girl, apparently about my age, both dressed in deep mourning. Mrs. Vincent and my mother met with all the warmth of friendship, and when the first greetings were over, she turned to me, and presenting her little daughter, said, 'I hope you and my little Kate will soon be good friends.'

The Bower was purchased as a residence for them, and after a most delightful visit to us, the Vincents became its inmates; and from that time Kate and myself were playmates and school-fellows, and as we grew to womanhood, our childish intimacy ripened into a deep and lasting friendship. How shall I describe Kate Vincent? Strangers called her plain, but we who knew and loved her, thought far otherwise. True, her skin was brown, but then her cheek glowed with the richest hues of health and exercise; and what though her features did set all symmetry and regularity at defiance; who heeded that her mouth was too wide, when they saw the bright smile dimpling her face, and displaying teeth of dazzling whiteness, and lips like ripe strawberries? or heard her clear, merry laugh ringing in their ears like music? Her nose was a little turned up, but that, in my opinion, only served to heighten the arch expression which so well became her; and then her thick, jetty curls, which fell in rich profusion round her face and neck; and her long, large Oriental black eyes, sparkling and dancing in their own light, and her short, trim figure, a little embonpoint, yet light, graceful, and youthful as a Hebe,—and her whole face lit up with the affection of her own warm and generous heart. Oh to me Kate Vincent looked very lovely! She laid siege to all hearts; and rich and poor, old and young, every body loved the gay, good-humored girl; she was her mother's idol, and the pet and favorite of the whole village; and old blind Susan used to say, that 'it did her heart good, to hear her footsteps, and her merry laugh echoing in her humble dwelling.' Add to these an intelligent and well cultivated mind, and you have some idea of one whose name can always bring a thrill of delight to my heart.

More than seven years of quiet happiness had glided by, since the Vincents first came to our village, and each succeeding season served to rivet still closer the bonds of intimacy between the two families. The merry Kate was fast verging towards her seventeenth year, yet seemed not a whit steadier than at twelve, and save the changes that are always taking place in every community, every thing remained much the same as when they first came to the Bower. One afternoon about sunset, I called at the cottage for Kate to accompany me on a walk we had been projecting, and on entering the little parlor, found her with an open letter in her hand, and to my utter surprise and dismay—in tears!

'What is the matter, dear Kate,' I exclaimed.

'Nothing, only I was very foolish, and a little agitated by reading this letter; it is my father's writing. But come,' she continued, 'let us go out, and on the way I will tell you the cause of my tears.'

We accordingly set out, and I will endeavor to tell the tale, as it was told to me.'

'Captain Vincent, the father of Kate, had an only sister, to whom he was very tenderly attached; she was many years his senior, and their mother having died while he was very young, she had in a great measure supplied her place to him. Young Vincent had always shown a predilection for the army, and as soon as he arrived at a suitable age, entered the Military Academy at West Point. About this time his sister married a wealthy and distinguished southerner, and went to reside in Virginia. Mr. Jerauld, her husband, was a man of highly cultivated mind, and fine talents, and passionately devoted to study. His intense application to it, gradually undermined a constitution never very strong, and the high-hearted man was cut off in the prime of his days, leaving his wife and her brother executors of his princely fortune, and guardians to his only son, a boy of fifteen. The disconsolate wife survived her husband but a twelve-month, and from that time Horace Jerauld became a member of his uncle's family, by whom he was regarded with all the affection of a son; and his uncle seemed to endeavor by his kindness to him, to repay in some measure the debt of gratitude and love he bore the boy's mother. The little Kate was at that time about four years old, and towards her, Horace manifested all the tender affection of a brother, and in return was dearly loved by the little creature.

'After a year passed thus, Horace entered the University, but all his vacations were spent with his beloved friends. At length his collegiate course was finished, and it was settled that after a long visit at home, he should make the tour of Europe. But in the second week after his return, Captain Vincent was suddenly taken ill, and after three weeks of agonizing suspense, his case was pronounced hopeless. Horace was his constant attendant, administering to his necessities, and even anticipating many wants of the invalid. When the sick man felt the hand of death upon him, he motioned his nephew to come nearer, and with difficulty addressed him. "I wished to speak to you, Horace, on a subject that is near my heart. For my pecuniary affairs I have no anxiety; I leave my family in comfortable though not affluent circumstances, and I know you will be an unfailing friend to them; it is of my child I would speak, of my darling little Kate, so soon to be left fatherless. I know that you regard each other with the affection of brother and sister, but it is my earnest wish, as it was that of your dear father and mother, Horace, that it should ripen into a warmer sentiment; and should neither of you conceive a passion for any other, may I hope that when Kate arrives at a suitable age, my wishes shall be fulfilled?"

'Most assuredly, dear uncle, as far as I am concerned; but should Kate then have other inclinations, be assured I will ever be to her a faithful friend and brother.'

That night Captain Vincent died; and when the funeral was over, and his affairs settled, Horace escorted his aunt and cousin, till they took the stage for our village, and then prepared for his voyage.

'Since that time,' said Kate, 'you know our history.'

'But I do not yet understand, why if you love your cousin, you should have cause for tears in the prospect of being more nearly connected with him?'

'I did love him,' she replied, 'in the days of my childhood, but I have only a faint recollection now, of his personal appearance; I have not seen him since I was nine years old, and he is twelve years my senior; I remember that he was very kind and pleasant, but nothing further. My mother has frequently received letters from him, and always spoke of him to me, in the most affectionate manner; but this afternoon she sent for me to come to her room, and told me all that I have now repeated to you, and put into my hands the letter, which caused my tears; it was written in a trembling hand, by my dear father, the day before his death, and contains a request, similar to that he made of Horace, and telling me in the most earnest language, how he had cherished the project of our union; and is it not strange, my wayward heart, which has always retained a warm affection for my cousin Horace, rebels at the idea of becoming his wife, unwooed?'

I said all in my power to comfort her, and before we returned to the house, her face was decked in smiles again, and her bright eyes sparkling through her tears. When we reached the Bower, we found Mrs. Vincent waiting for us at the door, and there was a deeper shade than usual on her brow, which was instantly dispelled, however, when she saw the beaming face of her daughter.

Three or four weeks after the above conversation, Kate and myself were returning from a long ramble, when, just as we reached the very prettiest spot in the village, we encountered a tall, handsome-looking man, leaning against a tree, and busily engaged in sketching the beautiful scene before him. As we approached, he raised his eyes, and fixed them for an instant upon Kate with a look of admiration; then saluting us courteously, he resumed his employment. The handsome stranger furnished ample theme for conversation during the remainder of our walk, and when we returned to the cottage, we mentioned the incident to Mrs. Vincent.

'I wonder who he can be,' said Kate, 'he must be a late arrival.'

'I can satisfy your curiosity, I believe,' said Mrs. V. 'The same gentleman, I presume, called here a few minutes after you set out, and brought me letters from some southern friends; he is a Virginian of good family, his name is

Stanwood, and he is by profession an artist; his appearance is very prepossessing, and my friends give him a high character; he is travelling in search of subjects for his pencil, and is so pleased with the romantic beauty of our village, that he intends passing several weeks here; and I propose gratifying the ardent wish you have always expressed to learn to draw, by allowing you to take lessons of him during his stay.'

Kate thanked her mother with sparkling eyes, and the next day the artist called again, and was introduced to his pupil; never had teacher a more assiduous one, and for two or three weeks all went on smoothly. In the meantime Stanwood became a constant visiter at the Bower; when not engaged with the lessons, he read with a deep, mellifluous voice from their favorite authors (for somehow their tastes seemed to agree remarkably,) while Kate was busy with her needle; or if she sang, he accompanied her soft, bird-like notes, with his flute, or his own richer tones; and far oftener, the book, pencil and flute were thrown aside, for a long twilight, or moonlight ramble. At first, I used to join them in these walks, as I had been accustomed to do when I was Kate's chosen companion; but after a while, I began to feel myself rather de trop, or, in other words, that third person, whose situation is so extremely awkward, when one cannot help feeling one's companions would prefer being tete-a-tete. At the commencement of these walks, the starry heavens, and the beautiful earth, had been the chief objects of admiration; and many long and animated conversations had passed concerning them; but if they now looked at the stars less, they gazed into each other's eyes more, and doubtless fancied them far brighter; and at length I betook myself to solitary rambles, before 'the dewy eve came on;' and made my visits at the cottage at a time when I was more likely to find Kate at home. Now all these moonlight walks, and sentimental tete-a-tetes, did not seem to me, just the thing for an engaged young lady, but since her birth night Kate had never mentioned the subject, and I did not feel at liberty to introduce it; the less as Mrs. Vincent looked with apparent pleasure on the growing intimacy of her daughter with the artist; and heard with indifference, to say the least, the village gossip concerning it. As for the parties themselves, they appeared wholly engrossed with admiration of each other; and if Stanwood had not made his young pupil a proficient in drawing, certain it is, he had instructed her fully in a far more intricate and dangerous science! Her life appeared to be one dream of delight, and when I looked at her sparkling face, I trembled lest some unseen cloud should darken the brilliant heaven of her hopes.

While affairs were in this state, I went to the city to pass a fortnight with a friend; on the afternoon of my return home, as I was relating my adventures, and hearing the news of the village, a note was brought me from Kate Vincent. It contained a few lines written in a trembling hand, and scarcely legible, and the surface of the paper was blistered in several places as if by tears; she wished me, if I were not too fatigued, to come to her immediately. I hastily donned my bonnet, and pondering on the strangeness of the summons, and forming a thousand conjectures, I arrived at the Bower. Upon entering the parlor, I found it untenanted, but happening to bethink me of a place, where I should be likely to find her, I bent my steps thither. The apartment to which I allude, was a small, pretty room, at the back of the cottage, where Kate and myself had passed many happy hours; it was neatly fitted up, with books, pictures, and many pretty knick-knacks, and souvenirs. A folding window of glass opened upon a little green terrace, which in the spring and summer was completely enamelled with flowers. As I approached the door, I heard a low, convulsive sob, and hastily opening it, I found Kate lying on the sofa, with her face covered by her hands, while the tears trickled through her fingers. She rose as I entered and grasping my hand, exclaimed, 'It was very kind of you to come so soon—I am so very wretched!' Half alarmed by her manner, I seated myself beside her, and soon drew from her the cause of her distress. Her mother had received another letter from Horace Jerauld, in which he expressed his intention of coming to the village immediately, to renew the acquaintance of his promised bride; as she had now nearly reached the age when her father wished the connection to take place. He says in his letter, continued Kate, 'tell my cousin that since I left her, her image has been my constant companion; and joined with my dear uncle's last words to me, has guarded my heart against the charms of the loveliest woman in Europe; and I am now about returning to my native land with a heart beating high to see the dear ones it contains. I presume Kate is already aware of her father's wishes, and

I trust she will not refuse to ratify the promises she used to make me, when a little laughing gypsy of eight or nine years, always to love cousin Horace.'

'And so I do, as a cousin,' said Kate, 'but marry him, I cannot; What shall I do?—counsel me, for I am too miserable to think for myself.'

'And where is Stanwood?'

'He has gone to the city, on business, and will return in a few days—and how can I meet him with this intelligence? I will beg Horace on my knees, to free me from this hateful engagement, for how can I go to the altar with him, when my heart is all another's?'

'And what does your mother say about it?' I inquired.

'She wishes me to marry the man of my father's choice, and she says I cannot fail to be happy, with one as generous and good as he is. Oh! why did she place me in the way of one so fascinating as Stanwood, so every way worthy of love, and then urge me to a union I despise.'

'But perhaps, if your cousin be really as noble-hearted as your mother says, and even you allow that all your recollections of him are pleasant, he will scorn to avail himself of the influence of your father's wishes when he knows your reluctance; when does he arrive?'

'Very soon,' she replied, 'to-morrow I fear.'

'Then I advise you, dear Kate, to see him; tell him your feelings towards him, and your love for another, and if he be what he is represented, he will gladly free you; if not, you know you are not compelled to marry him, for your father expressly says, in his letter to you, and his request to your cousin, that he would not force your inclinations.'

Soon after I took my leave, promising to see her the next day; on my way home, my mind was wholly engrossed by the troubles of my friend; and I could not help reprobating the inconsistency and imprudence, to say the least, on the part of her mother, in allowing such unrestricted intimacy between Kate and her drawing master, and showing such apparent pleasure in the growth of an attachment, which she might have foreseen in throwing, together two persons so admirably qualified to please, and make each other's happiness.

I was unable to fulfill my promise in the fore part of the succeeding day, but in the course of the afternoon I walked down to the cottage, and entering the little room I have before mentioned,

I found the mother and daughter together. Mrs. Vincent was calm, collected, and dignified as usual; more at ease, I thought, than the occasion warranted, when the destiny of an only and darling child was about to be decided; but Kate appeared to be in a state of nervous agitation, which was really painful to behold; and I could scarcely have recognized in the sad, drooping figure before me, the gay, laughter-loving girl, whose smile was so full of sunshine. Her colorless face was half hidden in her thick ringlets; her large black eyes, had a wild, unnatural stare, and her hands lay listlessly on her knees, in all the languor of despair. Mrs. Vincent soon left the room, and I ventured to ask if her cousin had arrived?

'No, but he will be here to-night, and I have tried hard to gain courage to meet him and tell him all.'

While we were conversing, we heard the sound of approaching wheels and in a few minutes it stopped at the door. Presently Mrs. Vincent entered the room;—'Your cousin has arrived Kate,' said she, 'and wishes to see you; do not tremble so, my love, only see him once, receive him as a friend, and if your heart still revolts from the idea of becoming his wife, I will urge it no farther; shall I bring him hither?'

Kate bent her head in assent, for she seemed to have lost the power of speech; and her mother soon returned, accompanied by the dreaded visitor. 'Your cousin Horace, my daughter,' said Mrs. Vincent.

'Dear Kate,' said a well known voice, and Kate lifted her head, and the next moment was clasped to the heart of her artist-lover, her betrothed husband, Horace Jerauld! Excess of joy is sometimes as overpowering as grief, and a long swoon succeeded to this delightful recognition.

'Is he so very hateful, dearest,' said Horace to his cousin as they sat together in the little boudoir, the day after the dénouement.

'O Horace! how could you deceive me so? and you too, my dear mother, to turn such a traitor?'

Mrs. Vincent smiled, and Horace said, 'You must lay all the blame on me, Kate, the scheme was my own. Your seventeenth birthday was the period fixed on for making you acquainted with your father's wishes respecting us, and your mother wrote to me, with intelligence that she had told you all, and also with your reluctance to perform the engagement. I then laid the plan to introduce myself to you in a different character, and endeavoring to win your love, and if I succeeded, to make myself known. I accordingly came to the village, and sought an interview with my aunt; I told her my scheme and gained her interest, and the rest you know; and now, considering the finale, may I not hope for forgiveness?

Kate's answer is not upon record, but we presume it was very favorable, for the next Sabbath many smiling eyes were directed towards the Vincents' pew, when at the close of morning service, the parish clerk published the 'banns of matrimony between Horace Jerauld, Esq. and Miss Catherine Vincent;' and some three weeks later, I was summoned to officiate as bridesmaid at the marriage of my friend. It was a bright, beautiful September evening, and if there be aught in omens, it prognosticated for them a cloudless life. Shall I describe the wedding? and tell you that the bride looked lovely, as brides always do; and how her face was alternately suffused with blushes, and brightened with smiles and dimples?—and how the bridegroom looked full of happiness, as a man might be supposed to look who was about to receive the consummation of the hopes of years;—and how the mother's face wore an expression of chastened happiness, as she 'gave her to another's arms, her beautiful, her own;'—and how the guests wept during the short and simple, but solemn ceremony, which bound those two hearts in a tie,

'Which only love should weave,
And only death can part?'

Or, shall I speak of the congratulations which followed; and the mirth that prevailed, till the group at length dispersed to their several homes?

The morrow came, and with it came the carriage that was to convey the newly married couple to their southern home; Mrs. V. was not to accompany them, though Horace and Kate had both entreated it; but she had become attached to the village and its inhabitants, and preferred remaining, with a promise of making long and frequent visits to her children. Mrs. Vincent was not a woman to give way to idle grief, and when they were gone, and the first freshness of sorrow at the parting had worn off, she set about her usual occupation. Frequent letters came from Kate, filled with expressions of happiness, and her fond mother was satisfied. About this time, I went to reside in another part of the State, and since her marriage, I have seen Kate but seldom. The last time I saw her, I was on a visit to my native village, and almost the first news I heard on my arrival was, that the Jeraulds were at the Bower. It was a summer afternoon, and I immediately walked down to the cottage, and entered the well known dwelling, without the ceremony of knocking. I was led by the sound of voices to the little terrace-room; the door stood ajar, and unseen I looked in upon the group. At the window, stood a lady, holding in her arms a beautiful child, while another some two years older, stood by her side. The face was partly turned from me, and the once thick curls were gathered into rich braids; but there was no mistaking that round, youthful figure, and that light, ringing laugh; the next moment I was in the room, and received a cordial greeting from my blooming friend, and her handsome husband.

'And here are my pets,' said Kate, laughing, and presenting her beautiful children; 'and on pain of my displeasure, you must say they are very lovely.'

'You are the same as ever, Kate, I perceive.'

'Yes.'

'And you have never repented your marriage with that terrible cousin?'

'Never!' she replied, turning her beaming eyes on her husband; 'Oh! I am very happy!'—and so I believe she is. I have never seen her since, but I occasionally hear from her, and her letters are always fraught with the affection of her own warm and generous spirit. Dear Kate! where-soever thou art, may God ever bless and prosper thee and thine!

Sonnet.—'Home Vale.'

HOME VALE! dearest spot on the wide spreading earth,
I must bid thee my last and my painful adieu;
But can I forget thee? the land of my birth
Shall fade from my memory much sooner than you.

Forever enshrined in this heart thou shalt be;
Forever remembered where e'er I may roam;
In the strife of the world I will still look to thee
As the mariner looks in the storm to his home.

Farewell; thou retreat of the gifted in song;
Where affections are nursed and where purity reigns;
May the current of time as it hurries along,
Deface not thy threshold with one of its stains.
May the sweet christian graces eternally dwell
In the mansion they now are adorning so well.

The Sad Festival.

BY MISS M. A. DODD.

How often has thanksgiving been a happy day to me, and how often have I looked forward with joy to its coming. O, many times have glad hearts and happy faces met together to enjoy this festival at my pleasant home. Many times has the long board, covered with profusion, been surrounded by the smiling eyes of children, grandchildren, and friends. What a change one year has wrought among us! I look round on our diminished number—we are but five, to-day. Are we joyous? O, no! We come to the table in silence, and there is nothing superfluous upon it, for we feel that profusion would be a mockery, and we can scarcely taste the few viands, so dimmed are our eyes and so saddened our hearts. Father, do not weep! every tear of thine doubles the pain at my heart. Alas! my own eyes are overflowing, I cannot restrain the fast dropping tears. Our thoughts are with the absent and the dead. One of our number is far, far away, and one has gone down to the grave in life's early morning. We miss thy angel smile, O dear, departed brother! We listen in vain, for thy quick, light step, and thine ever cheerful voice. Thou wert the joy and pride of our home; the pearl of price, the jewel of our hearts, and thy presence was like sunshine to us all; but thy life passed away with the fading roses, and we shall see thee here no more forever. Thou wert too good, too gentle and pure minded, to dwell long on earth, and the Savior folded his robes around thee and took thee to his bosom. Thou art happy! thou art ineffably blest! how then can we wish thee with us now?

With us!—we wrong thee by the earthly thought—
 Could our fond gaze but follow where thou art,
 Well might the glories of this world seem naught
 To the one promise given the pure in heart.

Yet wert thou blest e'en here—oh! ever blest
 In thine own sunny thoughts and tranquil faith;
 The silent joy that still o'erflowed thy breast,
 Needed but guarding from all change, by death.

So is it sealed to peace!—on thy clear brow
 Never was care one fleeting shade to cast,
 And thy calm days in brightness were to flow,
 A holy stream, untroubled to the last!

Farewell! thy life hath left surviving love
 A wealth of records and "sweet feelings given,"
 From sorrow's heart the faintness to remove,
 By whispers breathing 'less of earth than heaven.'

Thus rests thy spirit still on those with whom
 Thy step the path of joyous duty trod,
 Bidding them make an altar of thy tomb,
 Where chastened thought may offer praise to God!

We miss another loved one who has turned his steps away towards the setting sun. Dear, absent brother! we may hold communion with thee to-day, for thy thoughts are here, and thy heart, too, mourns for the sunbeam which has ceased to shine on our pathway. Pray for us, brother, and we will pray for thee! and may Heaven protect thee, and lead thy steps again to thine early home.

I too, have been away. Months have I passed in a sweet, quiet spot, embosomed among the mountains of the North. I saw those lofty heights in the green dress of summer; in the glorious robes of autumn; in the sombre garb which they don when their rainbow hues have departed, and in their snowy drapery, which, though fair to look upon, sends a chill through the frame, for it bids us think of the coming winter, of the cold, and of the frost. There are warm hearts among those beautiful Vermont mountains, whose sensibilities their cold climate cannot chill. Pleasant days have I passed there; kind words and sunny smiles have raised my drooping spirits; and tender sympathy has softened the sorrow of my soul. I have met dear friends there who will never be forgotten; I have looked from the watch towers of nature upon glorious landscapes which will long remain pictured in memory, and have listened to exquisite music which is still echoing in my heart. How is it to day with the loved family in which I have so long been a member? Ye too, are keeping this festival, and looking round the board upon its diminished number. Where is the daughter, the eldest one, whose cheerful temper and affectionate heart, lent a charm to her home, making it pleasant for all? She has given her hand, her heart, and her smiles to another; she has gone from thee a happy bride. It is but a little while ago, and they who remain in the home she left, cannot yet be reconciled to the change. An only son too, is absent, duty has called him away, and the many guests who lately met under the hospitable roof, have all said farewell, and departed.

'Sweet Anna,' I see a shade stealing over thy expressive countenance, and thy large, dark eyes are moistened with tears as thy thoughts turn to the sister, the brother, and the cousin, all far away. Mary, you too have a cloud on your usually sunny face. Your arms are twining around me, your kiss is on my lips, and I hear you saying, 'Cousin, I love you;' and very precious is that love to me, sweet child. You were exceeding sorrowful when we left you, on that day of tears and farewells, for your young heart had never known a grief more deep than that caused by parting with so many you loved. God bless you! dear, affectionate, light hearted Mary! and ever keep your spirit undefiled! Blessings on each and all of the dear family who share so large a place in my heart. Blessings on the departed bride, and the absent son; and may we all meet again under that happy roof; but if not there, or elsewhere on earth, may we meet in heaven.

Memory is busy to-day, and the form of another well beloved friend, who was with me one year ago, rises before my mind's eye; but it is a form of air; for she is not here, she has left us, and has gone with the chosen of her heart to a distant city. It is long since we have held communion either by word or pen. Art thou thinking of thy New England home to-day? Does thy heart keep this anniversary with us? My thoughts go forth to meet thee, and I would fain tell thee how I have suffered and wept. Friend of my heart! the sad forebodings which troubled me, when I bade thee farewell, were realized, and the shadow of death darkened around my home. I bowed in anguish before the destroying angel, and wished that I too might die; for life seemed worthless, and the world but a scene of trial and tears. I was weak, but God strengthened me—the cloud lifted, and the light again dawned upon my soul; and with an eye that sees clearly the path of duty before me, I strive to walk steadily and cheerfully on.

The day which has thronged my heart with so many memories is closing in gloom and storm, and I will now say farewell to those who have to-day met only in thought; but the time is coming when the heart shall no longer vainly ask for the lost and absent, and when the festival shall no more be sad because some dear ones are not there. Let us look forward with joyful anticipations to that thanksgiving of our God, when we shall behold all we have ever loved on earth, assembled together in our Father's house in heaven.

Hartford, Nov. 25, 1841.

WHEN you go abroad among the fields of nature, in autumn time, and witness the changed aspect of the scenery around, from what glorious summer had so lately put on, and observe the decaying of vegetation, the falling of the leaves, how it reminds man of his progress and decay. It is fit for man thus to see himself.

Lines written Extempore.

THE accompanying extempore lines, (written on reading Mrs. Hunt's beautiful poem, 'Georgiana,') are with diffidence offered to the editors of 'the Ladies' Repository,' as the writer knows they have a better claim to truth and feeling than merit as a poem! She is aware that they might be improved—but she is unwilling to alter them.

MOTHER—did no spirit token
Tell thee then—the chord had snapped?
That the golden bowl was broken,
And the heart's bright fountain sapped?

* * * * *
Tell us, is no warning given
When the distant loved one dies?

MRS. C. W. HUNT.

AYE, did the spirit come! With whispers loud,
And deep—borne on old ocean's stormy blast.
With light'nings speed it came—quicker than e'er
The meteor's course athwart the firmament!
And to mine ear it said with fearful tone
'Thy child is dead!'—In vain friends rose and said,
'Twas but a fancy, love and fear had wrought;
I knew 'twas so! How could I doubt the voice,
That God had sent across the briny deep,
To warn my stricken heart, to pray for strength
To bear a widowed and a childless doom!
O God! Those fearful words, ne'er struck such dread—
Such certainty—when clothed in human tones,
As thus they did!

'Twas long before the wished for letter came.
My weary, tearless eyes—(I was too sad to weep,)
Would day by day, watch each white sail that decked
The bright blue sea, yet brought no news to me!
Then night—the lonely night, with freshening breeze,
Would bathe my fevered brow—my heart
The while grew sadder; and the dull deep tones,
Of the Cathedral bell, whose midnight chime,
Broke the sad silence—fell heavy on my heart,
And seemed the knell of hope! nature at length,
Exhausted, sank to slumber, not to rest,
For dim unearthly visions rose to rack
The brain—and worn with troubled sleep, the frame
Scarce could support another weary day!

* * * * *
Father! I thank thee! Thou didst give me strength,
In this sad hour—in this my time of need,
And nerved my soul to bear thy chastening hand
Though deep the iron entered—and to quaff
The bitter cup, which shuddering nature loathed!
For at thy bidding, Faith and Hope, stood by
And lent me grace to say, 'Thy will be done!'
Like Naomi of old—I had gone out
Full and returned empty!

Letters to Elizabeth. No. 1.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF PHILADELPHIA.

'HAVE you seen Philadelphia yet, cousin Julia?' said little Eddy. One look of love was given to the dear child, the next to the beautiful city we were so rapidly approaching, thine own city, my sweet friend, and one I was almost ready to admire for thy sake. My first impression was of beauty,—calm, still, dreamlike beauty. We had turned with saddened hearts from our own fair

Lancaster, had said a long adieu to our Boston friends, two weary hours of disappointment and vexation were all our sojourn in New York, but like an isle of peace in our pathway lay the city of brotherly love, and within its pleasant places were fond and gentle friends awaiting our arrival. Methinks there is something in the very air, that breathes of hushed repose. Repose we surely wished, for a deep weariness had passed over mind, and heart, and earthly frame. The boat soon touched the wharf, and the tones of well known voices met the ear, a few short moments more and our fatigue was forgotten in the joyous meeting of long sundered friends.

And now I hear a voice of soft reproach, 'Hast thou but now found thought for those thou hast left?' Nay, chide me not, dear friend, nor if thou lovest me, doubt my home bound thoughts. Truly 'there are some things I cannot bear,' and doubt from those I love, is one of these. Undoubting love,—unfaltering trust, are they not priceless gifts for the human heart to ask?

We had few thoughts to spare for the lovely day which greeted our arrival, albeit it was the smile that cometh after many a frown. There was a beaming sky above us, and the busy streets of a populous city beneath us, but our spirits lingered still with the dancing waves, the free glad waters where we fain would live and die. They had borne us from the home of love, the friends so dear, but in their foamy beauty swept they on, and the heart of youth forgave them. Beautiful are the waters ever, for the Spirit of the Lord passed over them.

'I am glad you have come this week, for now you can visit the Chinese collection,' said a friend the evening of my arrival. I sighed in weariness at the thought of thus disturbing my visions of rest, but it was to be removed in a few days, and I accepted the kind invitation. We spent several hours here, admiring the works of this interesting nation. The exquisite finish of many of the articles excited our admiration, while the patient and persevering industry by which they must have been framed, moved us to wondering thought. The figures were strikingly natural, and we might almost imagine ourselves in the visiting room of the nobleman, the store of the merchant, or the workshop of the artizan, as we turned from one to another of the groups. The vacant spaces were hung with paintings, many of which interested me much. Among the flowers represented I noticed many familiar friends. The porcelain was beautiful, as would in truth be deemed a thing of course.

The Sabbath morning came, with its quiet loveliness, seeming as if all nature bent in prayer. It brought the fond recollection of many a home scene, and home thoughts were not calculated to add gaiety to the heart of the absent one. The Sabbath bells were calling us to many a magnificent church within whose walls a gathering crowd were met,—I thought but of a humbler edifice by the banks of a woodland stream, where in the spirit's truth worship a few and feeble band. I knew that there were many there to miss their sister one. There was a soft tone that was wont to greet me, and a gentle hand that was clasped in mine, and a smile that ever called an answering smile, but the place by her side was mine no more. I strove to hide my weakness from the eye of friendship, and if possible to banish every saddening thought, when the bells of Christ's Church, near by, rang forth their music notes of 'Home, sweet Home.' Blame me not, sweet friend, if I should own the tears those tones called up from the fount that had been long and silently flowing far down in the deep recesses of a homesick heart.

Yet I have found much, very much, to admire in this Quaker city. The neat and tasteful garb which distinguishes so many of its inhabitants, has always been a favorite one with me. The width and regularity of its streets, the beauty of its public buildings,—and more than all else the graceful trees which adorn its most crowded streets, are well worthy the admiration of the stranger. Its public squares afford many pleasant walks, and its beautiful cemeteries show that the departed are not forgotten. The very name of Philadelphia has a tone of quiet in its sound, and its citizens pass to and fro even in its most noisy streets with an air of stillness totally unlike the bustling manner which characterizes a New Yorker wherever he may be. Fountains of water flow in every street, and on either side the bright waters of a silvery stream glance up to greet the eye.

Still 'I have a few things against' them. My almost Jewish prejudices would remove the swine from their thoroughfares, where now they roam with much apparent consciousness of an undisputed right. There is even a slight wish in my mind to exchange the white shutters which are seen on every side, for the green lattices of New England, and once again to talk of ninepences and fourpence-happenies instead of levies and fippenny bits. Am I not a very severe critic?

You are with me, a lover of the flowers, else would I not tell you of the many rare and brilliant 'stars of earth,' that were arranged for exhibition at the Masonic Hall, soon after my arrival here. It was the annual exhibition of the Horticultural Society, and I pass over the luscious fruits, and 'big pumpkins,' to tell you of the flowers. A more beautiful collection of dahlias I have never seen. I have heard the remark, 'If the dahlia and rose bloom side by side, the dahlia will be admired at a distance, but the rose will be gathered by the hand of love.' However true this may be, yet I confess a love for the fair flower that saith, in its own gentle language, 'Forever thine,' for such even in defiance of 'Flora's Interpreter' is the dahlia's tone. The mysterious passion flower,

'Which consecrate to Salem's peaceful King,
Though fair as any beauty's bower,
Is linked to sorrow like a holy thing,' spoke of 'religious fervor,' and the aloof of 'religious superstition.' Yet I turned away from other and rarer flowers, to list to the graceful myrtle, as it whispered of the absent and the dear, and the tears came as I looked on the globe amaranth's unchanging flower, and thought how it bloomed a cherished thing in the far away gardens of home. But more than all—

Two moss-wove baskets side by side,
My admiration drew,
One filled with every brilliant flower,
Which in the garden grew.
The tulip by the lily's side,
The orange blossom fair,
The moss-rose with its fairy gift,
The dahlia high was there.
I may not pause to name each one,
For thou full well dost know,
The beauty of the budding flowers,
In garden walks that grow.
The other held a wild-flower band,
From wayside, glen, and wood,
And bright and beautiful therein,
The starry aster stood.
The little pale forget-me-not,
The dandelion rude,
And gentian blue that only springs
Where autumn leaves are strewed.
The yellow butter-cup so dear,
To heart of every child,
Yarrow for aching hearts a cure,
Shamrock and thistle wild.
Each flower that keeps the memory
Of happy moments spent,
In loiterings by the wayside, when
To village school we went,—
Of sunny rambles through the glen,
By forest, field, and brook,—
And many a precious lesson learned
From many a wild-flower book.
I mused upon their loveliness,
One spoke the power of art,
The other of the mightier spell,
Of Nature o'er the heart.

If I have not already wearied your patience, dear Elizabeth, with this very connected epistle, you may perhaps hear again from the absent one. You know I only promised you first thoughts, and they have been perhaps too often thoughts of home, for well have I learned how much of music dwells in that one word, MASSACHUSETTS.

'His Banner over me was Love.'

BY IONE.

I KNEW it—I knew it, and therefore smiled,
Though the storm swept by on its pinions wild;
And its breath like the fearful simoon blast,
To the earth's cold breast had the flow'rets cast,
But I could not weep, for I glanced above,
And I saw that the banner there was love!

I knelt by the couch where an idol lay,
And I strove in my bitter grief to pray,
But the brow was cold and the voice was hushed,
And I wept for a bud of promise crushed;
Then a finger pointed to realms above,
And I saw that the banner there was love!

I laid on a false and glittering shrine,
The treasure due to a friend divine,
From the shrine full many a prize I bore,—
'Twas the golden fruit with the ashy core!
Then I turned to the holy courts above,
And the banner there was the sign of love!

Oh! the grave is dark, and I fear to tread
The silent courts of the holy dead!
I shrink from the sable pall and shroud,—
The doom alike of the meek and proud!
Yet these are the path to the bliss above,
Where a banner floats in the breath of love!

'Tis love that watches the infant's birth,
And guide his step o'er the laughing earth,
And crowns his brow in its manly prime,
With flowers undimmed by the flight of time;
Then mounts on the wings of the soaring dove,
Where a banner waves in the home of love!

Beautiful Thoughts on Prayer.

As I was passing out of a bookstore I chanced to see a small pile of pamphlets, and pausing, found they were tracts. Prayer was the subject. I threw down the price and took one, saying to a friend, 'I shall get more than my money's worth!' believing I should find some good thoughts in the treatise. But little did I expect such richness as I discovered when I read the little work. The beautiful ideas are clothed in language of uncommon excellence, and the spirit that breathes through the whole is of the most earnest and persuasive character. Prayer is a spiritual exercise, and no spiritual exercise can be without a rich reward; and we should value such rich invitations to its culture as are furnished in this treatise. I feel that I shall do my readers a favor by offering some extracts. It is by Rev. John H. Morrison, I believe, an Unitarian minister in New Bedford, Mass.

‘THERE is no act, which in word and practice Jesus has more earnestly enforced than prayer. In connection with this subject one passage (Mat. xiv.) in his life has been always to my own mind peculiarly affecting. He had been through the day instructing the multitude and healing their sick, confirming his spiritual teachings by his sympathy with their spiritual wants. Having at the close of the day miraculously fed the five thousand, he constrained his disciples to get into a ship, and dismissing the multitudes, as they were winding their way homeward through the valleys, “he went up into a mountain to pray; and when the evening was come he was there alone,” and there remained till the first streaks of morning were shooting up over Mount Hermon, and perhaps kindling the snowy peaks of Mount Lebanon. All night long the disciples on the sea below were tossed by the waves, while he, far above, in the serenity of his own spirit, reflecting the clear serenity of the skies, was spending the night in prayer. Faint and exhausted with the toils of the day, he had gone up thither to pour out his soul before his Father, and now refreshed and strengthened, he comes down to allay the storm, and calm the fears of his followers.

‘Such is the true character of prayer. From our anxieties and labors, the storms, and doubts, and agitations of life, it leads us up to the mountain of meditation, it spreads around us the clear serenity of the heavens, it reveals to us the first dawns of that spiritual light which shall afterwards shine upon our daily walks; it purifies, it invigorates the soul; it goes down with us to calm the tempest, to assuage the fears, remove the darkness and doubts, that distress us, to give us strength for all our duties, and to spread its own cheerful spirit round our steps.

‘Prayer is the intercourse of man with God. It is calling upon our Father in heaven with the certainty that we shall be heard and answered. Not that we expect every request to be literally granted. But as the true child wishes his requests to be modified by the better judgment of his father, so we may wish and expect our prayers to be answered only so far as the divine wisdom may see it to be for our good!

‘But can we hope that our prayers will have any influence upon the Almighty? Can we expect through prayer to receive that which we might not otherwise obtain? Has the act of devotion any effect except upon our own minds? Here, with many, are the great difficulties connected with the subject. God is unchangeable; how then can prayer affect him in the distribution of his gifts? God is indeed unchangeable; but man is not; and the result of the intercourse between the two will always vary according to man’s conduct. God is unchangeable, not because he acts always in the same way; but because he adheres always to the same principles. He rewards the just; he punishes the unjust; his action in the two cases is different, but the principle the same. If he treated good and bad alike, his immutable conduct would be purchased at the expense of his immutable justice. The whole difficulty rests on this wrong idea of the divine character. God is unchangeable because he adheres always to the same principles. In conformity to an unchanging principle he rewards the just and punishes the unjust; and in conformity to an unchanging law he may give to him who asks and withhold from him who asks not.

‘In his influence upon matter the laws are always the same; but the result is perpetually varying with the circumstances under which they are brought to act. For instance, the laws of vegetation are the same, whatever may be my conduct; but the question whether I am to reap a harvest from their operation depends very much on my causing the seed to be put into the ground. In all the intercourse of God with his free agents the principles are unchangeable, but there are conditions to be performed on our part before we can enjoy the reward. I must sow in order to reap; I must ask in order to receive; and as the connection between sowing and reaping is a part of the established system of things;—so also is the connection between asking and receiving. I may not see the connection between prayer and the blessing which follows; neither could a child see the connection between the seeds that are buried in the naked earth in autumn, and the grain that after a winter of snow waves over the field in a summer’s day; and in truth the exact manner in which the result is brought about is to the profound philosopher, not less than to the child, as much a mystery in the one case as in the other. If he is ignorant of the process by which prayer produces the blessing, so, also, is he ignorant of the process by which the seed produces the plant.

‘But then we may watch the progress of the seed, as the germ is unfolded and becomes a plant, and can say with certainty that the one is the result of the other. The growth is almost sure. But we pray for a thousand things, only a few are received, and we can trace no connection between them and the prayers. Are not the cases, where our requests are not answered, sufficient to show that prayer is unavailing, and that the few instances, which seem a fulfilment of our requests, have in reality no dependence upon them? If prayer be effectual, why does it so often fail?

‘Analogy here does not forsake us. Watch the tree whose light, feathery seeds, uplifted by the winds, are borne hundreds and perhaps thousands of miles, and which in a single year produces enough to plant the forests of a kingdom. Yet that tree is alone, and you nowhere find one which you can say positively is its offspring. There it stands under the eye of heaven, fulfilling its destiny and every year faithful to its Creator, sending forth its myriads of seeds. Some are blighted in the flower, some are mildewed, some fall upon the ocean, some are the food of birds, some are buried in the forest, where they lie for centuries till the old forest is removed and the newly admitted warmth calls them into life, and men wonder at the strange growth; some fall by the way-side, some on cultivated fields, some on deserts, some in distant islands. For every one that becomes a tree, millions on millions are permitted to perish; and in no case can we trace the connection between the new tree and the particular seed that produces it. Now are not the innumerable instances of failure a proof, that the process of reproduction is here unavailing, and that the few plants which seem to grow out of these seeds, have in reality no dependence upon them? If the process be effectual, why does it so often fail?

‘God is so rich in his resources that he may select only the few from the innumerable, and yet his purposes and their wants be answered. Of the seeds only those shall grow which may not interfere with his other designs, and they shall be enough. And of our requests only those shall be immediately granted, which are not inconsistent with the wants and rights of others, and all the complicated purposes of his infinite kingdom. But if we ask in sincerity, they shall be enough. Some of our prayers are blighted by wrong motives, and some are mildewed by an impatient spirit;—some rest on objects which are barren or would do us harm;—some must wait till forests of selfishness, ignorance or sin are removed, and centuries yet to come, may show to us the fulfillment of petitions over which we had mourned as lost. They may not accomplish the particular purposes for which we had intended them; but not one prayer is breathed in vain. As of those countless seeds, though few grow into trees, not one is lost; but some are the food of birds, and some go back to enrich the earth, and some are used for the sick, and all in one way or other answer some purpose, though different from their original design; so of our prayers, not one is lost, but each has and shall have its influence in the great system of God’s providence. We read of golden vials in heaven filled with sweet odors which are the prayers of saints. Rev. v. 8. And we cannot say how many of the prayers which we have regretted as cast upon the winds, shall yet greet us with their fragrance in some new condition of being.

‘But why should we pray? Why has God made this a condition on which we are to receive his favor? He can as well give without our asking. Why should we sow? Why has God made this a condition of the harvest? He can as well produce food without our labor.

‘But as our physical powers are to be strengthened by the necessity of providing for their wants through personal exertion, so our spiritual natures are to be called out and cherished by the sort of exertion which God has ordained for them. By connecting prayer with our daily wants, he has made it one of the great means of sustaining our spiritual lives.

‘But I do not like to argue upon a subject like this. Prayer is an instinct, a spontaneous impulse of the soul, and like all other glowing emotions is chilled and withered under the cold investigation of the intellect. There are feelings which it is not well to analyse too rigidly. It is like applying the dissecting knife to our own hearts, to find out the principle of life, which is extinguished by the touch that may reach it. What would become of the filial affections, if the child instead of rushing to his father, as his feelings prompt, should wait till he is able to analyse his feelings; to answer the metaphysical doubts that ingenious men may put;—to see exactly how his mind may act upon his father’s mind; and how the wishes of a simple child should have any influence upon the mature purposes of a man? There is more wisdom far in the undoubting impulse by which he clings to his parent, trusts to his kindness and knows that he will hear and assist him. Prayer is a spontaneous emotion, a voluntary prompting of the heart. It is the reaching out of the soul towards God, as the young plant reaches out towards the sun; and it is well for us to obey the prompting without being too curious to hear or to answer the objections that may be urged. When once in the simplicity and unthinking confidence of our souls we have felt what it is to pray, we have received that which no arguments can shake. The strength of our own hearts in prayer melt and carry away the objections that before confined us, as the strength of the stream with the first shower of spring breaks up, dissolves and bears away the ice which all winter long has weighed upon its breast, and which no human skill or power could remove.'

Follow ye God.

'BE ye therefore followers of God as dear children.' PAUL.

FOLLOW ye God, the Scripture saith,—but how?
With fearful, throbbing heart and anxious brow?
Follow ye him just like the crouching slave,
Who quails beneath the glance his master gave?

Follow ye God with trembling and with fears?
Follow ye him with sadness and in tears?
Follow ye God—alas! a God of wrath,
Frowning in anger o'er your troubled path?

Nay! 'tis no tyrant threats you with his rod—
No demon bids you tremble at his nod,—
But, in the cheering tones of love I hear,
'Be followers of God as children dear.'

As children follow God! Our hearts rejoice
To hear our Father's well known voice!
Obedient to the call, we joyful come,
Nor wish to wander from our heavenly home.

Scholars training for Teachers.

G. I've heard that Mary Beaumont is a-going to leave our school.

H. I'm sorry for that, as she is one of our best and oldest scholars. But what reason does she give?

G. O she says she is too old.

H. That is a strange reason, for none are too old to learn, and our studies keep pace with the growth of the mind.

G. Yes, for we know some things now, which, a little while since, we could not comprehend, and there are many subjects which we do not now understand.

H. I'm sure there is, for in Smith's Scripture Doctrine Catechism, and in Hudson's Questions, there are subjects that will ever afford us study, and study will bring us profit.

G. There is enough even in the Lord's Prayer, I've heard our minister say, for the greatest mind, to exercise the loftiest faculties, and awaken deeper and stronger affections.

H. And therefore we should be thankful for all aids furnished to us to enable us to read the Bible with understanding and profit; in the Sabbath School such aid is given, and it is singular that Mary does not understand this.

G. Perhaps she does; but she objects to attending school because she is so large and looks so great among the scholars.

H. Well, that is certainly a queer idea! Is the mind to be measured by the body, and are we to decide that because a person is small, they have peculiar reasons for staying at school?

G. O Mary wouldn't say so, for she does not boast of a great mind; but her objection to being in a class is that it looks so!

H. It looks so! Looks how? Very well, I think; for it will show that now that she is able to reason upon these matters and choose for herself, she chooses to get all the wisdom she can while young.

G. Yes; I told her she shouldn't care for looks, so long as she looked well and was seeking good; and as she was always neat in her dress, gentle in her manners, and studious to please in the school, she might always be assured she looked well.

H. That was right; but you might also have told her how many persons are ruined by the foolish pride that can give no other reason for a course they pursue than—'It looks so not to do it!' They will get into debt and into trouble for a dress, simply because it looks so to be out of fashion. I knew a young lady who actually suffered from hunger at a party, after a long and cold walk, simply because it looked so to see people eat heartily.

G. She was to be pitied, as was the poet who never wished to see a lady eat, as there was no poetry in it—it looked so!

H. The case I mentioned is something like Mary's case. She has a good appetite, and if she comes to school, she will be in a party, and there will be good food for her; yet she will not come and eat heartily, simply because it looks so!

G. Yes; but I wanted to tell her how she could fit herself to be a good teacher, as the longer she was in school the more would she understand of its management, the better acquainted would she be with the scholars, and the more knowledge would she get to impart to others.

H. I wish you had; for those who know, say that is the best way to make good teachers,—educated in the school for that office, loving the scholars and being loved by them from long association.

G. I will tell her; for there is something very beautiful in the thought of thus repaying to others the kind offices conferred on us, and using the knowledge taught us for the benefit of the school in which it was obtained.

H. Yes, it is like an elder sister in a family, who relieves her mother of a part of her care over the younger children, and learns something every day in order to be more useful.

G. True; and such are loved and valued in every family, and it is no small treasure to have the love that is fostered towards them. 'None name them but to praise.'

H. To be loved by hearts that value us, is not a matter of small importance, for it is the main-spring of noble efforts for others' good. It should be our rule of life, for it will ever prompt us to seek to be useful—useful wherever we are, or whatever may be the relations we hold in life.

G. So let it be with us in the Sabbath School. There let us aim to gain the affections of all, to understand the benefits of the institution, and how we can now prepare ourselves for future usefulness.

H. I join in the resolve; and for our encouragement let us remember that Jesus once stood a little child in the presence of his disciples as more amiable than they were. May we be loved as well by the Savior.

Arabella Stuart.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

AMONG the many beautiful and touching incidents in the history of woman, and woman's love, the brief and fragmentary records of Arabella Stuart are pre-eminently interesting. And it is not in the musty chronicles of historians, alone, that she has found an immortality. So long as English literature preserves its most exquisite treasure—so long as the sweet lays of Felicia Hemans are familiar to the heart, so long will the royal, the unfortunate, the most intensely affectionate Arabella be tenderly cherished in remembrance. Blessed forever be the sainted name of the 'high souled Felicia,' who has gathered such a glorious beauty around the character of faithful, generous, suffering woman! It was a noble deed in this gifted being to make her genius the altar stone of the female heart, whence hath ascended the incense of its passionate fervor, its deathless tenderness, its elevated and triumphant faith. The immortality that she has bestowed on others will redound with a brighter glory upon her own beloved name; for the mind that can confer this boon on those it serves, must certainly contain its richest elements within itself.

Like many others whose melancholy destinies are recorded on the pages of history, the lady Arabella owed her misfortunes to the royal blood that flowed in her veins. She stood too near a throne for peace; and it was her crime that she dared to love. Fetters can be bound upon the hands, and restraints imposed upon the person; but it is an idle thing to attempt to confine the affections of a warm and loving heart. It was idle, indeed, to deny the exercise of these feelings to the gentle Arabella. She was all formed for love. Her whole nature was swayed by the strength and depth of her attachment. Seymour, too, pleaded for her hand; and what could the interdict of a king avail against the mighty strength of their united hearts?

They were wedded in secret, but their union being early discovered, they were ordered to a separate confinement; this confinement was not, however, so rigorous, nor was their separation so distant as to prevent their secret correspondence. While this continued undiscovered, Arabella could not despond. In one of these letters, the only one yet made public, and perhaps the only one preserved, she writes in this wise; 'Where-soever you be, or in what state soever you are, it sufficeth me that you are mine! Rachel wept and would not be comforted, because her children were no more. And that indeed is the remediless sorrow, and none else! and therefore God bless us from that, and I will hope well of the rest, though I see no apparent hope. But I am sure God's book mentioneth many of his children in as great distress that have done well after, even in this world.'

It was about this time that she addressed several petitions to the king, in one of which she demands to know why she is thus imprisoned. The only answer his majesty deigned to send her, was, that 'she had eaten of the forbidden fruit.' It was not objected that she had married Seymour—it was her crime that she had married at all. She had some advantage above James of Scotland in a claim to the English throne; and if she became the mother of children, the heirs of King James were in danger of losing their crown. This was a sufficient apology for tyranny to work its vengeance. This was reason enough why innocence and holy love should become the victims of royal ambition. Oh King James! where was the memory of thy unfortunate mother? Could not the blood of the beautiful and gentle Mary of Scotland speak aloud to thee in a voice of warning and of entreaty? Alas! thy heart knew little of the pleas of filial tenderness, and as thou wert careless to the love and the sufferings of thy mother, so wert thou careless to the love and the miseries of thy cousin Arabella.

The discovery of the secret correspondence between Arabella and Seymour, was followed by an order from the King for their distant separation. The princess now abandoned herself to all the wildness of despair, and in consequence of the violence of her grief, became too ill to perform the journey. James was sufficiently indulgent to allow her two months in which to recruit her health, after which she made preparations for her departure. 'She now openly declared her resignation to her fate, and showed her obedient willingness, by being even over-careful in little preparations to make easy so long a journey. Such tender grief had won over the hearts of her keepers, who could not but sympathize with a princess, whose love, holy and wedded too, was crossed only by the tyranny of statesmen. But Arabella had not within that tranquillity with which she had lulled her keepers. She and Seymour had concerted a flight, as bold in its plot, and as beautifully wild, as any recorded in romantic story.' So says D'Israeli, who particularly relates the circumstances of this adventure, and its unfortunate termination. As these are undoubtedly familiar to most of our readers, we will not recapitulate them. Suffice it that Seymour escaped, and that the unhappy Arabella was brought back to a final captivity, where 'her constitutional delicacy, her rooted sorrows, and the violence of her feelings, sunk beneath the hopelessness of her situation, and a secret resolution in her mind to refuse the aid of her physicians, and to wear away the faster if she could, the feeble remains of life. * * * What passed in that dreadful imprisonment, cannot perhaps be recovered for authentic history; but enough is known; that her mind grew impaired, that she finally lost her reason, and if the duration of her imprisonment was short, it was only terminated by death.*

Such is a brief review of the more romantic and unhappy portion of the lady Arabella's life. Of her character nothing is certified except that she was warm and constant in her affections, and firm and heroic in her purposes. It is supposed from some remaining evidences, that she excelled in intellectual accomplishments,—that she was a poetess—and that she was beautiful.—Whether these suppositions be true or false, is there not enough in her melancholy destiny to awaken the sympathies of every compassionate heart? Her long and lonely captivity—her separation from the husband of her love—her ignorance of his fate—her doubts of his constancy—the unkindness and injustice of her royal kinsman,—were not these enough to give eternal consecration to her memory? And might she not with reason have exclaimed, in the mournful language of her most eloquent biographer:

'Now never more, oh! never, in the worth
Of its pure cause, let sorrowing love on earth
Trust fondly—never more!—'

* * * * *

'Oh love and freedom! ye are lovely things!
With you the peasant on the hills may dwell,
And by the streams; but I—the blood of kings,
A proud, unmingling river, through my veins
Flows in lone brightness,—and its gifts are chains!
Kings!—I had silent visions of deep bliss,
Leaving their thrones far distant; and for this
I am cast under their triumphal car,
An insect to be crushed. Oh! Heaven's far,— Earth pitiless!'

The Sea.

BY MRS. SARAH BROUGHTON.

THERE'S a majesty and glory in the surrounding sea;
Vast emblem of unbounded power,—type of eternity:
Its lofty rolling organ-peal speaks in a voice sublime,
Of Him who sways its beating pulse, and rings its billowy chime.

How solemnly its thunder-tones swell upward to the sky,
Like the deep anthem-notes around the throne of the Most High;

Where thrill the silvery cadences, from thousand living strings,
And flaming cherubs fan the air with bright, and burnish'd wings.

How glorious in the blushing dawn its crystal mirror smiles,
Like waves of liquid rubies, circling round the green-clad isles;
The foam-wreaths dance to merry chimes along the glistening plain,
And the gorgeous-tinted canopy rings back the inspiring strain.

In wild and thrilling ecstasy our awe-struck spirits bend,
To list the moan of wind and wave within thy caverns blend;
And hear the stirring chorus float on echo's pinions back,
Ere yet the wild sea-minstrel sounds the tempest's fierce attack.

But when across the sleeping wave the storm-king's banners sweep,
And sadly wailing notes arise from out the troubled deep;
How quail the spirit lyre-strings! as the rattling thunders boom!
And livid lightnings trace their path athwart the deepening gloom.

How terrible, the hoary sea! when heaven is black with storm,
When the tempest and wing'd whirlwind meet, its beauty to deform;
When the triumphant billows fling their white foam crests on high,
And the ill-starr'd ship with streamers rent, sweeps like a phantom by.

'Tis fitting for the humbled soul to listen to thy voice,
When the mad demons of the storm in wild career rejoice;
When ruin's fearful angel fiercely flaps his mighty wing,
And wailing thro' the burden'd air the cavern'd echoes ring.

For in the darkest hours of strife our souls must proudly soar,
And on hope's eagle-pinions rise above the tempest's roar;
We oversweep the dazzling blue of the ethereal seas,
And rest on verdant mounds beneath life's ever flowering trees.

'Tis fitting we should hear thy tones of majesty and power,
Lest we deny thy holy name in fortune's prosperous hour;
Lest we forget th' Almighty hand that spann'd the azure arch,
And mark'd the varying orbits where the shining armies march.

The sailor on the toppling mast, when wild winds round him rave,
Lifts up his heart and voice to God who rules the stormy wave;
In meek submission owns the power that guides the reeling earth,
And gave the glorious testament of man's immortal birth.

But when the sunlight gilds his path, when the soft breezes blow,
His soul almost forgets the hand that wreathes the signet-bow—
Checks the fierce coursers of the storm—folds the red lightning's wing—
And bids again the lyre of peace its silvery numbers ring.
Malone, N. Y.

HONESTY is a phrase, which some men use to cover dishonesty; as, such an one is unfortunate, but cannot at present meet his engagements—he is perfectly honest, only favor him a little, for the times are very hard—richer men than he are in like trouble! People must be patient!

THE WIDOW AND HER CHILD.

'A DAUGHTER, beautiful and good,
On the fair brink of womanhood—

* * * * *
What links, which time nor death can part,
Have bound her to a parent's heart!

It was in the month of August 1834, that one of those dreadful hurricanes to which the West Indies are subject, swept with unbounded fury over Barbadoes, carrying death and devastation in its train. Although I received an account of it from several eye witnesses of the sad scene, yet I fear my pen will but feebly describe the horrors of that fearful night. Barbadoes is one of the largest and most important of the islands belonging to England; and it contains ten thousand of the troops, who are stationed in every place where waves the British flag—and it is the head quarters of the lee-ward islands. It is said there is no part of the world more densely inhabited, excepting some parts of China. Barbadoes presents a different appearance from the other islands, being comparatively low and level, yet the land is here and there undulating, and in some places almost hilly. It is extremely fertile, and on approaching it we are struck by the marks of cultivation which it exhibits. There are no fences used, and the successive patches of cane fields and provision grounds, diversified as they are with every hue and shade of green, present a pleasing prospect. The handsome houses of the planters, and the clusters of negro huts, with the buildings used in the manufacture of sugar, appear at short distances over the island, giving it the appearance of a large village interspersed with beautiful gardens. It contains, however, a town (in which there are over thirty thousand inhabitants) which looks like a city. The houses are nearly all built of brick or stone, or wood plastered on the outside. They are generally but two stories high, with flat roofs, and immense window shutters and doors, (which are designed to serve as some protection from hurricanes) and a glazed window is here an uncommon sight. All the streets are very narrow and very crooked. They are formed of white marle, which reflects the burning sun with a brilliancy which is painfully dazzling to the eyes. The buildings are usually occupied as stores below, and dwellings above, with piazzas from the upper story, which form a welcome shade to the side walks below.

Here, hurricanes are generally preceded by certain signs which give notice of their approach, but on the present occasion it was unexpected to all, save to one old sea captain, who late in the evening perceiving that his barometer indicated a storm—hastily put out to sea, and his vessel thus having sufficient room, weathered it out in safety. The day had been as usual at that season—hot, dry, and oppressive, but the setting sun seemed robed in more than ordinary splendor, and his last rays of living gold, lingered long on earth, sea and sky, as if loth to give place to the spirit of the storm, which was so soon to mar the face of that beautiful island, and carry desolation and horror into the hearts of its inhabitants. The brief twilight of tropic climes—soon gave way to the shades of night, and the evening breeze, with its delicious and soft coolness, was wafted from the sea, bathing the tired brow of the slave, as well as that of his luxurious master. The hour of repose came, each retired to his resting place, and nearly all were asleep, when a hollow rumbling sound was heard, resembling the noise of numberless carriages at a distance—nearer and nearer it seemed to come, and then thunder—but such thunder! it seemed as if the clouds of heaven had descended to earth ere they discharged their fury! Peal after peal followed almost without intermission—and then came the rushing of the mighty blast, and the noise of many waters. The waves of the sea were dashed with frightful violence over the land, and the spirits of the deep seemed leagued with those of air, against the earth. The stately mansion of the planter, and the frail cane cottage, were alike scattered, so that scarce a vestige of them remained. Lofty trees, that had for years fastened their strong roots round the rocks of this sea-girt isle, were in an instant wrenched away, and driven to a great distance; and the waving fields of the tall cane were levelled with the earth.—The groans and shrieks of the wounded and dying—the bellowing and bleating of cattle, were now added to the deafening noise produced by the war of the elements, and the scene became dreadful beyond conception! Morning at last came, and the hurricane was over. Three thousand and five hundred were numbered with the dead, and about twice as many were injured, but ultimately recovered. The survivors had a melancholy task to perform in searching for the bodies of the slain, many of whom were buried under the ruins of houses, some crushed by the falling of trees, and a number were drowned by being carried into the sea. As usual the harbor was thronged with vessels from different countries, and most of them with their crews were destroyed. A volume might be filled by the heart-rending details given to me by many whose family circle had thus been broken up, but I will confine my pen to a brief sketch of 'The Widow and her Child.'

Mrs. Vincent had been the wife of a distinguished physician in Barbadoes, but was early in life bereft of her husband, who had fallen a victim to the fever so prevalent during the warmest seasons. She was left with one child, in whom all her hopes of earthly happiness seemed now to centre, for she had no other relative, save her aged mother, who resided with her. Mrs. Vincent mourned her husband deeply and sincerely, but she was a christian, not only in name but in heart; and she had faith given her to say, 'I know O Lord that thy judgments are right, thy will be done.' She was thankful too, that God had yet spared her many blessings; that he had given her that little daughter, (who though so dear before, now became doubly so) and that it was in her power to smooth the last days of her only parent; which task she most faithfully and tenderly performed. She was left also in such comfortable circumstances that she could enjoy the happiness of doing good, which kind and benevolent as she was, became a source of increased pleasure to her. Afflictions, when they are received in a right spirit, have a tendency to soften the heart and affections. And however we may naturally be led to sympathize in the distresses of others, yet we cannot really feel another's wo, until we ourselves have been called to mourn. So thought Mrs. Vincent, when she said, 'I think I have never felt for the poor and the suffering until now—let me hasten to do them all the good I can.' And she was indeed untiring in her efforts to do good, and truly was it said of her, 'The poor rise up and call her blessed.'

Soon after her husband's death, she left her handsome house in the town, and purchased a pretty villa at a part of the island called 'the Crane,' some miles distant, rightly judging that a residence in the country, would most conduce to the health of her child, and assist her in some measure to regain that tranquillity of mind, which the pure free air of heaven, and a constant contemplation, and communion of the soul with the great book of nature, can so well tend to promote in those who are gifted with an eye to see, and an ear to hear what is written in that glorious volume.

The place she had chosen was singularly wild and picturesque. The spot on which the house stood, was an angle jutting out into the sea. The land was here higher than usual, and the shore was formed of immense piles of rock, whose irregular and dark outlines would have preserved a gloomy appearance, were it not for the groups of palm, cocoas, bread-fruit, and other trees, whose waving branches in the rear, gave a soft and pleasant effect to the scene. Here the eye might wander at pleasure over the mighty ocean, until in the vast distance, the heavens and the waters seemed to unite. The view was often agreeably diversified by vessels from many a distant country, bringing its productions in exchange for sugar and spices.

Mrs. Vincent resided here at the time of the hurricane, when her daughter was about fourteen years of age. She had almost wholly devoted herself since her husband's death to the care and education of her child. Jane had been feeble from her birth, and as frequently happens, to great delicacy of constitution, she united more than ordinary talents, which her fond mother delighted to cultivate.

Many excellent parents, who would shrink from the bare idea of overtasking the physical strength of their children, through utter ignorance of its probable consequences, and from the best of motives, are guilty of doing them a great and sometimes irreparable injury, in urging them on in the pursuit of studies, that overcharge the young mind, which thus stimulated, continues for a time to progress at the expense of the body. The too common result of which is, either a premature death, or after a certain period the mental faculties by losing much of their power and tone, seem almost to retrograde, and the precocious youth becomes an adult of scarce ordinary talents.

Few can understand, unless they have experienced it, the deep strong love of a widowed mother for an only child. Mrs. Vincent was tenderly attached to her husband, and when death severed this tie, the affection that seemed divided between the father and the child, seemed now wholly transferred to the latter, who if possible became dearer still for the sake of him who was gone—and no child ever better rewarded a mother's tender care than Jane. She was a very lovely child—lovely in disposition and in appearance;

but her fair and almost translucent skin, her clear, full blue eyes, and the fine texture of her auburn hair, added to her slight and fragile form, indicated a predisposition to pulmonary disease. She was thoughtful and serious beyond her years, and unlike most other young people of her age, she always preferred the society of those older than herself, and when this was once remarked by her mother, who asked her why she did so, she answered, because I can thus learn more. Her mother had early taught her the great truths of religion, which the child received with avidity, and she imbibed an ardent love for the study of the scriptures, to which she daily devoted a large portion of her time. Mrs. Vincent who possessed a well cultivated mind, superintended and assisted her in her other studies so successfully, that at the age of ten, little Jane was thought almost a prodigy; and to use her mother's own words, 'she now became even more than a child to me—she was my companion, friend and comforter—my all'—for soon after her husband's death, she had buried her mother.

Mrs. Vincent and her daughter owed the preservation of their lives during the hurricane, to the devoted attachment of an old slave named Sandy, who had been with Mrs. Vincent from her infancy. A description of their place of refuge may not be uninteresting to the reader, as it forms one of the greatest curiosities in Barbadoes, and is generally visited as such by strangers. It is called 'the horse,' I know not why, as there is certainly nothing appropriate in the name. It is on the sea-shore, which as I have said, is here formed of a high and precipitous ledge of rocks overhanging the sea. 'The horse' consists of several stupendous rocks riven asunder. In one place an immensely large piece (weighing it is said some thousands of tons,) has been separated from the rest, and fallen into the sea; and some other large portions appear also to have been broken off from the main body of solid rock. In the midst of these a long flight of steps has been cut for the purpose of descending to the sea; (I think I counted seventy-five,) and at the bottom of these is a platform, also formed of rock, where one may stand and hear the hoarse waves breaking around him like the roar of heavy thunder. Through the openings here and there, we may see the foam of the ocean mingling with the bright blue waters, and flashing like a myriad of diamonds in the brilliant sunshine. Between the largest rock and the shore, there is a cavern about twelve feet wide and twenty long—the piece which forms one of its sides, leans towards the main body of rock, and meeting it at the top, forms a lofty roof, with an occasional fissure through which the light enters. At the bottom of the cave, is a clear and beautiful bed of water, which communicates with the sea by several apertures under the rocks. This is always calm, and even at the highest tide is not more than five feet deep, and it is used as a bathing place. But it is really an awful spot to a stranger—shut out from a view of the outward world, and the sea without intermission, dashing its mighty waves on every side, with a deafening echo that drowns the human voice.

On my first descent to this spot, I was so awestruck, that uttering an exclamation of surprise and terror, I rushed back, intending never to venture there again—but I afterwards succeeded in overcoming my dread, and frequently took a melancholy pleasure in resorting there—for my heart was heavy—and the wild solemnity of the scene seemed to harmonize better with my feelings, than the blue sky, and the sunny earth, and the cheerful sounds in the homes of men.

From an inscription on a slab which is inserted in a rock in this natural bathing-house, it would seem that it had retained its present appearance for a number of years, the date being 1769.

It was to this spot that Sandy bore his mistress and her child, on the first intimation of the approaching storm. Mrs. Vincent at first hesitated in adopting this as a place of refuge, but the faithful creature overruled her objections, saying, 'do come dear Missus, no place so good, so safe, I see hurricanes before, and they never moved those strong rocks—I know God will take care of us there.' And Sandy was right, God did 'take care of them there,' and they were saved from the fury of the storm. But the agitation and excitement, added to the exposure she had suffered, (for they had remained all night cold and wet in the cave,) were too much for the feeble frame of the child—from that time she drooped away, like a fair young flower. Her fond mother watched the progress of her sure but slow decay, with an almost breaking heart. But now and then her darling would seem to revive, and appear better, and a gleam of hope that she might yet recover, would brighten the sad countenance of her mother—it was however but transient, and she would relapse into her usual wasting and languid state.

She had been ill for some time, during which they had continued daily to read the scriptures, and to pray together, but Mrs. Vincent had carefully avoided alluding to her too well-grounded fears of their separation being at hand. She shrank from the mention of the subject on her own account, as well as from consideration to her child, thinking it would agitate her, and perhaps be only the means of hastening her dissolution. And who that has lost friends, does not know the bitter pain it gives, and the strong effort it requires, to assume a cheerful countenance, and to restrain the gushing tear, when bending over the sick bed of a dear friend—fearing that the expression of the deep feelings that agitate them, would disturb and distress the beloved object of their anxious solicitude.

One day Jane put her arm round her mother's neck, with more than her usual fondness, and said, 'dear mother, I want to talk with you so much about something, but—I am afraid it will distress you, and I cannot bear to see you weep.' 'Well my love,' said her mother, 'I will try and be composed, but you must not say much, you are very weak, and I fear it will bring on your cough.' 'I think it will not hurt me,' continued she, 'and I want to talk to you now, while I can—you know, mother, I have been a long time sick, and I feel that I shall never be any better here, and I know you think so too dearest mother, though you are afraid to let me know it; but since it is God's will that we should part, let us speak of it, I think it will be better. I have thought much of death since I have been laying here, and at first I felt unwilling to go—unwilling to leave you, mother; but I have prayed again and again, that God would reconcile us both to our approaching separation, and give you grace and strength from above, to bear up under it, when I am gone—and I believe he will.' Poor Mrs. Vincent, who was almost overcome by this unexpected and touching speech, replied, 'I thank God, my child, that he has thus been pleased to exercise your mind, and to prepare you for what I so much dread—you are indeed going to a happier world, where sin and sorrow never come—' Where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest.' How much worse would it be to part never to meet again, but we are blessed in the hope—in the assurance of meeting where we shall never more be separated. Your dear father is already there to welcome you, and when my pilgrimage is over I shall rejoice to join you. I bless God that he has so long spared you to be the comfort and solace of my heart, and now that he sees fit to resume his precious gift, I will strive again to say 'his will be done.'

The resignation manifested by Mrs. Vincent was very satisfactory to the child, who would often express her gratitude that it had pleased God that she should die by sickness, rather than have been suddenly called away in the fearful hurricane. Every day they now conversed calmly of death—heaven, and eternity, and it was beautiful to see the cheerful piety of the child, and how she would strive by every means in her power to nerve her mother's mind, in view of her end, which was now rapidly approaching. And it was strange to see that the prospect of death, which nature shrinks from, and which has often made the strong man to quail, should be borne with so much composure by one so young.

There are pleasing, as well as touching reflections connected with the death of the young—who are taken away ere they have been called to mourn the loss of friends—disappointed hopes, and experienced 'the thousand ills that flesh is heir to.' The world to them has been a sunny landscape, decked with flowers—with a bright and cloudless sky; and when we consider, that had a few more years been added to their brief span, how changed would have been the scene, we are tempted to exclaim, 'Mourn for the living, not for the dead.'

I have not much more to say of Jane Vincent, only her faith, patience, and meekness seemed to increase, until at length she fell asleep, to awake no more on earth.

I was at Barbadoes a few years afterwards, when I became acquainted with Mrs. Vincent. She had heard of me as a stranger, laboring under affliction, (which peculiar circumstances rendered doubly trying,) and she sent me a message by a mutual friend, saying, if I 'would not consider the presence of a stranger intrusive, or painful, she would be happy to visit me, for though personally unknown, her heart yearned towards me as a sister in affliction, and she longed to see me.' I need scarcely say that she came—and we mingled our tears—our prayers, and our sympathies—and when we parted, (probably to meet no more on earth,) it seemed as if a tender tie had again been broken.

Records of the Old Year.

MAIDEN.

ANOTHER year of life is gone;
How swiftly have its hours flown!
Then let me now, reflective, cast
A lingering look upon the past.
And what hast thou, old year, to tell?
Do pleasant tales thy records swell—
Have scenes of pleasure met thy sight,
And mirthful hours mocked thy flight—
Or sadder visions dost thou bring,
To close thy reign, old frost-bound king?—

OLD YEAR.

'Alas! fair querist, thou art smiling now,
And there is not a cloud on thy young brow;
But when I began my short-lived race,
There was many a form of airy grace,
And many an eye as bright as thine,
That now has ceased on the earth to shine;
And many a cheek, with as bright a bloom,
That now lies withering in the tomb!

'I've seen the maiden with swelling heart,
From her childhood's home and its joys depart;
From the tender mother, whose loving arm,
Shielded her darling from every harm;
From the father, whose watchful care had been
A talisman, to preserve from sin;
The brothers and sisters, who with her played,
And the home of her youth, so joyous made;
She leaves them all, for a stranger's side,—
Resigns such love, for a love untried!

'I've seen the bride at the altar stand,
And plight the heart, with the willing hand;
And in the freshness and bloom of youth,
Entrust her all to his love and truth;—
I've seen the young mother, with glistening eyes,
Bend o'er the infant, that slumbering lies,
Enfolded in arms, that long to press
It closer still, in a fond caress;
Yet scarcely daring to breathe or stir,
Lest it should waken the slumberer!

'And I have looked on the merry dance,
Where red lips smile, and bright eyes glance;
Where the sylph-like footsteps you scarcely hear,
And the laugh of the jocund meets the ear;
But think not my course has been all so bright,
For scenes of sorrow have marked my flight;—

'And she, on whose bridal, my birth day shone,
To the silent grave in her youth has gone;
She bowed to the stern decree of fate,
Her husband's hearth is desolate!
I've seen the mother compelled to part
With the cherished idol of her heart;
I've seen the strong and the proud laid low,
And happy dwellings filled with wo!

'To night, there's many a circle met
My passing away to celebrate;
But oh! in their mirth let them not forget,
That on some fair brows death's seal may be set!
And that many a voice, which last year gave
Its gladsome greetings, is stilled in the grave!

'My tale is ended—my work is done—
My mission accomplished—my race is run;—
And as the Old Year closed his tale,
His last rustling sigh was borne on the gale,
And from many a group pealed the joyous din,
'The Old Year's out, and the New Year's in!'

A Familiar Letter to a Friend.

MY DEAR MRS. —: I wish I were at Rome, or Florence, or Naples, that I might write to you of skies and sunsets; or within the shadow of St. Marks, at Venice, where the gondoliers sing the lays of Tasso by moonlight; or any where within the possible region of romance and beauty; for then I might draw upon outward sources of interest, and avail myself of your historical and classical acquirements to supply the deficiencies of my description. But alas! the pen of genius has never yet hallowed this humble spot; history has found here no records of ancient glory, and art no crumbling monuments of olden luxury. Never has troubadour harped his lays beside our streams, nor knight at tourney won the prize from the hands of his 'ladye-love.' All is dull, tame prose. There is not even a legend, nor the image of a saint, much less the altar of a Druid, or the tomb of a Capulet, to give interest, or even antiquity to the place. An old grave-stone would have some value—but even that is wanting; and the very fences are new and regular, looking like troops of stupid boys, called out to their first militia training.

In this sad state of affairs, why should I attempt to write to you at all? Pour amuser me, must be the selfish excuse, since I cannot hope to afford you any interest. And yet, I am half-seduced into my old credulity—half-persuaded to believe that whatever interests me, interests those that love me. If this be a foolish faith, it is also a happy one, and the last, I suspect, that I shall find myself ready to relinquish. Human sympathies may be the cheapest, but they are certainly the most valuable of earthly blessings. Do you not think so? Or are you of that school of moralists who have shaken off allegiance to the affections, and rely wholly upon native individual resources for the best boons of human life?

I began my letter with a half-petulant regret at being so far removed from scenes of interest and notoriety. How absurd! As though the mind, itself, could not invest the most barren locality with a degree of romance and beauty. Why cannot we make our own consecrations, and deify our own heroes? The old oak of Dodona was but an oak, after all; and doubtless our own forests furnish hundreds of equal magnificence that might be made to speak in language as instructive, if not as oracular. This superstitious reverence for obsolete divinities is as foolish as it is pedantic; for I fancy half our excessive admiration of classic localities, and antique deities is but the masked display of our erudition. We moderns spend so much time in studying the poetry and mythology of the olden world, that we leave ourselves little opportunity to make a poetry or mythology of our own,—and future generations will seek in vain for little else than allusions and references to the works of those who have gone before us.

The consecrations and apotheoses that we make, must necessarily be of a very different, if not of a far more elevated character than those of classic origin. Our woods, and streams, and fountains, are not presided over by distinct and individual deities, but the spirit of one God pervades and sanctifies them all. We may not resolve our heroes and heroines into gods and goddesses, but we can give them an elevation as immortal beings which even Jupiter Ammon could not attain. And our temples and shrines—does not faith make them beautiful to our eyes, though modelled not with graven pillars, nor adorned with sculptured architraves? Home, though guarded not by the Lares and Penates that presided over the Roman hearth-stones, has the vigilant angels of household love forever hovering around it. And what a deifier is this same love! How many idols it creates for itself, endowing them with more than the ideal loveliness of ancient nymphs and Apollos! Talk not of the deities of Egypt and of Greece, while the deities of our own hearts are with us! Into the Penetralia of our homes, no idols shall enter but the dear objects of domestic love; and may God grant that the worship we bestow on them, be tempered by a superior reverence for his most holy name.

* * * * *

Saturday Morn. Aladdin's lamp could not have wrought a greater miracle than the sleet-storm of last night has wrought upon the faded face of nature. The red rays of the morning sun are reflected from ten thousand icicles, suspended from every twig, and bough, and roof, for miles and miles around, and lying like heaps of scattered jewels upon the glazed surface of the earth, or jutting from the rails of the fences like so many prism-hued chandeliers, lighted by the beams of the rising sun.

A scene like this is made for admiration—not for love. It is warmth, and softness, and simplicity, that steal upon the affections; but it is splendor, and strength, and gorgeous magnificence, that command the homage of the eye and of the mind. I admire the surly grandeur of winter—its brilliant Auroras, its fields of ice and snow, its delicate frost-work, and even its rude and awful storms, that career so proudly through the heavens; but I love the gentle and balmy spring; when the flowers awaken on the bosoms of the hills, and the glad voices of the streams are heard, breaking through the silence of the vales.

Perhaps, as I have nothing of great interest to tell you, the following rhymes suggested by the scene to which I have alluded above, may furnish you a momentary amusement. They are shockingly mediocré, but I am sure you will not be surprised at that, knowing the source from whence they come. I have called them

THE CONQUESTS OF KING FROST.

LIKE the warlike Goth, from the frozen North,
Came down the ravaging King;
And the young flowers died in their autumn pride,
By the beautiful woodland spring.

And the musical rill grew silent and still,
At the sound of the conqueror's tread,
For with giant-like bound he hath shaken the ground,
Like the coming forth of the dead!

In the stricken dell the red leaf fell,
And the nuts from the wind-tost tree;
And the shrubs stood bare in the shivering air,
At the conqueror's fell decree.

Not a sound is heard from the summer bird,
Not a hum from the frugal bee;
The brook is mute with its liquid lute,
And its voice of innocent glee.

But the desolate scene where the scourge hath been,
Suits not with his gorgeous taste;
He hath over-run, like the warlike Hun,
Yet abhorreth the terrible waste.

No longer the trees in the northern breeze
Their desolate branches swing;
There are glittering gems on their giant stems,
Surpassing the glory of Spring.

Not a shrub so small by the lowliest wall,
Not a twig upon ground or tree,
That wears not a prize of more gorgeous dyes
Than the crown of the Papal See.

And the whole vast scene in this glorious sheen
Lies spread to the gaze of the sun;
Oh! a dazzling sight in the eye of light,
Is the work King Frost hath done!

Then hail to the King, to the valiant King
That rules o'er the land and sea!
Let a shout go forth for the King of the North,—
For a valorous King is he!

But with rhyming and other nonsense, my letter is growing long; so in the good old style of other days, I subscribe myself your very humble servant,

A Right Conversion.

THE 'Trumpet' for December 11th and the succeeding 18th, contained a well written and highly interesting account of the mental process by which Br. Edward C. Rogers was led to yield the principles of 'Orthodoxy,' so called, and gradually, thought after thought, to receive the facts of Universalism. I have been very highly gratified with the account, because of the correctness of the course pursued, affording an excellent example to all who would have their hearts 'established with grace'—fully confirmed in the essentials of christianity. We have altogether too many surface Universalists—those who profess to be of us, but who have never given patient and studious attention to clearly discern the principles of our faith and their harmonies and relations; they hear the word, and anon with joy receive it, yet not having root in themselves, they endure for awhile; but when tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the word, by and by they are offended and turn away from us. These do much harm to the cause of truth, by the manner in which they often attempt to discuss Universalism, appearing as much gratified when they have answered, or rather replied to, an opponent with a jest, as with a correct exposition of a fact. The subject is of such solemn interest and immense importance, that it forbids all child's play—all jesting, and demands the most considerate attention of the mind—the full concentration of the intellectual powers and the moral feelings. He that comes to the study of Universalism with this conviction, finds that not a small task is before him; that he has not a matter to discuss which can be despatched in a few hours; but that he must proceed philosophically in order to proceed understandingly. Some, I know, are ready to start with horror when we speak of 'proceeding philosophically' in reference to theology, and a shadowy figure immediately arises before them with a stern and cold aspect. But shadows are not realities; and I have yet to learn that we cannot study philosophically with the warmth of strong and earnest feelings infused into every intellectual faculty. It is thus the devout Astronomer looks upon the stars with a fervent eye that never dreams; and the devoted Naturalist has an earnest spirit and a heart full of poetry, while he seeks for, and stores up, only facts. By proceeding philosophically, I mean precisely what Br.

Rogers tells us he did, and thus he has written :— ‘During the last six months of my studies’ (i. e. his preparatory studies—preparatory to his becoming a preacher) ‘the most of my time was spent in preparing an essay on the grand principle of God’s moral government. In investigating this subject, I took for my premises a number of first truths, or self-evident principles; and without the least suspicion of the conclusions to which I should at last come, I exerted every reasoning energy to get at something which would stand all test, and which I could rely upon as truth, but which I secretly hoped might demonstrate “orthodoxy.” Though I thought, if I only obtained truth—however new it might be, I would “hold it fast.” Indeed I felt myself bound, at the time, to follow Paul’s command, “Prove or examine all things; hold fast that which is good or true.” By following this course, I was unexpectedly led to conclusions, which were entirely new to me; but which, at the time, I thought to be demonstrative evidence of “orthodoxy.”’

Here we see that he took for his premises a number of first truths, or self evident principles, and he followed out the relations of these—the facts which they suggested, or to which they led, and deduced the consequences, or drew his conclusions. This is the right, and the only right method of investigation for the student of a flower, or rolling worlds, or the doctrines of revealed truth. This is God’s highway to knowledge, and happy he who patiently treads it, not hearkening to the ever varying voices of the mystics hid in the trees and caverns on either side.

I shall refer to this principle again in a future number, and therefore rest satisfied with offering as an illustration an extract from an article by Rev. F. W. P. Greenwood of this city. This accomplished scholar is a Unitarian, but it will be seen that he avows his faith in universal restoration with exemplary clearness. He says :

‘We all believe that God is perfectly good, and perfectly wise, and infinitely powerful. Such ideas of the Deity do in themselves contradict the notion of endless misery; and I cannot see how any person can hold them all consistently with each other. If God is perfectly good, if he is the very essence of benevolence and goodness, he must have designed the happiness of all his intelligent creatures—he must have designed to make existence on the whole a blessing to all on whom he has bestowed it. If he is perfectly wise, he must have adopted the best method for securing such a result. If he is infinitely powerful, he must be able to guard against every circumstance which might defeat his purposes, and he must finally and inevitably accomplish them. These deductions appear to me to be drawn directly from the unquestioned premises, and to be as sure and sublime as the holy attributes which furnish them. How can a Being who is goodness itself, form a creature who shall be even liable to everlasting wretchedness, and curse it with a life, which, with the exception of a mere point or two of time on this earth, may be to it an agonizing and intolerable burthen forever? It is impossible. And if he intends the happiness of every creature, and yet that happiness is not at last effected, he must be deficient in wisdom and power; deficient in wisdom to plan the means, and in power to produce the end. Should it be asked, why there is any pain or suffering whatever in the world; why all men are not formed to be always and entirely happy without any liability to sin or misery; the answer is, that the scheme of Providence is evidently progressive, and we are bound to believe it the best which could have been adopted; that we see it followed in many instances by the most beneficial consequences, and should conclude that under the administration of Omniscience this will be its final and invariable result; and that so long as there is a great and ever increasing preponderance of happiness, in the existence of every individual, the gift of existence must be to every one an inestimable blessing. Should it be said, on the other hand, that the very principle that a certain proportion of evil is conducive to the greatest degree of happiness, may demand the eternal misery of some in order to secure the greatest general good—it is answered, that it is impossible to conceive how the infinite misery of the majority is to bring about the greatest sum of felicity; and further, that if the system of Providence does not tend to the ultimate good of all, it is not a perfect or a merciful system; and if there is a single person whose existence is on the whole miserable, the Creator is to that person a partial and malignant Being; for, what is it to him that the rest of creation are happy so long as he can never share their happiness? Happiness cannot be of this transferable nature. That God may be infinitely good, he must be good to every creature whom he has made; and he cannot be good to every creature if he even places one of them in danger of everlasting misery.

From the acknowledged attributes of God, therefore, I draw the conclusion that the doctrine of everlasting punishment must be false.'

I am convinced I should do wrong did I not place confidence in the stability of Br. Rogers, late Baptist preacher in Southington, Ct. He will not be like some others who have looked in upon us and left us; and we pray that he 'may be filled with the knowledge of God's will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding;' and that he with us and we with him, 'may walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work, and increasing in the knowledge of God; strengthened with all might, according to his glorious power, unto all patience and long suffering with joyfulness; giving thanks unto the Father who hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light.' Amen!

I must add here the close of Br. Rogers' record of his theological experience, because of the heartiness and devotional fervor of its language, and the truthfulness of its import. He says:

'I am now a Universalist. And I glory in my faith, and in proclaiming it; though in coming to it I have passed through rather a fiery ordeal, and I hope that the hay, wood and stubble of my former faith are consumed. The fetters and chains, bars and bolts that made my soul a poor, wretched slave, have somewhat vanished. And those thick walls of dubious error, and night, which cut my vision short of the boundless perspective of heavenly truth, and heavenly love, have crumbled away, leaving no obstruction, but the want of INFINITE CAPACITY and INFINITE VISION.

'O! kind reader, if you have not gone out into this great field of the Universe; if you are enclosed within the circumscribed walls of human partialism, just take a peep through some crevice in those walls, or, if you cannot find one, make one. And you will see, as far as you can ken, the language of universal love, universal truth, universal good. Why be trammelled; why enslaved, why circumscribed? O, let thy vision burst forth. Go with thy Father in his love, and in his goodness, and in his salvation, and you will be a Universalist. The reading of his truth will make you more consistent. The reading of his goodness will make you better. The reading of his love will make you more lovely. The reading of his salvation will make you employ his truth, his love, and his goodness in saving sinners from their sins.

'In conclusion, I would simply remark, that the idea which is entertained by some, that Universalism leads those who embrace it, to give up all anxiety about saving sinners from their sins, is a great mistake. I once entertained this opinion myself; but I find it quite different. I never had a more earnest desire to save sinners, since I became a professor of religion, than I now feel. The feeling, it is true, arises from a different source. None of it, I confess, arises from fear and terror, but purely and solely from benevolence. I see that God loves the sinner, and I cannot but love him too. I see that God has thrown around him means for his reformation, and has committed unto christians the ministry of reconciliation; and for one, I feel urged by this spirit of love—of heaven, and of reconciliation, to influence and draw the sinner from his unhallowed course. I would now point him to his heavenly Father's love instead of vindictive wrath, vengeance and frowns. I would tell him that 'God so LOVED the world,' (the sinful creation) that he gave his only begotten Son to die for it.

'No, kind reader, I have not lost all sympathy for the poor degraded sinner. I love him yet; and I love him as I never loved him before. I love him because he is my brother—because we are the children of the same kind, heavenly Parent. Yes, and because we are destined to the same happy home, where shall be no temptation, no sin; and where each will progress according to his capacity in holiness and endless joy. As I believe that the sinner is now lost, lost to present holiness and happiness, I believe it is our present duty to restore him simply to present holiness and happiness. In this I find enough for me to do. Nay, enough for every christian and philanthropist, without imagining, fearing, preaching, and contending about future torment, which it must be acknowledged, never radically saved or reformed one sinner. Love alone can save the sinner from the error of his ways. It is 'the goodness of God that leadeth men to repentance,' or reformation, according to holy writ. Let us all, then, look to this. Let all, who love the sentiment of Universal Grace, feel it in their warm hearts. Let their faith be that which worketh by love and purifieth the heart; which overcometh the world, and which is productive of good fruits.'

The Speeding Bark.

BY MRS. C. W. HUNT.

Go, SPEED thee o'er the glorious sea,
The loyal breeze awaits thy sails to swell;
Morn o'er the waters smiles exultingly,
Farewell, proud bark, farewell!

Go, since thou must, while still the breeze is fair,
While sunshine trembles o'er the festal deep;
Who of the morrow's fitness can declare,
Or stay the wild winds sweep?

Proudly thou movest on thy lone career,
Clearing the billows with thy gallant prow;
Glad ocean smiles thy onward course to cheer,—
Who recks of tempests now?

Who, now that watches thy triumphant flight,
Thy snowy pinions flashing back the day,
Forgets not in the grand, majestic sight,
The perils of thy way?

But with thy fading form the rapture dies;
Again those fearful—sad misgivings start;
No more, perchance, on our glad sight may rise,
All who with thee depart.

Oh, 'tis not death alone which makes us fear
To trust the treasures of the heart to thee;
For God's protecting arm is ever near,
Alike on land and sea.

It is the mournful fear their lot may be
To die in distant lands, unwept, alone;
No voice to soothe the heart's deep agony,
For mother, sisters, home.

Farewell, a long farewell, thou ocean queen!
Oft on our visions, shall thy proud form swell,
Thy glorious streamers oft, as now—be seen,
Revealing—'All is well.'

Thou leav'st no track upon the billows' foam,
The waters part—then mingle as before;
Oh! none the path may find, which thou shalt roam,
To India's coral shore.

Oh! is it not an emblem of the hearts
Which death or destiny on earth has riven?
Oh! shall they not—tho' now a current parts,
Mingle again in Heaven?

Go—we will trust thee 'tho' the deep is strong,
His love, who formed the deep, is stronger still:
Tho' dark presentiments our bosoms throng,
We yield to Heaven our will.

Blendings.

BY MISS. L. M. BARKER.

NATURE has written no law more beautiful in itself, or more beneficent in its operations, than the law of transition. That there should be no sudden contrasts in the coloring of life; that what was, should fade imperceptibly, into what is to be; making the present, no more than the blending of the hues of memory and hope. The day-god throws upon the clouds that curtain his evening exit, whole floods of radiance, to mingle with, and to soften the gloom of approaching night; and he lingers on his return, till Aurora has shaded the grey dawn, through the pale purple, and rose, and saffron, to the bright gold of the sunbeam. Flora appears not at first in her most dazzling beauty; nor does she fail to relieve the rich dyes of the later spring-time, with the delicate tints of the flowret that springs up at the side of the snow-wreath. So fades the greenness of the summer, into the brown, ere it brightens to the yellow; so when the yellow and the crimson, have passed into the russet; there are still some green spots in the valley, some echoings of harvest songs, mingled with the babbling of brooks, and the lowing of the yet unsheltered herds. These are the landscape's sunny places, on which the eye loves to rest, and to such sounds the ear inclines, with more delight than to the note of preparation, that winter is sending at intervals through the woods. It is not that summer is richer in sights and sounds, and we regret that its enchantments, and its melodies, should give place to drearier scenes, and harsher notes. The minstrel of the Scottish Border, spoke the same feeling in remarking upon the sudden appearance of spring. 'I thought the loch should have its blue frozen surface, with the russet about it, instead of an unnatural gaiety of green.' It is ever thus; and not in the visible world alone. Nature shades the season that is departing, into that which approaches, and the heart in like manner, carries forward into the coming future, the lights and shades, of the past. If the yesterday of our existence, went by in darkness, there will be shadows, dimming the brightness of the joys of to-day, and the hopes of to-morrow. And if ever the summer-tide, and the summer song of happiness, have been rudely interrupted, how has the first chilling contrast been tempered by our habit of being blest. The desert lay uncheered before us, but we carried thither the lingering presence of greener scenes, and though the voice of gladness was a remembered thing,

'Its music in our hearts we bore,
Long after it was heard no more,'

even till grief itself had assumed a gentler, and a kindlier tone.

The beauties of life are among its unstudied things. We are impatient of suffering, and we enquire eagerly as to the cause of our pain. We are satisfied to enjoy, and we look not for the secret hand that scatters blessings around our steps. What note have we taken of that simple yet most magical charm, by which we are compelled, with all our thirst for novelty, to blend with the brilliancy of the new, the softness of the familiar; thus giving to each successive view, in the extended landscape of life, its beauty and its repose. We live through endless variety of scene, and perpetual changes of feeling, succeeding each other, always rapidly, and often with the most startling abruptness. Yet it is the poor maniac alone, who breaks off his wildly joyous laugh, with a shriek of despair; and sinks from that, into a happiness apparently so serene, that nothing can disturb it; only to be whirled another instant, into the ungovernable rage, of some fiercer passion. Thought of our ability to resist sudden influences, must indeed awake, when we witness the appalling spectacle of ruined reason. We judge from the frightful disorder of the wreck, how perfect the skill of the mechanism, and how powerful the government of a sane mind. But thought, when thus awakened is too closely allied to wonder, and we lose ourselves in metaphysical mysteries. We are occupied with speculations, upon the mutual control exercised over each other, by our ideas, and sentiments, and passions, and do not perceive that the secret cause of our self-possession, lies almost wholly in the single, healthy, and vigorous action of each. The machinery of mental life has been too skillfully constructed, to lose the action imparted to it, by the moving impulse, as readily as it receives it. Impressions remain upon the vision, and sound lingers upon the ear. Ideas thus elicited, partaking of the same durability dwell upon the mind; and the mood of feeling induced by the thought, though intruded upon, by the results of new impressions, mingles with, and modifies the mood that succeeds. The scene upon which we are gazing, is always lighted up, in part, by reflected rays; and the present note of the strain to which we listen, is blended with the echo of the last.

What profit has not art derived, from this simple operation of nature; for how else has it learned to blend in harmony, such striking contrasts. How have the poets sung their sweetest numbers, inspired by the mingled emotion, of thoughtful cheerfulness, or pleasing melancholy, or chastened joy; and how frequently ought philosophy, and religion, to remind us in their exhortations, to be careful for the influences of the present hour; for the mood of mind which they create, must in some degree, extend to the next, and we know not to how many, successive periods, to torture or to bless.

Would you know, my dear friend, (for I am relieving the contrast to my late enjoyment of your presence, by thinking to you, and fancying your replies.) Would you know wherefore this train of thought? I have been looking from my window, upon a scene sufficiently interesting to concentrate upon itself, for the time, all mental effort; were it not, that much of this interest, is derived from a very vivid recollection of scenes as unlike it, as possible. But this leads to the beginning.

One morning not very long since, I awoke after some weeks absence, in a familiar room, and looked out upon a landscape, which I still admire as I did in childhood. What a change from the massy green of mature summer, in which I left it. The gorgeousness of mid-autumn had faded; the late dim aisles of the green wood were fast losing their look of mysterious seclusion, and 'the muse' was almost ready to —'lead into the leaf strown walks,

And give the season in its latest view.'

The first feeling was, naturally enough, a painful sense of perpetual and irresistible change. The next, a most pleasant satisfaction, that memory is half the conqueror of time; for back from the oblivion into which a few weeks of rambling in other walks had thrown it, came the summer scene, with its life and music, like an interrupted stanza, which the voice of the singer resumes. The dark old woods 'that crown the upland,' the white clover fields, the green pastures, the intervals of yellow grain, now stirred by the passing breeze, now sleeping quietly in the still sunlight, and now crossed by the flitting shadows of the clouds. Or in that beautiful hour, when the sun goes down, and the shadows creep out of the woods, and the birds sing livelier notes from the thickets, and thickets, at last, hide the stream, which keeps up its tuneful babbling, when all other sounds are hushed. There could be no more disquietude in looking at the brown hill-side, and the leafless trees; they were the necessary filling up of what was wanting, in the unreal presence of the past. They were the features that would grow familiar, and become pleasing, and relieve by their lingering charms, the next change in the aspect of nature. I had not known before, how great the influence which departed hours hold over those through which we are now passing. The shorter periods, and slighter changes of common life, had taught the lesson; but not so impressively, as when memory made blank a whole season, to throw over the unpleasing present, the happier imagery of the past; and eye and heart grew satisfied alike. Nor were passages wanting of the inner, and the social life, connected with those summer scenes: passages that may not otherwise than in memory be renewed. The unwonted stillness of the morning hour; no sound breaking rudely upon the half awakened ear. Then the delicious consciousness of release, from cares that had lost the character of 'comforts'; a breathing of the purer atmosphere of freedom and hope. And the echoes of voices; and the forms that are here no more. One there was who walked with a staff, through the fields, and by the side of the streams; or sat in the shade of our sheltering trees. And ever by his side, was the light form of early girlhood, and a face full of love for the dear, silver-haired old man. How we loved when evening had come, to gather around him at the open door, and shape our converse, till we had led him once more into the stirring scenes that were acted during the revolution, upon the banks of his native Hudson. Feeling as we listened, that in his graphic descriptions, lay bright evidence that his young heart had beat high in the struggle with the invader, and witnessing to the truth of his eloquence with our tears. Peace, for his sake, to the far-away home, that shelters his declining years; and distant be the day, when in our land, shall be heard no more the thrilling tales of the fathers of our freedom.

Another season is here. November's rainy days have been all numbered, and the snow is 'falling, falling.' The ice-king has hushed the voice of the streams, the dwellings have no open doors, and the distant road like another unfrequented path, has but 'here and there a traveler.' The landscape is beautifully still, yet is there nothing desolate or chilling in its aspect, for even as I look upon it, my thoughts are in the busy cities whose pavements I walked so lately. I am again upon thronged thoroughfares; visiting scenes beyond my former wanderings, and finding every where the same restless life. I am in the crowd, or rambling in quiet and picturesque places, with companions who make all places the same. I hear again the pleasant greeting, and the kind farewell, of long loved friends; and of strangers whose first tones were 'welcome as if loved for years.'

And thus, when my path shall lead into the busier scenes of life, I shall carry with me the calm of this quiet landscape, and its influence shall be as happy, as is now the memory of social joy. Thus, through all time, shall what has been, be blended with what is now.

'Shade unperceived, so softening into shade.
And all so forming one harmonious whole.'

The Pleasures of Memory and Hope.

BY T. B. READ.

FOND Memory holds to our view a bright mirror
That gives on its surface each pleasure that's gone;
And still as we look we behold them grow clearer,
Till we mix once again amid scenes that have flown.

Oh, Memory, dearest of all earthly treasures,
How sweet are the draughts that we joyously sup,
Though bitter is sometimes mix'd in with our pleasures,
It makes by the contrast the sweeter the cup.

We have parted with friends, aye perhaps a fond mother
Has left this dark world for a brighter above;
But oh, she has left that which time cannot smother,
The dear recollection, a fond mother's love.

How sweet was our youth when we clung to that mother,
And thought her so dear that we never could part—
But one disappointment crowds close on another,
Till griefs overwhelming do deluge the heart.

But Hope, oh the pleasures of Hope, how they lighten
The load of our grief through this dark solitude:
Oh pleasures of Hope, how divinely they brighten
Our path to the world where no ills can intrude.

Prayer—Its Nature.

'TRUE prayer,' says Wayland, 'is the offering up of our desires in entire subjection to the will of God, i. e. desiring that he will do what we ask, if he, in his infinite wisdom and goodness sees that it will be best.' So generally is the fact admitted, that it has almost passed into a proverb, that man is a religious being. There are no feelings of his mind which exercise such a powerful sway over him, as the religious principles of his nature—there is no power capable of making him more happy when rightly directed, or more wretched when it is perverted, than that of which we speak. He looks around him, and he beholds the marks of ruin written upon all the visible works of creation—he sees the beauty of nature fade away—his friends and kindred fall by the resistless arm of death, and he feels that he is a dependant being. There is nothing around him upon which he can rely with confidence, and his feelings and affections, like the tendril of the vine, are constantly reaching out for some object around which they may cling, and lift him above the things of earth. When he finds that power which can sustain him in times of affliction, and when he most sensibly feels his dependance; that Being with whom he can commune and to whom he can flee for help at all times, the sentiment of reverence is kindled in his soul, and he bows in worship. The more sensibly he feels his dependance, the more fervent will be his feelings and the more eloquent will be his devotions. And so deep is this religious principle fixed in the mind, and so powerful are his feelings, that they manifest themselves in outward acts, and where God is unknown, they soon create some object to which he pays homage. In all nations and in all ages of the world, have these feelings been indulged, and manifested themselves in some acts of devotion. In fact, there is no intuitive sentiment, nor any truth which enters and reigns in the mind, but what will work itself out and be seen in external performances. And hence we must look to the silent and secret operations of the mind, for the cause of all the religious worship paid ‘by saint, by savage, and by sage.’ There have been a diversity of objects worshiped, and the forms have been almost infinitely diversified, but however varied in their character, or whatever being they have been designed to honor, they must have originated in the deep feeling of dependance.

The untutored Indian, who fancies that he sees God in the terror of the storm, and hears him in the winds that howl about him, actuated by this feeling offers up his prayer to the Great Spirit upon whom he depends. Far in the depths of the western wilderness, where none but the savage foot hath trod, he kneels by his wigwam door, and communes in his humble way with the divine Being. The child of nature on the farthest corner of the earth feels the same impulse in the soul, and to its influence he yields a willing obedience. He may worship a god that his own hands have made, and the loaded altar may smoke with the most costly sacrifice; but this only shows the strength of his religious nature, and proves him to be more of a religious than a reasoning being.

To the Hebrew nation was given the law of God. The Lord descended in a blaze of glory upon Mount Sinai, a cloud of darkness was under his feet, and he gave the oracles of truth to the pilgrim travelers. And in all the history of that peculiar nation, we find that prayer constituted an important part of their worship. The most solemn of their prayers were those called the eighteen. To these, Ezra Rabbi, Gamaliel added another against the christians. These nineteen prayers were repeated three times in a day by all who were of age, and on Monday, Thursday and Saturday, which were synagogue days, they were offered up with great pomp and solemnity. So exact were they in the performance of this rite, that when the hour of prayer arrived, they left their business, dropped whatever they happened to have in their hands, and commenced praying in the streets or wherever they happened to be. Thus thousands were praying at a time and in the most public manner. The streets of the great city of Jerusalem, thronged with people immersed in business, were all of a sudden filled with worshipers—thus presenting a most singular spectacle to view.

It matters not to what portion of the world we turn our attention, we find the feelings of the soul have wrought out some kind of outward worship. The forms differ according to the character of the being worshiped, and according to the degree of light enjoyed, but the spirit is the same in all. And this is the spirit of prayer. Prayer is the first impulse we feel, the first breathing we utter, and it ceases only with the pulsation of the heart. Prayer is not the solemn form of words uttered at set times and in a given way, but it is the hidden emotion of the soul, a communion with God.

‘Prayer is the soul’s sincere desire,
Unutter’d or express’d;
The motion of a hidden fire,
That glows within the breast.’

Whoever feels this spirit burning in his soul and sends up his thoughts and desires on high, will find a holy joy pervading his whole moral nature. And it matters not whether he be a Jew, a Mahomedan, a Pagan or a Christian, if the heart is prepared for God’s spirit to dwell in it, he will find a sacred pleasure in prayer. When he unburdens his mind and lets his feelings flow out, heaven is kindled within, and every moral faculty seems to be in perfect ecstasy. This is the nature and power of prayer. S. P. L.

Hymn of the Nativity.

BY MRS. C. W. HUNT.

'Twas night; on Bethlehem's plains
The watchful shepherds lay,
Guarding their peaceful flocks,
Lest from the fold they stray;
When lo! the palms and mountains o'er,
A Star arose; 'twas night no more!

With mingled awe and fear,
The shepherds gazed on high;
But hark!—a voice is heard!
God's messenger is nigh;
'Good tidings of great joy I bring,'
A Savior's born! sing! shepherds, sing!

Behold, far in the East,
Yon Star resplendent rise!
A holy guide to Him,
Whose birth it typifies;
This night is born to you a King,
Peace, peace on earth! sing! shepherds, sing!

Not to the monarch's throne,
Or mighty ones of earth,
Was the glad herald sent
With tidings of His birth;
No! Syria's meek and humble swains,
First heard the sweet—the glorious strains.

No lofty minster's height
Echo'd the joyful sound,
No golden censers flung
The fragrant incense round;
But rock, and hills, and heaven's high dome,
Gave back the sound—Messiah's come!

No trumpets rent the air,
No banners floated wide,
No beacon-fires were lit
On hill or mountain side;
Ill would that solemn hour agree
With earth's unhallowed pageantry.

On rolled the Star, nor paused
To dim one holy ray,
Until it reached the spot
Where the Redeemer lay;
There—o'er the infant's lowly bed,
Its purest, steadfast rays were shed.

Oh lovely guiding Star!
Which led to Him who gave
His life to ransom us
From darkness and the grave!
Shine on! a beacon-light of faith,
Of hope and joy, through life and death.

Christian Greatness is Goodness.

'THIS is the season for kind deeds
That make the summer of the heart.'

It is a distinguishing characteristic of christianity, that it makes human greatness and glory to consist in doing good. It is this which stamps it with unimpeachable divinity. It is this which makes it the regulator of ambition, and the director of all emulation. It is this which marks it as the grand agent in the work of social progress. And it is this which we have only to bring home to the mind in order to christianize philosophy, and give to all learning a heart of great spiritual power, that shall animate intelligence with new impulses to promote human happiness.

We cannot fear for christianity while such is the truth; while the essential feature, without which her countenance has no loveliness, has such divine charms to attract the admiration of man's better feelings and the love of his best affections. And it is a fact of great worth to the christian, that theological controversy and scholastic disputation, have not cloven off, or fritted away this prominent feature. Christ, as embodied christianity, is more lovely than the christianity of creeds and systems; and while numerous are the views taken of his religion, all agree in rendering him homage as the one altogether lovely.

It is therefore, a beautiful thing that Jesus is the Truth and the Way—that to know our duty we have only to study him; and to understand his glory, is to have a true test of human greatness. And this glory we have declared to us in a few emphatic and impressive words—impressive as thought and feeling ponder on them—'he went about doing good.'

What a glorious image or reflection of God, was thus given to our world! What a magnificent truth resides in the thought that as Jesus went about, in the sphere assigned him, doing good; so the spirit of Jehovah goeth abroad throughout immensity, rejoicing to do us and our race good! Under the shadow of such a God, the interests of humanity are safe!

Let us apply these ideas to give force and impression to a seasonable exhortation;—'To do good and to communicate forget not; for with such sacrifices, God is well pleased.' To do good, is a duty, a pleasure, and a glory. To feel that good may be done, is well; and so is it to desire to do it; but we honor our nature—the dictations of our social relations, and the calls of the christian religion, only when we put forth effort to do—to act—to accomplish something which will tell and tell eloquently, that we do not rest satisfied with feeling and desire, or with contributing to the treasury of benevolent effort only good intentions and motives. They are good in their place—in their place as springs of effort—as impelling forces—as inward prompters to outward manifestations of proper respect for suffering or betrayed humanity. We should not rest too much on the worth of unproductive good intentions and desires, but remember that doing good is the satisfaction of the christian. To do good is the element of our moral being, and man is honorable according as he makes all else subjective to this. He is the greatest among the disciples, who, according to his means and opportunities, is the most useful. And had this but ever been the ruling idea—the central truth in all souls, giving life, light, and glory, to all thought, what an elevation would our race have arisen to, and what dark pages of history would have been unwritten! And how would the world now be changed, were this working spirit to have free course and be glorified! Almost as suddenly as garden, field, hill, and streamlet, assume new robes of beauty and gladness, when the dark cloud of a summer day passes away, and gives free power to the flooding light, would the aspect of the moral world be changed. We can see it, by taking one department of literature and asking ourselves how much greater would have been the benefit to society—past and present—had the spirit of doing good been the ruling genius there! Or we might take one author, prominent in the literature of a language, and ask the same question. Take Shakspeare—one of the master geniuses of our race, and a stupendous example of triumph over the obstacles which lie in the way of the unpatronised and unaided who seek the heights of eminence. Had his whole being been pervaded by the desire to do good, and all his brilliant powers sanctified to produce good, what an energy he would have sent forth, which he did not, to promote true progress! What different impressions might have been made upon the millions who have read and studied his works, and who have witnessed the representations of his characters upon the stage! We can easily conceive how thus a glory might have been given to his genius, which now it can never have, and we are forced to speak with many qualifications, when we discourse of his greatness. And the moral comes home to each and all—that to do good is our glory; for when its spirit is enthroned in sovereignty within, it will productively engage all the powers in harmony with God, and impel the man to 'walk in love,' even as his Maker walks. To do good is the best way to get good. Our power to do good is the most productive of all treasure, for in doing good there is an engagedness in the use of the means which God has sanctified as productive of purest happiness. There is pleasure in conceiving or proposing a good act; there is pleasure in performing it; and there is pleasure in the memory of its performance.

We should think of these different kinds of pleasure, and weigh them well in the balance of the sanctuary. And consideration will, first, teach us to honor the province of imagination, in calling up the ideal, so that its attractions may compel us to change it to reality—or to work out the beautiful thought-picture. Here sits the meditative. The sound of the fierce wind, or the driving hail, turns his thoughts upon some of the impoverished children of humanity. He can spare somewhat to lessen their woe. He feels that he can, and he ponders upon it. He sees a poor family before him, and seems to be at their door as a spirit-form. He reads the feelings of the struggling mother—the wants of the children, and sees how they shrink from the cold that comes too near and powerful. He sees there what great good may be done by a little treasure, and the change as it comes before him in the same picturing-thought, gladdens him—gratifies his social feelings, and he is filled with pleasurable sensations. Here are the first fruits of the spirit of goodness. But let not imagination's office be restricted to the simple calling up of the pictures, but a persuasive to action; else it will be but day-dreaming, the weeping and rejoicing over a well drawn fiction, the romance of benevolence. Let the somewhat that can be spared, be given—let the feeling produce a good act, and then the real will bless us, as we shall have the consciousness of having promoted the comfort of others. And a pleasant memory will also bless the heart, causing it to rejoice that it did not stifle the prompting 'to do good and to communicate.' And deeds of goodness are the sacrifices of the new dispensation. Christ erected no altar for the bleeding lamb, or smoking offering. No clouds of incense are demanded, and no weary pilgrimages are required. Mercy is more acceptable than sacrifice, and deeds of kindness than incense. And wherever there is an eye melting with compassion, a countenance beaming with pity, a heart glowing with kindness, and hands stretched forth to relieve,—there is a worshiper of God, and with his sacrifices, God is well pleased. To offer the sacrifices of good done and aid communicated, we are all priests—and happy are we if we honor aright our office. If to do good be our duty, best happiness, and glory, what remains for us to dwell on, but the ways and means of doing good? But here opens a vast field, and deep and strong thought must long continue to explore it, ere the whole will be examined. It is not for me to attempt this in this article; but let each one look around him, and he will soon discover, better than I can tell him, where and how he may do good. And as you look around with cautious wisdom, you will see the necessity for associated as well as individual action. For associations of active benevolence I cannot but plead, and will give some reasons.

First, because of the evils of indiscriminate and hasty charity. We all know these evils—how vice, imposture and indolence, have been thereby encouraged. And an association pledged to search out the reality of the cases of applicants for charity, or objects seemingly deserving, to go into the home of poverty, and with the charity give kind council, words which will do good, and cheer not only by outward aid, but by a watchful interest over their moral welfare; such an association must be of great value.

Again, I plead for such, because of the need of associated individuals to seek out retiring distress, for the most deserving are oftentimes those who conceal their wo, and never bring it to human sight. How true have many devoted sisters of charity found this remark! How many have been like her who obeyed a voice that whispered of sickness being in the home where industrious poverty was known to dwell. She entered there—and there met the mother weeping tears for the dead, made most bitter by the thought that she had not wherewith to robe the dead darling for the grave! She had long known of penury—not as we who have known it only by representations and sight, but by bitter experience. Yet strength to labor in a degree and to small profit, and a dear child to comfort her, were spared her! But what were her struggles while that dear one sported around her, in its joyous innocence! She could labor and spare from supplying her own wants, while she had that sunbeam to cheer the darkness of her home! She could thank God that she was happy. The child sickened—and all the mother's time and labor were required by the little invalid. Her little all was soon spent for necessities—she could not ask for aid, but hoped and prayed for the child's recovery, that she might again strive for the scanty rewards of industry. But alas! the child died, and she was poor indeed! Yet in the religion that had sustained her, she could find comfort, were it not that her thoughts were distracted by the wo every mother can sympathize with, that she could not robe her darling neatly for its last repose! If pride it was—it was a mother's pride, the pride of affection—a pride that we must reverence! What a picture doth it present! Look, look in reverently upon the scene! See the dead darling, lying in the calmness of sleep, while the mother bends over it in the agony of grief. Were that thy darling, would it not be a melancholy pleasure to robe it in the little garments you fondly wrought for it, or to fashion for it others? What would be your feelings had you nothing with which to accomplish your wish! In that hour of wo, would not poverty be grievous indeed! would not its iron eat into the soul! Angel of charity, how beautiful thou art, as now I see thee assisting that mother to robe her darling for the grave, and speaking to her of a world where poverty comes not, and where there are no garments for the dead—for the immortals are there. Who would not be heartfelt pleased to think, that it was his contribution that bought that robe and the little coffin for the poor childless mother! Who will not engage with, encourage and strengthen devoted woman in seeking out retiring wo, and comforting the truly necessitous! I plead for these associations, because a little is often made much of in their hands. They transform it into shapes the most fitting and proper, and see to it carefully that it is made as productive of good as possible. And those who give themselves as associates to the work of charity, soon learn to know better what to do and how to do with a little, or with much, than those who have not devoted time, effort, and thought, to look and examine beyond the externals of conditions. They will have more tact—they must be able to make the most productive the bounty of benevolence. I plead for these associations because, if of Universalists, their religion is a pledge to me that the manner of giving, will enhance greatly the value of the bounty they may bear to the poor. And O, my readers, how much does the moral effect of charity bestowed, depend on the manner of bestowment! We know it and feel it every day, in the little acts of kindness which are essential to daily comfort; and how careful should we be in this respect in reference to our charities to the poor! A kind hand should be sought out to give; a pitying eye to look; and a tongue to speak, on which ever rests the law of kindness. And all this should always be found in an association of Universalists, for theirs is the religion of love—of sympathy with the whole race—of trust that there is good in every human heart. And love is ever kind—it should go with them wherever they go; and if it does thus go, it will make them pitiful and sympathizing. I plead for such associations, because I wish to awaken an especial interest for children of the poor, and ours is a peculiar religion to draw the heart out towards childhood. There are some of the poor whom it does seem to do no good to assist, though we cannot tell how much worse in morals they might have been had they not been assisted; and though there may be some who are regarded as those who should be left to struggle alone, yet mercy must, will, and doth plead for their children! How many children are there who might be redeemed from sinks of vice and moral pollution, by charity that could clothe and lead them to school! Many a wretched father has been reclaimed by such charity, and the annals of benevolence contain some noble names, of individuals drawn thus from debasement. There are many whose feelings or sensibilities can be reached in no way so successfully as by kindness to their children. They will resist every other manner of appeal, but by this are won; and hand and hand with the child we are admitted to their affections—can sit down there and reason with them.

And what a blessed work is that of doing good to children! Of clothing them that they may enter the common and Sabbath schools, and be benefited by that intellectual and religious training which will fix in them a resisting force that shall lessen the effects of surrounding evil.

But I must close this article, regretting that its length will not permit me to set forth the great beauty I think I see in the idea of regarding gifts of benevolence as taking the place of the sacrifices under the law, and that with these offerings, GOD is well pleased. Ponder, reader, ponder on the representation, and may strong impulses of charity send you forth to do good. B.

HONOR. Men in business should be very careful of their honor—it sinks the man into the knave, when he breaks his promise of good faith.

From the Trumpet.

Murray's Mission.

BY JOHN G. ADAMS.

DARK was old error's night;
The church had sought repose;
When, as too faintly burned her light,
A trumpet-sound arose!

Distant—it draweth near;
Another—and again
The stirring notes ring loud and clear;
Hear it, ye sons of men!

Hear it, and live,—for joy
Is in the rapturous sound—
And endless life! Your powers employ
To bear the tidings round!

The harbinger of day—
SALVATION'S DAY appears!
Pilgrim—take courage on thy way!
Captive—dismiss thy fears!

A servant of his race,—
MURRAY, the true and free,
Comes to proclaim the reign of grace
O'er man's apostacy;—

Comes to revive the word
Of old to prophets given,
That men, the offspring of one God,
Are, jointly, heirs of heaven.

Glad messenger! his theme
Still burns with glory bright,—
And through long ages, yet shall beam
With an increasing light!

Our hearts its influence feel;
And for its spread we pray;
Till all in tribute gladly kneel,
And its whole law obey;—

Till, in united love,
Our heaven and earth are one,—
And MAN'S COMPLETE REDEMPTION prove
God's power in Christ the Son!

Written for the Repository.

The Essentials to Progress.

UNFORTUNATELY for us, in the present state of human existence, it requires a great portion of our short life to learn how to occupy the remainder. The experience of past ages does us but little good. Instead of availing ourselves of the labors of others, we are obliged to go through, each for ourselves, the laborious process of experiment in the science of human life. When, after years of incessant toil, we arrive, by a circuitous and tedious way, to some desired point, we discover a way to the same point, much more accessible and easy than the one we have traveled, and we regret and wonder that we did not discover it before. Happy is he, who has had the good fortune to learn wisdom from the experience of others, rather than from his own.

If you would acquire an elevated influence and standing in society, you must aim at high attainments. You must fix your standard of moral and intellectual excellence even higher than the actors of the present age have attained. If in your attainments you fall below the spirit of the present age, it will be fatal to your usefulness. If you only come up to the present standard, your consequence and influence will soon be lost amidst the multitudes, who, during the next age, will come on the stage of active life. Your views and attainments must be in advance of the age, or your light will be invisible as that of the moon, or the dim stars, when the sun appears. The education, which answered for your fathers, will by no means answer for you. That which enables the man in the present age, to succeed in acquiring influence and rank, will be found totally deficient for the times in which you are to act. For the confirmation of these positions, we have only to appeal to our own observation. In the department of professional life, many men, who in their youth, were at the head of their profession, have now fallen below mediocrity. Many physicians, who were among the first of the age, have now become old-fashioned, and of but little note. Medical science has been on the advance, great discoveries and improvements have been made. The field has been enlarged. The old physician, although in youth, he received what was then considered a first rate education, finds himself far behind the improvements of modern times. With all the advantages of practical knowledge, he has to step aside, and let the younger members of the profession go by him.

The teacher, who, twenty years ago, was considered a prodigy of learning, and a successful instructor, not having been awake to the changes and improvements in the science of education, finds his day of success and usefulness past. Still more to be deplored is many ministers of the gospel, once distinguished for learning, talents and usefulness. In their youth, their education was sufficient for that generation. Their attainments were in advance of the people. Their discourses were instructive and useful to the men of that age. But great changes have since taken place.

While the simple truths of revelation and the practical doctrines of religion have remained unchanged, rapid advances and improvements have been made in sacred, as well as in general science and literature. The science of benevolence also has been more developed, in its principles and operations within a few years past, than it had been for many ages. These facts teach a great lesson.

How many, after becoming sensible of the defects of their education, have regretted, when it was too late, that they entered the business of active life so soon, so unprepared. The young man, who now enters his profession, without a thorough training and discipline of mind, enlarged and noble views, and an inexhaustible treasure of knowledge, will find himself through life cramped in his movements, and embarrassed in his operations. He who does not in youth exceed the spirit of the age, will find, in after life, that spirit advancing on him, passing him, and leaving him far behind. Instead, therefore, of inquiring what attainments were sufficient for your fathers, or what may answer for you at present, inquire what may be necessary the next half century by the general diffusion of knowledge, and by improvements in the arts, society must advance, and the rank and influence you now possess, can only be retained by constantly aiming at an elevated degree of excellence. Ascending some knoll in your own neighborhood, you must not suppose yourself elevated above every body, but you must keep rising as long as 'hills peep o'er hills and alps on alps arise,' till you mount those towering summits, from whence you may view the world at your feet. Our Book and Memoranda Table.

NOTICES, &c. It sometimes happens that our notices are written hastily, and the proof is read by another who does not, perhaps, feel free to alter the copy where deficient through haste. Hence some blunders which otherwise would probably be altered; but as our subscribers are persons of good sense, we always rest satisfied that such blunders are easily corrected by them in the reading. For instance, in our last, in the second notice, we meant to say—'The offering of a book is a better tribute to mental and moral worth, than a mere personal ornament,' &c.; but the introduction of the definite article the before "mental and moral worth," made the period quite indefinite.

NEW YEAR GIFTS. We are hardly into the new year, and therefore the season of New Year gifts is by no means over. We think we take no prophet's place in saying that there are yet many of our readers who have expected that some of their friends would manifest their friendship and good taste by the gift to them of the Rose of Sharon, and we trust that all of them will not have to yield their hopes to disappointment. It may be, ye expectants, that those to whom ye are looking, know not, or do not venture to decide, that that is the volume desired, and a half-glancing or laughing hint will not be too bold. Try it—if you like; for there is no danger in a lady's asking for a Rose, as the language is so various.

We again commend the work to attention, and hope that its circulation will be speedily increased. The whole edition should be exhausted, that the publisher may be encouraged to issue one for 1843, and the editress be cheered in her labors. To all who desire the elevation or refinement of our denominational literature, this should be a matter of great importance. Give it personal attention. Price, $2, elegant print and binding, with four steel engravings, besides an ornamental frontispiece. A. Tompkins, publisher.

'The Rose of Sharon for 1842. Edited by Miss S. C. Edgarton. On the last New Year we spoke of this souvenir, which had then just blossomed into being, as a flower of peculiar beauty and fragrance—not the beauty of mere external appearance, or the fragrance which exhales and evaporates, but the intrinsic beauty and lasting perfume of pure thought and elevating sentiment. We rejoice now in its second blossoming, and bear witness, also, to its increasing beauty as it has expanded carefully under its gentle fosterage. The editor has been happy in her own efforts towards its sustenance, and peculiarly fortunate in the aid which her literary friends have rendered—so much so that each leaf of the "Rose of Sharon" for the present year, is imprinted with something valuable. We particularly notice, amongst the prose contributions, an article on "The Poet Burns," by A. B. Grosh; "Therida, a Tale of the Northmen;" "The Knitting Society;" "Rosalie," by Miss Edgarton, and "Our Metropolis," by J. G. Adams—the latter a most excellent sketch of the good city of Boston, viewed as the seat of intellect, enterprise, learning and religion—the resting place of the illustrious dead, and the residence of the high-minded and holy living. The poetry is generally good—especially the pieces entitled "Night Duties of the Artist," and "Filial Love," both by the editor.—We take pleasure in recommending this beautiful annual as a suitable present for the New Year, and in the words of its simple dedication, we trust that, "as a lowly minister of spiritual christianity, it will be received with kindness by the young, and with affection by the old; to the former a gentle counsellor, to the latter a simple token of respect, and an earnest desire for their happiness." Even'g Transcript.

'The Rose of Sharon: a Religious Souvenir for 1842. Edited by Miss Sarah C. Edgarton. 12mo. pp. 302. Boston: A. Tompkins. This beautiful annual is, we presume, designed to represent the religious literature of the Universalists, as we notice the names of some of the most distinguished preachers of that denomination of christians among the contributors, besides laymen and ladies attached to the same communion. It is not, however, sectarian in its character, but breathes throughout the spirit of our holy religion, inciting to virtue and virtuous deeds, which will endure when sects and sectarianism are lost in the pure catholicism of "the spirit land." The pieces will, on the whole, compare with those to be found in similar works, and where all are so respectable, it would, perhaps, be invidious to particularize. The pictorial embellishments are vastly superior to those contained in the former volumes of the same annual.—Hunt's Merchants' Magazine.

FOUR OWN AFFAIRS—NEW VOLUME. Four numbers more will complete the tenth volume of this periodical and the sixth of our editorial care; and we wish, in good time, to speak in calm earnestness of the very great importance of exertions on the part of the friends of the work to increase its patronage. We have no intention of groaning, or uttering premonitions of despair. We see no reason for doing either, as our trust is great and our hope fervent. But ere we say more, we wish our own position to be understood, as our exhortations may otherwise be deemed selfish, as perhaps they have been. We have no pecuniary interest in the work, farther than a sum which is not so large as to be very attractive when compared with the anxiety and labor consequent upon our editorial duty. We have no part in the proprietorship of the work, and never expect to have. It is solely the property of A. Tompkins. And so far as we are able to scrutinize our motives and impulses, we feel free to disclaim anything like selfishness in advocating the stronger support of the Repository. We will step aside when a better is pointed out to take charge of the work, who will accept the office; but the work itself we hope will ever find adequate patronage. It cannot be spared from our periodicals. It has done great good. It has won over many a prejudiced heart, and softened down many harsh feelings. It has received commendations where none would expect to hear a Universalist publication approved. This we do not say simply from the testimony of our own experience, but from the generous witnesses of others; and we ask if we are not right in pressing the claims of the Repository for the patronage of Universalists?

We have during the last two or three years lost a large number of subscribers; the great majority of these freely expressed their satisfaction with the work and their hope for its continuance, and that only the necessity of curtailing their expenses made them give up their subscription. We want the places of these supplied with others; and we think we might have our want satisfied by a little extra exertion on the part of those who really desire the Repository sustained and improved. We remember now a good female agent of our work, who never rested till she found some one to take the place of a discontinuing subscriber, though she thought at the first that all took it in the village who probably could be inclined to. Would that we had in every village such an active friend of the work, for had we, prosperity such as we never dreamed of, would dawn upon us. We shall issue a Prospectus for VOLUME ELEVEN early, in the hope that many copies will fall into the hands of zealous friends and return to us with good proof of active and persevering effort in our behalf. And gladly would we receive any suggestions in reference to the work, which our friends may feel inclined to make. We want to impress it—tell us how to do it.

THE CHRISTIAN WORLD. We have received the Prospectus of a new volume of a monthly publication with the above title. We have never seen a copy of the work, and cannot decide in reference to its excellence, or state what to us might appear to be its characteristics. We have met with high commendations of the candor and equity of the editorial management, and a judicious observance of the 'Plan' must make the work one of great interest and value. Published in Philadelphia; T. H. Stockton, editor; eight large quarto pages, covered; embellished with engravings as the patronage will warrant; one copy $1.25; five copies, $5, always in advance. Year commences January 1842.

We should be glad to exchange with the 'Christian World,' and shall be ready at all times to heartily commend any effort to attract attention to the essentials of christianity and incite humanity to the cultivation of the 'unity of the Spirit.'

MURRAY'S CENTENNIAL BIRTH-DAY. Appropriate services were held in the Meeting House of the First Universalist Society in this city, on Friday evening, Dec. 10th. A meeting at home prevented our attendance, which we regretted, as we had no doubt the occasion would be, as it was, one of great interest. We like this social remembrance of times and seasons connected with important personages and events; for while the spiritual law of association holds its sovereignty over our mental being, these commemorative times will be powerful awakeners of the mind and heart, and a spirit will be moving amid the graves of the past, like 'Old Mortality,' re-sculpturing the inscriptions which renew our acquaintance with the buried—perhaps, the forgotten. We read with concentration of mind the events that tell us of God and his providence.

Addresses on the above occasion were made by Brs. Chapin, Sadler, Thos. Whittemore, Cobb, Spear, Adams and Streeter. Dea. Frothingham, one of Murray's friends and one of the faithful, made some remarks, as did also a stranger. The meeting was closed by the hymn, 'Lo! what a glorious sight appears,' sung to the good old tune of Northfield. If the echos of that enthusiastic flow of song rose to heaven, it met a response from one who loved its notes and loved Murray too. A hymn was prepared for the occasion, which we have inserted in the Repository.

In Dover, N. H. the occasion was celebrated, and the credit of suggesting the meeting belongs to the friends there.

LITTLE STORIES FROM THE GERMAN; translated by Mrs. C. M. Sawyer. Mr. Tompkins has collected together in a very neat little book, the useful and brief little stories which were published in the Sabbath School Contributor, from the pen of Mrs. Sawyer, being translations from the German. The volume is a good gift book for young children, each story teaching a useful and important lesson. Pp. 68, with three engravings, price 25 cts.

THE POETRY OF THE SEASONS. This is the volume we have twice spoken of, and it meets our expectations, being a very pleasant book. It takes up the several months, and gives appropriate thoughts for each, awakened by events or associations connected therewith. It will be found quite interesting, and is published in excellent taste. Price 38 cts.

MEMOIR OF MRS. HEMANS. By her sister, Mrs. Hughes. We recommend this as by far the most interesting work, save her own poems, relating to Mrs. Hemans. It is full of the wisest lessons to woman, and exalts our conceptions of the might of the human heart. We cannot read it without melancholy feelings, but the melancholy is not of the world—is not weakening, but purifies the soul for a better appreciation of the gifts of God. The revelations of this volume are necessary to a clear understanding of many of Mrs. Hemans' poems, and these poems become doubly dear and more full of heart-eloquence by these associations. We see the mother beautifully portrayed, and see how a spirit of the loftiest soaring can be true to the minutia of maternal duty. We know of no work more full of matters of intense interest to any one who sympathizes at all with the writings of the poetess of the affections. The work is a duodecimo of 317 pages.

ESSEX COUNTY QUARTERLY CONFERENCE. The next meeting of this body takes place in Danvers, in Br. Austin's church, on the third Wednesday of the present month, Jan. 19th. A very interesting meeting may be expected, and we trust that a large congregation will enjoy and improve the services. Let there be a good representation from all parts of the County.

THE SABBATH SCHOOL ASSOCIATION (composed of the officers and teachers of Sabbath Schools and others interested who choose to meet together for debate, conversation, &c.) had a very pleasant meeting in Medford, Dec. 1. The time was spent in animated discussion, and the meeting adjourned to assemble in Charlestown, the first Wednesday in March. Remember that time, friends of Sabbath Schools in this vicinity.

STAR OF BETHLEHEM—ENLARGED, &c. We learn from the Star of Dec. 18th, that Eliphalet Case, Esq. late Post Master of Lowell, will take the proprietorship of that paper at the close of the first volume, which ends with the year. The paper will be enlarged to a folio size—'more than twice its present size'—at $2 per year, in advance. Those who have subscribed and paid, will receive their papers as heretofore. The present editors—Brs. Thomas and Thayer, will continue as contributors; and Brs. O. A. Skinner and Chapin, are also announced as 'constant writers for its columns.' We hope there will be some meaning to this word constant; as there has been but very little when used in a similar manner by many of our editors, to the shame of those whose names have been thus paraded.

We have no doubt of the excellence of the paper Br. Case will get out. The Star has been conducted with ability, and has proved an interesting visitor to its patrons. We wish Br. Case and his associates, all desirable success.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS. For the benefit of friends at a distance we would state that when a folio sheet weighs an ounce or more, a letter is charged by Post Masters at the rate of fifty cents per ounce. A correspondent in East Randolph sent us lately a letter on a folio sheet of very stout paper, paying the postage of a usual letter, 12½ cts; but at the Boston office it was weighed and marked '1½ ounces, unpaid 50 cents,' which the publisher paid. If the sheet had been of the right kind, weighing less than one ounce, the postage would have been but 12½ cents.—We mention this matter because of the great postage bills we are required to pay.

We are sorry to find that we have so many friends with short memories, for they must have much difficulty in the management of their affairs, and we must still fear that communications long expected will be a long while getting here. We will give the earliest intelligence of their arrival.

We thank Charlotte for the continuation of her favors, and we earnestly hope she will give us more of her natural, lively and very acceptable sketches of scenes and characters.

The beautiful 'Hymn of the Nativity,' will be welcomed by every reader of true poetry, and we give it to our friends with feelings of great delight. We hope for a continuation of our friend's esteemed favors.

The authoress of 'Sketches from Life,' will receive our grateful acknowledgments for her favors, and be assured that they are very welcome. We are gratified that Vermont gives some of her good treasure to the Repository.

We were happy to receive M. A. D.'s communication, though its sad spirit stole in our heart of hearts, and we would have wept away our sister's sorrow, if we could. 'The Sad Festival' will be precious to many, and mourning hearts will ardently desire the writer's trust that they may look up in hope and move steadily on in duty's paths. We trust that one whose writings are so prized as M. A. D.'s, will not let us so long be without hearing from her.

We know of nothing that would yield us greater pleasure than to hear from our much esteemed sister in the faith—Mrs. Julia H. Scott. We lately heard that her health was better than it had been, and we know we should be very thankful to have such evidence as a communication would give us. We always deemed that No. of our work to be peculiarly valuable which went forth with one of her articles amid its variety, for her thoughts were always very precious to us, having a hallowing power to deeply impress the purest truths of life and duty and happiness. She may be assured that hers are the sympathies of many hearts around us here, who would be glad to meet occasion to rejoice with her in the approach of better health, or to mingle their thoughts and feelings with hers. May the balm of our holy religion be abundantly distilled upon her spirit, and her heart be strong in hope and trust in God and Christ.

Will one of the sweetest and most finished writers that ever honored our work with her favors, Mrs. L. J. B. Case, grant us more tributes of her goodness? We meant to have written at length, by post, ere this, but circumstances have prevented, but we hope that nothing will be in the way of her permitting us to hear from her soon. We had the expectation, very fondly cherished, that S. C. E. would succeed with her 'prevailing love' to win what we earnestly ask for. Hope may yet end in sight, and indeed we hear an inward voice saying, 'The vision is yet for an appointed time; though it tarry, wait for it; because it will surely come.'

We hope Julia will continue her always acceptable favors.

'The Sea,' by Mrs. Broughton, will be pronounced an excellent poem by our readers, we are confident. We have some of her favors still in reserve for our readers—both prose and poetry. They will be valued.

'Ione' has a very beautiful poem in this No. We have others to present to our readers. 'Their path shineth after them,' has been very highly spoken of.

Write me, Love, when thou'rt far away.

Andante Amoroſo.

Write to me, love, when thou art far a-way; Write every thought which glanc-es o'er thy mind. Write to me, love, and let thy fond words say,

All that may spir-it un-to spir-it bind. Write to me, love, write to me. Write to me, love, write to me.

Write to me, love, and let each glowing line
Teem with the vows we have so often ta'en;
Write to me, love, when the treasure's mine,
Resume your task, and write to me again;
Write to me, love, write to me!
Write to me, love, write to me!

CHAPTER VIII. PEACE.

'BLESSED are the peace-makers; for they shall be called the children of God.'

WHEN the great Teacher declared, Happy are the peace-makers! he did not touch a responsive chord in the breasts of many amid the multitude he addressed; for in the Jewish heart there was but little admiration of pacific principles. The whole nation anticipated the advent of a Messiah whose grand traits of character were to be—Military valor and successful and glorious conquest. Jesus came not as such, but as 'the Prince of Peace,' preaching 'the gospel of peace,' with the sanction of 'the God of peace,' and prompted in all his labors by the true spirit of a Pacificator, to reconcile man to his God, to his lot in life, to his fellow man, and give that mental peace for which the soul had been pining, though it knew not the true nature of its want. It is what the creation groaneth and travaileth for now; and the new and better existence of the soul commences when the mind and heart are made to know the nature of this restlessness of spirit and how to obtain its perfect cure.

Peace, was an eloquent word when it came from the lips of Christ, being used to denote the blessings of his Gospel. It was a well chosen term, as so far as the principles of his Gospel are obeyed according to their true spirit, peace will ensue—peace to the individual, community, or nation, thus obedient. Peace is the opposite of war; and by the terrific scenery of war, its conflicts, miseries, desolation, and tears, we see how needful and beautiful is its opposite. The one excites the passions to a fierce and vengeful mood, and then unchains them for the work of devastation and ruin; the other soothes and quiets. The one disarranges all the happy relations of quiet industry, and brings disorder amid the social elements; the other gives full and free scope to every branch of activity and laborious effort. The one has no still and solemn hours of preparation to live out the teachings of our religion in the cultivation of the tender charities and sweet sympathies, nor times of noble and generous action to obtain those qualities of character which are essential to true and permanent moral greatness; while the other is favorable to them all, like a benignant queen, smiling upon every thing that can advance her subjects' happiness and progress. Of which, should we be disciples?

We may teach our spirits in the school of prophecy where the glories of the Redeemer are illustrated fully. In the sublime strain which Isaiah (ix. 6, 7,) poured forth with Oriental magnificence, the Messiah is declared as the 'Prince of peace;' and 'of the increase of his government and peace,' he said, 'there shall be no end.' His conquests shall continually multiply, and his kingdom shall swallow up all other kingdoms; but the red brand of vengeance shall not gleam in the night of insecurity to lay waste homes of happiness; nor shall thousands of hearts be opened to bid the vital stream pour forth to write all over a land his name in blood. With the increase of his government, peace increases; and it is this that causes us to ascribe to him the highest moral glory, and to rejoice with the loftiest enthusiasm as we read of his unlimited sway.

But what is Christ's peace? To answer this, is to lay open the duty, the happiness, and the glory of the christian. It is not inactivity, for activity is the element of the disciple; nor is it a retreating from the noise and bustle of the contending world and the clashing interests of men, for the christian is to influence society and breathe out quietness from his own spirit upon the troubled elements. It is not a mere negative, but a positive state, wherein the whole man is active and strong. 'There is,' says an eloquent writer, 'a two fold peace. The first is negative. It is relief from disquiet and corroding care. It is repose after conflict and storms. But there is another and higher peace, to which this is but the prelude, "a peace of God which passeth all understanding," and properly called "the kingdom of heaven within us." This is any thing but negative. It is the highest and most strenuous action of the soul, but an entirely harmonious action, in which all our powers and affections are blended in a beautiful proportion, and sustain and perfect one another.'

The pictures of times of outward war, and outward peace, are strong illustrations of the spiritual. When the clang of arms and noise of war, are heard in our borders, how does everything connected with man's real progress suffer! what a pause is made in the working of the social machinery, and what a free course is given to the vilest and most brutal passions! Vice seems legalized, and every man permitted to prey upon his neighbor. Society is put back by every war, and her best interests demand an age of peace.

And when peace reigns, how different is the aspect of things. Industry finds the best incentives, and all the arts flourish, and the sciences are advanced. Virtue meets with the most aids, and vice the fewer encouragements; the laws increase in strictness and moral power, justice is dispensed with more discrimination, and intellectual culture is everywhere advanced.

It is so with spiritual war and peace. While the heart is a stranger to the true Gospel and leagued with sin, war must reign. From the very nature given us—the requisitions made upon us, war must be the state of such a mind. It is at war with every thing that really contributes to good, and is often sick and wounded from its struggles and conflicts. A soul in sin can have no peace; we glory that it cannot; we rejoice in the proof thus given, that holiness—the true service of God, is man's proper element, and that he can find no rest till he yields himself to the law of life and liberty in Christ Jesus. When he has yielded to that law, he knows what peace is. The passions and affections all busily employ themselves in harmony with each other and aid each other. He knows nothing of stagnation—mere negative peace, but the eye that could scan his whole being—look down into the secret depths and penetrate to the farthest retreats of the timid feelings, would find activity everywhere, and that true christian peace is the farthest possible remove from a stagnation of the streams of most productive life.

We have been out upon the hills of a summer's day, and sat or lain upon the soft grass, enjoying a season of rich sensations. Not a sound disturbed the hush of nature, and a perfect quiet seemed to reign over all things. Yet what activity was there, on every side—above and below. Silently all vegetable nature was progressing—buds and blossoms unfolding, the rich grain starting forth, and the thousand varieties of fruit melting for the taste; the streams were gliding silently along, and the mists rising from them to form the clouds or prepare the nightly dew; and in innumerable ways and forms, a quickening life was abroad, exerting mightiest energies, achieving the most important ends, gathering forces for the future, and yet all accomplished in quietness. And how still is the change of day into evening made—how silently the stars take their places and perform their sentinel watch. How still the wheeling orbs roll in their spheres, and though countless in their number and inconceivably swift in their motions, yet not one sound travels down to our ears, and though we listen never so deeply, all is silent, yet how active.

Such is the peace of the christian. The law of harmony rules over his inward being, and he is most at rest when he is most active. This is the peace that Christ came to give—that follows the establishment of his government, and which shall be shared at last by all. Peace among the passions; peace to religious doubt; and peace in the prospects of eternity. And in what prospect but that of our religion, can the soul find peace? None—none! None other is illumined by love—none other satisfies love—none other draws out the depth of the heart's adoration.

The grand law of activity must be honored and obeyed, or there will be no peace; for when we are permitted the full and free exercise of all our powers, according to the perfect law of liberty, and are active in promoting good, are we not most at peace—with God, ourselves, man, and our lot? How peaceful is heaven—what activity is there! What a lesson do these illustrations speak to us, to be peace-makers—peace promoters!

The Beatitude now opened to our attention, embraces three particulars for our consideration:

The spring of a duty, the performance, and the reward. To be a peace-maker, we must be a lover of peace—true peace; not apathy, indifference, or sluggishness, but a true reverence for right, blended with a deep and fervent love of harmony. He that is indifferent to the Right, cannot be a true lover of peace, for there is no true peace from the throne of God to the lowest depths of his footstool, that is not associated with right—yea, that is not the product of the action of right. To be a peace-maker, does not require the yielding of christian principle; else the precepts of christianity are not consistent and harmonious, and man has no fixed rule of duty; but the attainment of this character, requires us to have our very souls imbued with that desire for harmony and union in the world, which results from a deep and fondly cherished love for the happiness and progress of our race;—a desire that causes us to mourn and weep over those dark records in history that show how man has retarded his progress by war and disunion, that have rolled back the tide of civilization and improvement, and often in one short period made vain all the philanthropic labors of a preceding age. When we ask, What an advance would our race have made thus far, had all been peace-makers? We find the thoughts that rush into the mind too powerful to be cherished, and are forced to tame the soul for a less ambitious flight. Take one age, and imagine the absence of all warlike movements and passions, and how would society advance, how would every principle of goodness gain strength, and what an influence would be exerted on the succeeding age. We might easily imagine the hastening of the millennium, and rejoice in the speedy coming of the angel of the Nativity, once more using his companions' chorus, changed from prophecy to reality—'On earth peace, good will toward men!'

'When God all fears to cease,
Sends down the meek eyed Peace.
She, crowned with olive green, comes softly gliding,
Down through the turning sphere,
—His ready harbinger,—
With turtle wing the stormy cloud dividing,
And waving wide her myrtle wand,
She strikes a universal peace through sea and land.'

Each can do something to advance on this glorious era. The mass is composed of individuals, and each has his influence. Let that influence be in favor of pacific principles, and a change must soon be wrought, grateful to man and approved by the divine Being. Is not such a spirit a blessed one? It is the spirit of the peace-maker that we are to seek—to fix it within us as an ever acting influence upon our passions. Otherwise, though we admire social harmony and order, we shall not do much to promote it; our course will not be consistent, and amid the war of strange elements we also may give to strong feeling the ascendancy, and our conduct be far from becoming a peace-maker. It was because our Master's soul was thoroughly imbued with the spirit of peace, that he was so eminently uniform in his course of life, and obedient to the law of love.

What a reward—what an honor, has he connected with the character of peace-makers—'They shall be called the children of God!' This is an honor not connected with any of the previous beatitudes, and is one that is worthy of the ambition of every soul.—Among the Jews the term child, or children, was used in many ways, not having reference to any natural relation, but to the prominent trait of character. This is not peculiar to the Jews, but is common in our day and with us; for it is frequent for us to speak of a child of honesty, a child of deceit, a child of prudence, a child of folly, and so on through many personifications; and by them all we mean, that the prominent characteristic of the person spoken of is described by the associated term—honest, deceitful, prudent, foolish, or as the case may be. We are all the offspring of God—the creatures of his care and love, and this truth the Apostle Paul shrank not from declaring even to the idolatrous Athenians. But there is a higher sense in which men are the children of God; it is when they have subjected passion, appetite, and desire, to the sovereignty of enlightened conscience, and by the illumination of truth and profound reverence of goodness, are awakened to the worth of their better nature, exalt it to the throne of inward dominion, and make all else, connected with our being, subject unto it. Then do they become characteristically the children of God, for the spiritual is made dominant, and in them is revealed the goodness and love which resurrection grace will give to the souls of all more perfectly, that may be fulfilled the saying, 'children of God, being children of the resurrection.' It is our glory to seek on earth this exaltation of character, to feel here the spirit of Christ's resurrection, that he may be in us the purifying, strengthening, and vivifying hope of glory.

'Blessed are the peace-makers'—here is the character—'for they shall be called the children of God.' Sweet thought! teaching that the glory of our Governor and Deity is his reconciling love—that energy which he puts forth to melt the stubborn heart, and reconcile the world to himself. Nothing less than the reconciliation of the world, is ever in the christian scriptures associated with the final ends of the moral government of God over men—nothing less is proposed as the mediatorial work of Christ—for nothing less did he die, rise again, and ascend to heaven—for nothing less is he our Intercessor beside the throne of the Father! Hence the christian ministry—how little is the thought considered!—is eminently 'the ministry of reconciliation!' because it is summed up in the few words—'God in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself.' No other end were worthy the character ascribed to the Deity in the gospel; a less glorious consummation would imply the imperfection of some attribute of the Divine nature, and make less joyous the song of the hosts of the redeemed. But who will deny this end—the reconciliation of all—being the purpose of God—the design to accomplish which, the Godhead is pledged? Let him answer how otherwise, God can ever be all in all? or his dominion proved perfect?

We see then what is needed to make us the children of God. It is no less than this—To make the purpose of our being—our highest aim, to contribute to the advance of society by promoting peace—by keeping the spirit of reconciliation always warm and active in our breasts, so that distinctly upon our character may be marked—peace-maker. This is a lofty purpose, we know; and we know also that we have a lofty nature, that is too often degraded by passion. We are called to this character, noble as it is. It is a glorious thought that we have within us the capacities and powers that justify such a call being made; and according as we obey it—according as we bring out to, and develope in, its service those capabilities, will be our glory—our excellence of character—our affinity to Christ—our nearness to God.

We thus have laid open to us the spring of duty, how we are to act, and the high honor which is ready as our reward; and if we would know the true happiness of the virtue or disposition enjoined, we should study out, understand, and remember, the wide application of this duty, and how many of life's relations it affects.

Inward Peace, is to be our first effort, for on our success in this department of duty depends our success in all others. By inward peace, we mean the due subjection of the passions, appetites, and desires; the bringing them all under the control of reason enlightened by religion, and having perfect self-command. This can alone be given or secured by the sovereignty of religious principle. No other king upon the throne can keep peace amid the subjects of the inner kingdom and prevent rebellion. Without this, man may as well attempt, like Canute, to stand on the sea shore and bid in-rushing waves roll back, as to expect to keep within bounds his passions. This only will give him rule over his own spirit. With it, he is like the Savior standing amid the sea and bidding successfully its waters to be hushed to repose; but without it, he is like that same sea, exposed to the action of surrounding elements, slumbering now, or in peaceful motion, but anon roused to fury, robbed of its beauty, and fearful to behold.

Domestic Peace, requires our attention. Many homes are far less peaceful than they might be, and consequently far less happy. And why is this? Simply because the value of domestic peace is not enough considered, and each member does not remember how much depends on him or her to promote the desirable object; consequently they are far less cautious what feelings are awakened, what looks are cast upon others, or speeches made, than when abroad; they throw away too much of that commendable restraint which prudence dictates and benevolence commends. Half our troubles arise from absence of consideration; we think too little of the consequences of our conduct; we study too little our own speech, looks, and actions; and peace at home is thus too often sacrificed.

Social Peace, demands also our attention; the peace of neighborhoods and towns. Rumor has too many wings lent her, scandal too many voices, suspicion too many echos, and jealousy too many confidants. Often in social life has Solomon's maxim proved true—'He that winketh with his eye, causeth sorrow.' As slight a thing has kindled a fire that has consumed all the cherished good feelings of years, and made desolate much social joy. Bear ye one another's infirmities, and so fulfil the law of Christ—the law of love.

Religious Peace, requires our consideration. A disregard of this has caused all the persecution and intolerance that has so disgraced the religious world—impeding the cause of truth and holiness, and making man under the banner of religion, the worst foe of his fellow man. It is disregard of this that causes men to break all bonds of christian alliance because of a minor difference of opinion, and forget the great truths of christianity and union in them, in their devotion to some project of outward reform. Mismanagement of differences is the great error. Christian peace and union are too much sacrificed to opinion and self-will, too much forgotten in the pursuit of some favorite scheme, and too much made a minor, rather than a grand object. A neglect of religious peace is what gives life to all ultraism, and in the sense of the wise man, makes a man overmuch righteous and overmuch wise, whose characteristic language is—'I am right and you are wrong!' Religious peace among the disciples of him who made the distinguishing badge of his followers to be—their loving one another, and is too precious a thing to be trifled with. It is the great good, and deserves all the aid we can render to preserve it.

National peace, within and without, should receive our full and free suffrage. He knows not what he does who fans the sparks of internal divisions, sporting with the bonds that bind our land in all its parts as one, and scornfully treats the patriot's fears and warnings. And peace with foreign powers is no less precious. The angel of Peace as she looks from her court on high upon our nation, hopes much; and he who sports with those hopes is false to his nation, christianity, the world, and God. The horrors of war—its miseries, desolation, and blight, increase in exact ratio to the advance of civilization and its accompanying blessings; and according as we exult in the advance of society, we must dread and aim to prevent war. At what times have been the most terrific Volcanic irruptions? They have been, when after a long series of years the base of Vesuvius had become covered with the dwellings of peace and plenty; when during the repose of the monster, industry and the arts had flourished, villages had risen as by magic, and happiness was flowing in upon the inhabitants from successful art and labor. Then awoke the fiend and swept before its breath of smoke and fire the prosperity and joy around. It is so with nations and war. Blessed, then, in all these relations is the peace-maker. May we aim to know it by being thus the children of God.

A Summer Ramble.

'It is not well

To let the spirit brood

Thus darkly o'er the cares that swell

Life's current to a flood.'

THE summer's day was nearly o'er,

And balmy was the air,

But my heart was throbbing wearily,

My soul was faint with care.

I knew it was not well that grief

Should thus my thoughts employ,

So all amid my forest flowers,

I sought the flower of joy.

I crossed the verdant meadow,

And sought the woody dell,

For well I deemed amid its shades

No lingering wo might dwell.

I could not muse in sadness there,

For everything was gay,

Right merrily the tiny rill

Was dancing on its way.

A music voice seemed whispering

'Amid our frolic glee,

It is not meet that mortal one,

Of spirit sad should be.'

I passed the merry haymakers,

And heard their tones of mirth;

It seemed as though the light of joy

Was over all the earth.

Then all along the wayside

I culled the wild-rose fair,

And paused to mark how gracefully

Its blossoms clustered there.

I plucked the much scorned thistle,

Which in my pathway stood,

And welcomed to my rustic wreath

The wild-flower of the wood.

But longest lingered I within

The village of the dead,

So lovingly about each stone

The clinging moss was spread.

And all around each quiet grave,

The mourning yarrow stood,

Keeping its watch above their rest,

The beautiful and good.

And then I thought how wrong it was,

Each little earthly care

Should fill a heart which soon would be

In quiet resting there.

The grave-yard with its gentle tones

Hath had a spell of power,

To school my spirit's darkest moods

From childhood's earliest hour.

It hath a power from worldly cares

The erring heart to win,

And leadeth it to muse upon

Its own calm rest therein.

Unto that peaceful burial place

A care veiled brow I wore,

And mused amid its flower-wreathed graves,

Till I was sad no more.

I sought again my cottage home
No more with brow of care,
But with a spirit nerved once more,
Life's weariness to bear.

Should Love ever Tire?

A SKETCH.

BY MRS. SARAH BROUGHTON.

I WILL not speak of the eagle proud,
Whose flight is above the thunder-cloud,
Who basks amid the burning blaze
Where weaker visions quail to gaze,
And calmly sails o'er the high, blue sea,
Emblem of God's eternity;
Or of the merry lark that springs
From his dewy nest on exulting wings,
And soars to meet the radiant morn
When her orient plumes the East adorn;
Nor yet of the pensive nightingale,
Who pours her plaint to the moon-lit dale,
When pearl-drops dim the flowret's eye,
And radiant star-lamps deck the sky,
And the wild rose weeps by the chiming rill,
As the moonbeams sleep on the distant hill,
And dreamy tones in the air are heard,
As if 'twere by spirit-pinions stirr'd.

But the robin may trill a cheering lay
When he freely sings on the bending spray,
Ere the fowler's fatal snare is sprung,
And the coil o'er his quivering pinions flung;
But when in his prison-bound he grieves,
And sighs for his nest-home 'mid the leaves,
Can he pour his soul in the tide of song,
As when with the breeze he flits along,
And blends his notes with the low-voiced rill,
Or chants in the shade of the leaf-clad hill,
Where Zephyrus breathes o'er the wind-harp's wires,
And seraphs are sweeping invisible lyres.

'So my pretty Cleora, I have caught you in the act of perpetrating rhyme,' said a gay-hearted young girl, as she burst into Mr. Manning's summer house, one pleasant afternoon.

'Indeed you are mistaken, Ella, I was but reading the answer of my friend Laura, to my request that she would write a poem for me before I departed for my brother's.'

'I have heard she possessed talents, but I supposed they must be of a low order, or she must have emerged from her obscurity before this time. By the way, I should think the quiet, spiritless manner in which she bears the conduct of her husband, indicated little force of character.'

'And yet, my dear Ella, you have wholly misapprehended her, as many others have done. She knows the mistaken opinion which people entertain of her, and it is not the least of her troubles.'

'Well, I have thought, and I have often heard it remarked by others as singular, that she never appears downcast, never complains of trouble; and always appears as if she would have you believe she had none. Surely she cannot suppose people are blind to her situation.'

'Of course not, but what good could it do for her to complain? Would it make her trials lighter?'

'Why, I should think so. It would gain her friends and sympathy; and our sorrows are lessened when shared with another. Why, do you know, it is the general opinion that she is none opposed to intemperance; and that is almost the same thing as being addicted to it herself.'

'How prone are all mankind to think evil of others. Could you hear her moan and weep as I have done, when she supposed every one asleep in the house, you would be ashamed of ever having entertained such a sentiment, much more to have uttered it. Could you but once look upon her pale, sad countenance in the morning, after listening to her heart breaking anguish in the dead hours of night; and mark her efforts at appearing cheerful, while you could not but perceive that every nerve was tasked to the utmost, would you not almost despise yourself for thinking ill of so gentle a one? She was united to the one of her choice, and I believe few can understand the depth of her affection. She is blamed for not openly reproving his failings, and joining in the condemnatory remarks that are dealt out so unsparingly to the poor miserable inebriate. Alas! he has strayed from the paths of peace; he has lost his own esteem; he is hurling the brands of ruin and desolation in his path; yet her affection seems destined to outlive it all. She once remarked to me, when I had advanced somewhat similar ideas to those you entertain, that if kind and affectionate treatment would not reclaim the erring, no course upon earth would.* She feels that whatever disgrace he brings upon himself, attaches itself to her likewise; that their fortunes and reputations are alike inseparable. She is crushed and humbled in the dust; she does not even wish to shine as she knows her-

* This is the utterance of the true spirit of love's heroism, and we would that it might live as an everlasting echo in the deepest retreats of the soul. It is the product of unfaltering faith in the moral omnipotence of love—love kindred to His whose mercies never fail, but are new every morning; and the spirit that exercises this faithfulness must have sweet memories and holy assurances, which are never known to the faltering heart. O the glory of woman has shown bright amid love's martyrdoms; and her voice is never so sweet as when her eye is eloquent with affection while she says—'While there is life, there is hope.' Hope on, hope ever! be the motto; and let us be faithful unto death, leaving events with God.
Ed.

self capable of doing, for the voice of praise, and the sweet tones of sympathy cannot bring joy to the heart which has bled so often. When the life-strings are cruelly lacerated in the iron grasp of affliction, they will not vibrate to the cadence of joy. If the one she has chosen from all the world could appreciate her abilities, then the world's praise would be sweet. But while the spell of darkness rests upon his spirit, applause for her would sound in vain.'

'She cannot esteem the gift of poesy very highly, or she would not seek to hide it. She would, if she had strength of mind, and appreciated her talents, endeavor to seek her proper sphere and shine in it. Surely, if she has genius, it is lost, for it benefits no one.'

'I must disagree with you again. I think the pure and holy gift of mental fire that burns with unwavering brightness upon the spirit-shrine, shedding its clear mellow beams upon the darkness of the world without, and the heart within, is not lost, though the trumpet-voice of fame never rings its bewildering shout in the weary ear. Poetry is not the art of writing numbers. It is a holier, purer gift. In woman, it is the fulfillment of her angel-mission upon earth; the beautiful pencilings of truth and love upon the dark, sin-blotted scroll of humanity. It is faith, and hope, and love. Faith, that rests not for a moment amid the gloomy shades of despair, but with tireless pinion is ever bearing the soul upward and onward to the bowers whose verdure cannot fade; that unlocks the frowning portals of the grave, and bids the drooping spirit look beyond the dark abyss to the glorious clime of light, where love shall perform its work of renovation; and the loved ones of earth, redeemed from the thralldom of sin and death, shall shine in the brightness of that excellence, which is mirrored forth in the dreams of our sinless, untutored fancy. Hope, that stands smiling by the grief worn heart, waving her rose-wreathed sceptre, and whispering in syren tones that brighter days will dawn; bidding the soul trust on, trust on a little longer, and the darkness shall clear away, and affection meet its reward. Love too, that weaves the silken fibres of woman's heart around its cherished object, and then bids defiance to all the wrecking storms of fate to undo the twining clasp.'

'For mercy's sake, Cleora, do pause for breath. What a picture you have drawn; surely you do not mean to have me look upon earth for its original! Where could I find it?'

'Even in the one of whom we have been speaking. She whom the world abuses because they do not understand her.'

'But why need she shun society as I am told she does? I should think she would need the sympathy and companionship of kindred spirits, since she is deprived of that of her husband.'

'I cannot pretend to explain the sentiments that govern her conduct. But make the case your own, as far as you can. Suppose a beloved brother, or parent, whose heart was rich in all the noble, kindly sympathies of our nature; whose mind like a finely tuned harp, gave forth the gladdening strains of melody to those whom love had linked in its charmed circle; suppose such an one to become degraded to the lowest depths of self abasement, a miserable, deluded votary at the Moloch's shrine of intemperance; feeling himself lost to love, to honor, and respectability, yet madly plunging onward in his fearful career; bearing upon his bewildered brain the terrible, burning curse, that sears and withers every finer feeling, every nobler capacity, like the Simoom's scorching blast, yet rushing wildly on in his downward path, though soft dove-voices are calling him back, and wooing him to rest in the bowers of love, and taste the healing streams of purity and peace. What would be your feelings in such a case?'

'May heaven, in its mercy shield me from the trial.'

'Amen, my dear Ella, to that. And may we both pray to Him who watcheth over the sparrows, that he will preserve us from such bitter trials as that suffering one is called to endure; or if sorrow must darken our lot, may we be blessed with the humble spirit of resignation, that shall teach us to bear patiently with the infirmities of humanity; ever striving to lead the erring by the silken cords of love and kindly forbearance, back to the peaceful paths from whence they have strayed.'

'Well, Cleora, pray let us walk to the woodlands, that nature's melodies may charm away this depression of spirits that is stealing over me. I really fear I have wronged your friend, but it was unintentional. I took my cue from the opinions of the popular world.'

'A very unsafe criterion by which to abide. Remember, that by judging too charitably of a person, we are in no danger of injuring them; whereas by imbibing unfavorable opinions of others without good foundation, we are liable to do them great injustice.'

'Their angels do always behold the face of my Father.'

BY IONE.

AND are there angel visitants on earth,
Watching thy couch, my child?
Is't true, that beings of celestial birth,
With beauty undefiled,
Forsake the bowers of Paradise, to tread,
With unheard footsteps, round thy sheltered head?

And have they messages from that bright clime—
The land of love and flowers,
To win thee back before the breath of time
Shall blast thy golden hours?
Are their sweet voices never to be heard
In the worn breast by many passions stirred?

Can innocence alone the full-strung lyre
And heavenly harpings hear?
Canst thou be told without a keen desire,
Of streams so bright and clear,
That he who bathes therein forgets the past,
Or, all of sin that o'er it shadows cast?

Bear they the immortal amaranth to thee,*
Lifting its gorgeous head?
See'st thou their crowns, resplendent though they be,
With love unmixed with dread?
My precious child, such questions all are vain!
My path is long to innocence again.

It were not well for mortal man to know—
Hemmed in by weeds of care,—
Now of immortal flowers, once nursed below,
With others scarce less fair!
We, with the eye of faith, must scan the shore,
Which lies beyond the stream we hasten o'er!

Angels depart from thee to seek the throne—
Sublimely awful seat
Of him who sits pre-eminent—alone,
For rapt devotion meet!
Their glittering wings conceal their drooping eyes,—
Dazzled, overwhelmed, with ever new surprise!

Joyful yet solemn trust, to clasp thee still Heir of an endless heaven!—
To feel thy smile my fluttering bosom fill
With bliss so lately given!
Next to an angel thou must surely be,
For do not angels now converse with thee?

Boston, Mass.

* Immortal amaranth, a flower which once
In Paradise, fast by the tree of life
Began to bloom; but soon for man's offence
To heaven removed where first it grew.

Winter Privileges.

MANY of the winter days and hours may be made more productive than those of the more outwardly congenial seasons. Warm and comfortably housed, we can make the season most productive of valuable thought, by reading, conversation, and study. This is the peculiar season for social gatherings—for the communion of mind and heart, whereby the summer of the soul is preserved, as flower after flower blooms under the genial sunshine of love, and the rich fruits of mental culture are brought forth all mellowed to our taste, and voices of sweet melody are heard from the birds of the affections, of mirth and gladness. It may be so with us, that we shall feel promptings to say of Winter with the poet—

'I crown thee king of intimate delights,
Fireside enjoyments, home-born happiness.'

And this last thought suggests one more duty which is, to learn in winter more of the value of home—of the labors and cares and anxieties of those who preside over the comforts of that retreat, to go with us through the year—to make us faithful to home and its inmates when the outer world has more charms to seduce from faithfulness. These are the days for man to learn the worth of woman—of the household affections—and to feel the strong reasons for scrupulous fidelity. These are the days to feel and realize what home is—to fix to the name a sanctity and a power over the heart, that will make us as active in rendering home the better place of earth, as the spirit of the great God is in rendering each season a time of happiness to man. It is indeed true, and we should remember and act upon the truth, that as saith some writer, 'the affections are as charities in the life of man—they master passions, confer dignity on our nature, and take hatred from the heart; they give freshness and vigor to sociality, and guard us and guide us from wandering. They bless us with numberless kind offices, console us in affliction, make joyful in adversity, superadd pleasantness to our pleasures, and throw roses in our path if it is gloomy.'

So let us reflect and feel, and it will be ours to say,—

'O Winter! ruler of the inverted year!
I love thee, all unlovely as thou seem'st,
And dreaded as thou art!'

Sunshine and Storm.

WHEN Solomon said, 'The light is sweet, and it is a pleasant thing for the eyes to behold the sun,' he alluded to the natural love of day and pleasant weather. And we cannot have given very diligent attention to the meaning of his language, if thought has not led us to consider the revelations of our Creator's love by which the light is made sweet and grateful to the sight. A being of goodness could alone have thus constituted man—made the most familiar things contribute to his creature's enjoyment, so that continually they should be surrounded with his eloquent ministers.

I want no better proofs of the Deity's goodness—that he has made man for happiness and that he rejoices over us to do us good, than are afforded me in the adaptations of the outer world to man; and I rejoice in the devotional tendencies of all truths that show the harmony of love in the order of nature.

And is it not a cause for continual gratitude that we are so constituted that the light is sweet? What an amount of enjoyment would be taken from us by reversing this arrangement! No more would the spirits of joy arouse to their merry dance as the light of morning breaks in upon us, calling us to look out on a bright world; but all that is now beautiful in the heavens above, and the earth beneath, would lose its charms; the glory of the ever varying clouds—the gorgeous hues and delicate pencillings of sunrise and sunset—the beautiful flowers, with their infinite combinations of color and tint—the richness of golden and rosy fruit—the sparkle of the waters, the glitter of the dew, the brilliancy of the hoarfrost, the charms of the snow, and the beauty of the dazzling icicles, would be no more, and the poetry of nature extinct! But a God of Love made the world and created man. We feel this every moment of our lives while the presence of light and beauty give elasticity to our spirits, and cause us to exclaim, as we gaze on some part of nature's loveliness, How beautiful! And while this is so, in vain will man try to give the harsher theology of the times entire ascendancy over the heart. The effects of the workings of God's primal laws will prevent the result; and though from gloomy thought, the mind may be tempted to believe in the terrific doctrines of men, yet the cheerful light of day, the vast variety of surrounding loveliness, and the magnificence and solemn beauty of the stars, will shake the deepest feelings with doubt, and the heart will learn then to think better of the great God.

The light is sweet because the darkness hides the beauties of earth and skies—enclosing us, as it were, in a tomb—forbidding us to greet the presence of the dear objects of affection and friendship, and causing us for the time to know what it is to be blind; but the entrance of light changes all, and the world comes forth to our vision as it was first revealed to the heavenly spirits who looked out from their home on high at the morning of creation, and sang together in joy.

But there may be light without the sun being seen, and though it is sweet to even thus greet the light, yet pleasanter to the eyes is the sight of the sun—the dispersing of the dark clouds, that withheld all but glimmerings of light, and the free course of the flooding glory of the fount of light, throwing with kingly munificence welcome riches over an impoverished world.

The wise man would, therefore, have us dwell on the pleasures of the sight of the sun after a storm, that we might foster religious feelings that would quiet murmurings in the seasons of storm, and give us light within that may be reflected out upon the gloom and darkness of those times, so that melancholy and sadness may be kept away from the heart.

This is the season when God giveth snow like wool, and therefore it is the season when heavy and dense clouds must be expected to hide the pleasant sun. We should prepare for these times. The economy of nature will not permit us to expect continuous pleasant weather, and rain and snow must come down from the veiling clouds. And when we see the snow coming down, let us feel to utter the language of the text; and that we may do so, let us meditate on the goodness and wisdom of God in the gift of the snow, so that we may understand how to enjoy ourselves the better in dull and stormy weather.

'I know that my Redeemer liveth.'

'I KNOW that my Redeemer lives!' and when this weary frame
Shall quietly return to earth, from whose embrace it came,
O then with spirit purified, and by his own free grace,
I hope to look undazzled, on my Savior, face to face!

'I know that my Redeemer lives!' and O I long to lie
In the bright sunshine of his smile, the heaven of his eye,
And to drink of that pure fountain, whose living waters burst
From out God's throne, to slake with immortality my thirst.

'I know that my Redeemer lives!' I have a holy trust
That he will raise and renovate my feeble, mouldering dust;
Why should I care, though worms destroy this shroud-like form of mine,
While my soul in robes celestial, before her God may shine!

How Error lessens Truth's Power.

EVERY reader of the Scriptures must have been impressed, in perusing those records, with the importance the sacred writers attach to right knowledge of God and Christ, and the retaining of this knowledge in its own simplicity, uncorrupted by the association of error. True knowledge is the great and grand requisite; it is the mean of conversion, the purifier of the imagination, the refiner of the passions, inspiring the highest reaches of thought, the purest poetry, and the sublimest visions of grandeur and glory. When, therefore, the apostle Paul would sum up in a few words the causes of the sinfulness of man—the rejection of the blessings of a newness of life, he says—they are blinded by the ignorance that is in them. Hence, we see the necessity of the preaching of doctrines, of the thorough sifting of opinions, of strict and fearless investigation, and why the apostle Paul was so strenuous in exhorting his fellow workers unto the kingdom of God to preach sound doctrine.

But every reader will, after due reflection, acknowledge all this. We all feel the importance, the necessity, and worth, of knowledge as referring to Revelation, and none are disposed to lower the estimate of acquaintance with the oracles of truth. Still we think there is one important consideration which does not receive the attention it deserves. We refer to the fact, that cherished errors weaken the legitimate influence of truths that are fostered in the same mind; and hence the simple reason why the generally received truths of revelation do not exert a greater power upon man, is because of the association of some errors that neutralize the legitimate effects of those truths, by preventing their unimpeded operation. This fact in respect to science and literature is readily recognized. We all know that a man may possess many of the principles of a certain science—that he may understand them correctly and thoroughly, and yet be in error concerning other principles of the same science; and these errors will neutralize the amount of aid for progress which the knowledge of the other principles is calculated to afford, because these errors lead to a wrong application of those truths. A man may misunderstand one position or proposition of a speaker or writer in a discourse, and though he understand all the rest, we can easily perceive how the misconception of the one particular may affect the influence or impression of every other part; and we all doubtless have known instances where the simple misunderstanding of a definition of a single word, or term, has made a strong and sound argument appear weak and fallacious. It is so with reference to religious knowledge. The same intellect is to be engaged; the same caution used to guard against misconception of ideas; and the same endeavor to grasp the whole subject, as in any other branch of study. Men do not act upon this rule always, and hence many believe truths in vain—making the power of those truths of none effect by associated errors.

Let us take an illustration of this proposition given in the Epistle to the Corinthians. In the Corinthian church there were many errorists, i. e. those who received the evidences of the christian religion, and believed Christ to be the Messiah of God, but gave such a direction to, or made such an application of, the grandest truth as to make their belief in that vain. This truth was, the resurrection of Jesus from the dead. This they believed. They believed also in a resurrection to man. But they also believed that the resurrection was past to them—that it was but a moral or spiritual resurrection—the newness of life into which the soul was brought by regeneration. They did not look on the resurrection of Christ as a type and pledge of man's resurrection to an immortal and glorious life; but limited their belief to a resurrection in this life from the death of sin. Thus the apostle wrote to Timothy concerning some of these false teachers: 'Who, concerning the truth have erred, saying that the resurrection is past already; and overthrow the faith of some.' Against these errorists the Apostle strenuously contended; and introduces one of his powerful arguments in an emphatic manner, 'Moreover, brethren, I declare unto you the gospel which I preached unto you, which also ye have received, and wherein ye stand; by which also ye are saved, if ye keep in memory what I preached unto you, unless ye have believed in vain.' 1. He asserts that he is about to declare, what he had before preached, viz. 'the Gospel;' 2. What the sum and substance of the gospel is we learn from his declaration—his testimony concerning Christ and the Resurrection; 3. This gospel they had professedly received, in its truths they stood or continued, and its saving power was felt by them, unless they had from other sources received other teachings that made their belief vain—of none effect, compared with its legitimate power. Some had and some had not believed thus in vain. The former were those who received among the truths believed the erroneous doctrine of the resurrection; the latter were those who held fast the truth that the resurrection was future—to an immortal state of purity and bliss. To convince the one, and strengthen the other, the Apostle proceeded to give them an elaborate and fine argument, full of illustrations, exhibiting in the most clear manner, that the true idea of the resurrection as taught by our Lord, was—an exaltation from a weak, corrupt, and mortal state, to one immortal, pure, and of spiritual power. He uses the similitude of the seed—declaring the truth, that the vegetative germ is not quickened so that a new manifestation of its life is made, except it die, or be literally decomposed; implying, that death must take place to the mortal body of man before the spirit can be clothed upon with the heavenly body. This settled, he proceeds to show the essential difference between the present and future existence; that here man is in corruption, dishonor, weakness, and possessed of an animal body, that there he shall be in incorruption, glory, power, and possessed of a spiritual body; and from these premises he draws the evident conclusion—that as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly, and that as sure as there is a natural, animal, perishable body, so there is a spiritual, imperishable body. This is the true doctrine of the Resurrection; and according as men depart from it, they believe in vain the resurrection of the dead.

We do not assert that all erroneous conceptions of the resurrection are worse than no belief in a future life; but that according as men err from the true idea, they must be deprived of the joy, elevation of thought and feeling, consequent on a belief disconnected from the neutralizing errors they associate with their belief in the fact or reality of a resurrection; the power of their faith is comparatively vain—is but weakness in contrast with the strength of truth.

What an application has our subject to prevalent opinions or doctrines. To believe that this life is a miniature of the future—that as we leave this life we enter upon the next—that the future is but a continuation of this existence, is a belief far better than none; is grateful to the soul compared with the idea of annihilation, but it is vanity compared with the glory of the true doctrine. We see the worm clinging to the earth, crawling amid the dust, an abject thing; again we see it enfranchised from its prison house, soaring a beautiful and sportive thing in the free air and sunshine of heaven. Better is it—O infinitely better—to trace in that spectacle a type of man's destiny, than to fear lest he be an everlasting worm crawling amid corruption, or have a half-hope that he will be part earth and part heaven, as we see him in his better state here. There is an elevation of thought and feeling in the clear and distinct vision of the resurrection as preached by Jesus and his Apostles, that can never be reached by any other ideas of the future existence. There is a grandeur, a joy, a sublimity, in the redemption from slavery of a whole nation that cannot be felt in view of the liberation of a part, or a half liberation of the whole; for the one draws out into stronger and more full exercise our best feelings and affections and sympathies as the others cannot. Divine truth is more powerful than human speculations or philosophy. Alone—in its naked grandeur—its majesty is best seen and felt. Man cannot improve it—it is unalterable because divine; and our soul's desire and prayer to God should be for an intimate, full, and every way correct knowledge, unassociated with errors that make void the legitimate power or influence of true knowledge.

The idea, thus illustrated, we hope is felt by the reader to be important; and according as its importance is felt we shall be ready to acknowledge, that to have the fullness of joy and peace in believing christianity, we must believe it aright—we must have correct knowledge of all its elements and their unity. Small errors may lead to great evil results, and may make our belief in great truths vain—weaken their power, and deprive us of the satisfaction they yield to others.

Perhaps as forcible an illustration may be drawn from one view of the Trinity which we shall mention, as can be presented; though in every view of the Trinity there can be discerned the operation of the neutralizing effect of error upon truth. It sufficeth for the present to consider the example and human nature of Christ. Nothing can be clearer than the declared truth—that Jesus was tempted in all points like as we are, implying that he was subject to the common infirmities of our nature and knew our weaknesses. Feeling this truth—doubting it not—what a power is there to us in his example! We think of what he was exposed to—what he had to contend with, and his triumph assumes a moral grandeur the most sublime. We see revealed man's spiritual powers and capacities, and a voice thrills in the ear of the soul bidding us like him to be victors. But how must this effect be weakened when the mind looks on him as the very God—not a perfect man—not a true representative of humanity! The weakness, the infirmities, with which he was clothed were only apparently such—his temptations could only have been trials in appearance, for God cannot be tempted. The example of Jesus thus becomes as a beautiful exhibition of divine virtues and graces, not as the experience of a true man—a man with the trials of our common nature to contend with. The practicableness of his example is doubted as it cannot be by him who believes in the perfect human nature of Christ—his strict unity. Thus does the error of the Trinity affect and neutralize the power of the truth of the proper humanity of Jesus. So also the error of the Trinity affects the power of the truth of Christ's death and resurrection; it produces confusion in the mind when it would offer proper worship; it makes the Son more lovely than the Father.

Let us then be impressed with the importance of clinging to the simplicity which is in Christ, and guarding against the intrusion of all speculations, conjectures, and errors, that make void the truth by undermining it, remembering how the Pharisees in our Savior's time made void the law by their traditions, lest we believe in vain.

One other way there is of believing vain, and to show this we need to do scarcely more than to quote the Apostle's words,—‘Holding faith and a good conscience; which some having put away, concerning faith have made shipwreck’—as does the mariner when he loses his compass, or pays no attention to it. A good conscience feels and applies belief.

Are we slumbering Now?

BY MISS M. A. DODD.

‘THE night is far spent, the day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armor of light.’ Rom. xiii. 12.

ARE we slumbering now when a watch we should keep? Let us banish the spell and awake from our sleep! On the watch-towers of Zion the trumpet we hear, ‘It is time to rejoice, for salvation is near.’

Yes, the night is far spent and the day is at hand;
Free from terror and gloom in the brightness we stand;
The gray mist away from our pathway has rolled,
And the beams of the morning around we behold.

Let us leave the soft couch at this earliest hour,
While the dew is yet fresh on each leaflet and flower;
Let us put off the garments of sin from our sight,
And go forth to the day clothed in armor of light.

The film is removed which has darkened our eyes,
That truth like the sun on our vision may rise,
And the chains from the mind are fast falling away,
As the mist is dispersed by the dawning of day.

In the sunlight of hope unmolested we stand,
With plenty and health smiling over our land:
Here no tyrant can take what was given by God,
And no priest holds a key to interpret His word.

Thy promises Father, are given to all;
O, how sweet from the lips of the Savior they fall;
And no craft or device can the record efface,
For man may not measure or limit thy grace.

On our green sunny hills the white cottage is seen,
And the spire rises up in the valleys between:
From the church in the vale prayer and praises are heard,
And the cottager sings of the goodness of God.

From the lowly, fair science is hidden no more,
For the hard hands of labor are opening her store,
And the poor, with the wealthy and great, may unfold
The treasures of knowledge more precious than gold.

In the streets of the city fair virtue is seen;
How spotless her robes and how heavenly her mien!
With her ranks filling fast she moves on in the light,
While vice shrouds her form in the darkness of night.

Strong manhood comes forth, and, forsaking the bowl,
From the spirit of evil redeemeth his soul;
For the board and the feast are with temperance crowned,
And pure water is drank where the wine-cup went round.

O, glad should our hearts be, while thus going on
All around us we see the great work of reform;
We may surely rejoice when the servants of sin,
To the kingdom of virtue and peace enter in.

To the Father should praise and thanksgiving arise,
When a morning so glorious blesses our eyes:
May he grant that the sunlight so bright in its dawn,
Go not out ere the noonday in darkness and storm.

Let us watch and be sober as onward we move;
Let us put on the breastplate of faith, and of love;
From the sword of the Spirit the wicked will flee;
And the hope of salvation our helmet shall be.

With hearts firm and true we will walk in the day;
For the night and the darkness are passing away;
And strong in the Lord and the power of his might,
We will fearless go forth in our own armor of light.

Attractions of Heaven.

BY REV. W. H. GRISWOLD.

MAN, at best, is here but a pilgrim, journeying to a better land. He sojourns here as a stranger desiring a better country,—that is a heavenly. Earth has few attractions, at best, and especially to one schooled in adversity's severest trials. Such an one, if he be a christian, becomes weaned from earth, in a measure, and nothing seems to promise rest but heaven. As earth loses its attractions, heaven becomes more attractive and inviting; hence he loses sight of earth in his contemplation of heaven; and lives looking for a city which hath foundations, whose maker and builder is God.

I have been drawn into this train of reflection by the following incident: During the past week, a ministering brother called on me and spent the night with me. I had never seen him before, nevertheless, I was not wholly ignorant of his personal history. I knew him to be one of adversity's sons; and I soon learned that he was then in a very feeble state of health. I had heard much of his goodness of heart, and of his deep religious feelings; and I knew that he was an earnest spirit, and had a mind gifted with heavenly wisdom. I was therefore deeply interested in his welfare.

The evening having passed, I left him to his meditations for the night. He arose early in the morning and departed; after which, on entering the room where I had left him for the night, I found lying upon the table the following imperfect notes* headed

'ATTRactions OF HEAVEN.'

'1st. Not say where, but what it is.

Place of freedom.

What it is not.

No night, no darkness, no dreariness:

No moral night—No ignorance—no error—no misery—no sin.

No more death:

No sorrowing—Mother! thy child is in heaven. Our Father is there—Jesus—angels. We have not seen God.'

'Attractions of heaven!' Beautiful theme this, thought I, for evening meditation:—and for a son of adversity too. Verily, thou must be a partaker of that faith which caused one of old to feel that here he had no continuing, abiding place; that he was but a pilgrim bound for a better land: and to look for a city having foundations, whose maker and builder is God. Verily, thou dost possess his spirit, or art moved by the same spirit by which he was moved; governed by the same rules by which he was governed; and dost mind the same things that he minded.

* NOTE. I give them in their imperfect state, without any alteration. They were probably never intended for the light; and I hope my brother will pardon me for the liberty I have taken, should this ever meet his eye.

But let us follow this earnest spirit in his meditations upon this beautiful theme. And while we do so, let us not forget the personal history of him who selected such a theme for his evening meditations.

In the first place, then, we are not to inquire where, but what Heaven is. And what matter is it to us where heaven is? None at all. It is a subject that we need not inquire into,—one that cannot interest us; and one that cannot be discussed to any profit. Passing over this, then, as a matter that does not concern us, let us inquire into one more vital; not where but what heaven is. 'It is a place of Freedom,' says the gifted spirit, by whom we are being led. A place of freedom;—of intellectual, moral and religious freedom. Nor is this all, for it is a place of progress;—of intellectual, moral and religious progress. It is a place where spirits roam 'free as air;' where they travel on and on, but never turn back: a place where souls experience and uninterruptedly enjoy the blessings of universal peace; of universal freedom; of universal emancipation.

Again: We are not only to inquire what it is, but we are also to note what it is not. And we need not go far in search of an answer to this inquiry; it is even nigh at hand. Heaven is not a place of bondage. This idea, indeed, has already been indirectly stated, and grows out of the former answer. If heaven is a place of freedom, of course it cannot be a place of slavery;—of bondage of any kind. No bonds are there; no chaining down of the free-born mind; no groaning in thralldom. No: the distinction bond and free, will not there exist, for all will be free. No baron and serf distinctions shall be there; no master and slave; no rich and poor. No intellectual bondage shall be there; and no religious oppression. Every soul will there be soaring upward and onward; will be travelling on in its everlasting and unending career of knowledge and virtue.

But there are yet other items to be noticed. There is no night, no darkness, and no dreariness there. And what has night to charm us? What attraction hath darkness? And is dreariness inviting to the soul? If, then, no night is there, because day and night do not alternate in the better country; if no darkness is there, because the sun of that world does not go down; and if no dreariness is there, because the seasons never change and the elements never war, has heaven less attractions on this account? Nay, it has not.

But if night is not there; if darkness enters not that land of light, then no dreariness can be there. There is in that better land, none of the dreariness that is now overshadowing surrounding nature. The cold rains, the bleak winds, the dark gloom and the melancholy moan of autumn, are not there. The faded leaf, the withered flower, and the blighted bud, are not there. Eternal spring there reigns; eternal youth there blooms; and an unfading life mantles that world. And if there is night there, there is no moral night,—no ignorance, no error, no misery and no sin. No moral night,—no moral darkness; because the glory of God will there reign, and life, light and love will be above and around. God will be in the midst of that world, and it will blaze with glory. The heathen mind will there be lighted up; it will have come out of its prison of darkness, and beholding the mighty world spread out before it, its march will henceforth be on, on in a never ending progress. Nor is there any ignorance there. No ignorance of God, for they see God there. No ignorance of themselves, for there they know themselves; know their capacities for eternal progress; and know the import of those deep yearnings after a holier and higher being than here is given. That is a world of knowledge, not of ignorance. No ignorance is in that world. Nor is there any error. Error leads men astray; men are not led astray in heaven. Error is the offspring of ignorance and moral night; and there is no ignorance nor moral night in that land of light and knowledge. Truth reigns in heaven. She is sometimes 'crushed' here, but she is never crushed there; she is often despised here, but she is never despised there; she is sometimes neglected here, but she is never neglected there. So error is often honored and highly esteemed on earth; but she can never enter heaven; and if she could, there are none there to do her homage. Nor is there any misery in heaven. O there is misery in the earth. Many a heart is wrung, and crushed even, by the cruelty of a false hearted friend. Many an earnest spirit has been made to bleed by the heartless ingratitude of an unstable and an ungodly brother. None there are but that have suffered; none there are but can bear testimony to the truth, there is misery in the earth. But there is no misery in heaven; no crushed hopes, nor bleeding bosoms there. All is happiness. Neither is there any sin in heaven. Here there is sin. Falsehood here stalks abroad and disturbs the peace of families. Slander, foul slander keeps whole neighborhoods in a constant jar and broil. Deceit, deceit is stamped in living characters upon many a brow. False hearts are encountered almost everywhere. Ingratitude, deep and dark ingratitude is a common crime. But there is no sin in heaven. Falsehood is not there, nor slander, nor deceit, nor iniquity of any kind. Holiness, 'holiness to the Lord!' is the theme of every tongue; goodness, goodness of heart is seen to light up every countenance; virtue is there found in all her dignity rising, and still rising higher and more high in the scale of an unending series.

And there is no more death there; and if no more death, then no more sickness; no more sorrowing, no more pain. O soothing must such reflections be to him who is both a child of sorrow and of affliction. He is wasting away even now,—nay, dying he is by piecemeal; and though it is thus with him, yet his soul feeds upon the thought that there is no more sickness there; no more death in the better land. Surely this must be a faith that staggers not; that only strengthens as death approaches. Let me live and die by such a faith. There is no more death there: no death in that distant land to wring the heart of a father, mother, sister, brother. No sickness! hear ye that, ye sick and languishing. There is no sickness in heaven: let not your soul languish then; but feed it upon heavenly nutriment. And there shall be no more sorrowing there: mourning mother, sister, brother, dry up your tears, and learn to kiss the hand that has wounded. Draw near unto God, and confide in him though he slay thee.

But heaven hath other charms than these; other attractions than those already named. Our Father is there. That blessed Being, whose we are by creation, preservation and redemption. That Being, who is endeared to us by all the ties that cluster around the endearing name of Father. Whose children we are, and who, when all others forsake us will take us up. That Father, who loveth us, and sent his own Son to die for us. He, He is there. Jesus is there. That Jesus, who, when on earth was the sinner's friend: who went about doing good; who loved his enemies; who returned good for evil; who wept at the grave of a friend; and whose compassions yearned towards all men. That Jesus, at whose command the dead rose up, and the elements ceased to rage; who was a prophet, yea, a more than a prophet, who knew what was in man and what man wanted. That Jesus, whom the Jews crucified; and whose entombed body they guarded; but who came forth from the tomb, led captivity captive, and gave gifts, rich gifts unto men,—He is there. Angels are there. They who sang, 'Glory to God in the highest!' when the Bethlehem babe was born. He who 'rolled back the stone,' when Jesus burst the bands of death and triumphant ascended to the crystal gates of light and glory. They who greeted the King of glory, as the Lord, the Lord of hosts, when the words were verified, 'Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lifted up ye everlasting doors!' All the holy angels of God, who wait upon him, and carry the tidings of his love into every part of his universal dominion, they are there. Saints are there; and all the spirits which having been released from their earthly tabernacle have soared away, away,—they are there. 'Mother! thy child is there. His soul illumed with heavenly wisdom; his eye lit up with heavenly joy; on his cheek blooms immortal youth; he is in his Father's presence. Sister! thy brother is there. Weep not; he lives in glory; in his Father's house he now sojourns; no more will he suffer death; pain never again will visit him; he is beyond the reach of sickness now. Mourn not for him; his is a happier state than here. Brother! thy sister is in heaven. She has been faithful here on earth; she lives among the faithful now. Were her spirit hovering near thee, methinks she would say in milder and sweeter tones than ever sister breathed to brother, 'Come to Jesus; come to Jesus.' And will you not come? Will you not listen to a sister's voice, and, to-day, embrace a Savior? Mother! thy daughter is there; thy son; thy sister; thy brother;—all, all are there.

'Father, Mother,
Sister, Brother,
Those you love with love so dear.'

They are all, all there! O heaven has attractions. It has that which ought to wean us from earth and cause us all to feel that we are pilgrims journeying to the better land. We have no continuing abiding place here; heaven is our home,—our all. Emphatically, it is a city having foundations, whose maker and builder is God.

O then let us look to it. Let us feel it has attractions. Let it be our meditation morning and evening. Let us love to think of it as a better land. Then shall we feel that it is beautiful to die. Then shall we feel that heaven is our home. And then shall we die, like one going home.

Happy, that soul which chooses such a theme for meditation. Surely, it must be illumined with heaven's own light; directed by heaven's own wisdom; and led by heaven's own spirit. Adversity only strengthens its trust in God and makes it feel more and more the need of an Almighty arm. It is in the death of such an one, that the ideal of the poet becomes a beautiful reality:

'Vital spark of heavenly flame,
Quit, O quit this mortal frame!
Trembling, hoping, lingering, flying,
O the pain, the bliss of dying!
Cease fond nature, cease thy strife,
And let me languish into life!

Hark! they whisper! angels say,
Sister spirit, come away;
What is this absorbs me quite,
Steals my senses, shuts my sight,
Drowns my spirits, draws my breath?
Tell me, my soul, can this be death?

The world recedes, it disappears;
Heaven opens to mine eyes, mine ears
With sounds seraphic ring:
Lend, lend your wings! I mount! I fly!
O grave, where is thy victory?
O death where is thy sting?

The Lonely Burial.

BY MRS. N. THORNING MUNROE.

NONE came to mourn. Through the crowded street
The lone hearse passed, and with hurrying feet
The crowd pressed close by the silent dead;
But no one paused o'er the bier to shed
One kindly tear, unmarked and alone,
The stranger passed to his last long home!

None came to mourn. In a far off land,
At the sunset hour, met a household band,
Both young and old. The father, whose days
Were passing away like the sunset rays;
The glad, the joyous, the happy boy,
With a spirit of hope and a heart of joy;
And a younger, a fairer, a frailer one,
With an eye of light, and a voice of song;
And the mother with calm and holy brow,
Where a shade of sadness is gathering now.
These all are there, but there is one away,
And for him, doth the mother's fond heart pray;
And a tear dims the father's aged eye,
For the son who roams 'neath a foreign sky.

He had wandered far, and the mother now
Could she gaze on his pale and altered brow,
Would she know the boy she had lulled to rest
In his infant days on her loving breast?
Could she see in the cold and silent face
Of her first-born son, a remembered trace?
Could she see in the closed and sunken eye
Of the stranger who laid him down to die,
One single vestige of him who had gone
With a merry heart from his childhood's home?

They prayed for him there in that household band,
Nor knew he lay dead in a foreign land.
And the father looked for his first born son,
Till his eyes grew dim and his race was run;

And the mother prayed when no eye might see,
For strength to bear with the stern decree;
And the sister looked, but in vain, in vain,
Till her heart grew weary with grief and pain;
And the brother, he gave at times a tear
To the mem'ry of one they all held dear!

Lucy Murray.

'A GENTLE Ruth,—in good or ill,
To follow, whereso'er we roam,
And hang thy precious garlands, still,
Amid the breath of home.'

'Blessed are the meek! for they shall inherit the earth.'

I CRAVE thy patience, reader, for a tale of humble life; a simple record of the virtues of one whom I dearly love and reverence; who is yet neither rich, beautiful, nor accomplished, and who is fast verging towards that dreadful era—Old Maidism! Dear, gentle Lucy Murray! would that I could do justice in this simple sketch to thy blameless life,—to thy purity of heart and speech—to thy patience, forbearance, and untiring benevolence! and show thee forth as thou art—the devoted christian—the humble follower of the meek and lowly Jesus!

Do you see the little red house yonder, standing back from the road, with its little grass-plot, and neatly swept gravel walk,—and the old apple-tree with the rustic bench before it—and the pretty bow-window, filled with pots of flowers—pinks and lavender, marigolds and southern-wood, and other simple plants, which seem the peculiar property of the poor? That is the residence of Lucy Murray, our village dress-maker; those who remember her in her younger days, say she was never pretty; but when I look at her small, slight, and trimly arrayed figure; her soft, brown hair, parted smoothly on her low, fair forehead; her mild, blue eyes, and the quiet, gentle smile that always illumines her face,—I cannot help thinking their judgment wrong. Lucy was the only child of poor, but pious parents, who dying when she was but seven years old, bequeathed their orphan to the parental care of the good minister and his wife.

They accepted the bequest, and well fulfilled the trust. Lucy was faithfully instructed in every branch of a good, plain education, and in all the minutiae of household economy; and what was of far more importance, her mind was fully and deeply imbued with high moral and religious principles. When she was eighteen years of age, she was apprenticed to a respectable dress-maker in the next town. At the close of her apprenticeship, she returned to the village, and was soon established in her new vocation; and her neat and skilful workmanship, good taste, and above all, her gentle and winning manners, soon made her a favorite in every family where she was employed.

Not far from Lucy's dwelling, standing on a little elevation, and seeming to keep aloof from its neighbors, is a large, stately, but rather gloomy looking, red brick house, the only one of the kind, our little village can boast. It was built some twenty years ago, by a gentleman named Spencer, the younger son of an ancient but decayed English family, whose wealth proving insufficient to maintain their dignity, the younger took his small portion, and embarked for America—having first contrived to fall in love, and finally to run away, with the beautiful daughter of one of Scotland's proudest and poorest Lairds. He settled in one of our principal cities, and devoted himself to commerce; and after many years of constant application, he was enabled to build the dwelling we have spoken of, whither he removed his wife and their only child—a boy named Walter, then about twelve years old. Great anxiety was manifested in the village, for the completion of Spencer Grange—for so the place was called by its owner, in remembrance of his ancestral home, in far-away England—and also for the arrival of its future inmates. It was finished at last, and with its splendid drawing and dining rooms, library and conservatory, stood amid the neat cottages of the poor, and the pretty white houses of the wealthier inhabitants, like a prince amid his retainers. There were two or three families, such as are to be found in almost every village, who looked forward to Mrs. Spencer's arrival, as a great and important event, fondly expecting that she would make entertainments, and change the usual monotony of a country life. The great lady came at last; a stately and beautiful woman, with all the pride of her ancient race stamped on her lofty brow. As soon as she was settled in her new home, the principal members of the families, who were so ambitious to make her acquaintance, called on her, and were completely chilled by the measured dignity, and cold, formal politeness with which she received them. Their disappointment was fully reciprocated by Mrs. Spencer; when her husband spoke of purchasing a country seat, and descanted upon the beauty of the situation, she expected, as a matter of course, to find some few families of wealth and distinction, with whom she might form an acquaintance; when, therefore, she found that the highest caste in our village, consisted of the families of the doctor, minister and lawyer, and the four tall daughters of Nabob Macomb, who having amassed a large property in India, had brought his yellow guineas, and yellower visage to his native village; when she found these were to be her future society, the proud blood of the Maxwells revolted, and having formally returned their calls, she settled herself in the library to see to the education of her son. It had been a grievous thing to her, to feel herself the wife of a merchant, but she had become reconciled to her husband's commercial pursuits, that he might amass wealth to give their son a liberal education, and send him forth into the world as became one of his high lineage. But though Mrs. Spencer thus secluded herself, there was one whose modest, unobtrusive virtues and gentle manners, had, spite of her pride, won their way imperceptibly to her heart; and the pastor's wife was soon on a friendly footing with the proud mistress of the Grange. In the meantime, Mr. Spencer remained in the city, deeply immersed in business, and rumor said, fast increasing his hoards; only making flying visits to the village, on Saturdays, and returning the ensuing Monday.

About four years after the Spencers first came among us, some commercial affair required Mr. Spencer's presence in the Western States, and as he was to be absent some length of time, it was decided that his wife should accompany him. The climate, however, was thought too unhealthy to allow of taking Walter, as his health had always been delicate, and though much improved by country air, he was still far from being strong. His parents, therefore, concluded to leave him with their friends at the Parsonage, where he could receive such instructions as would fit him for the University, as well as the motherly care of the minister's wife.

But to return to Lucy, who while all these events were passing, had been progressing in all womanly virtues and attainments; and who, having been, by turns, the pet and playmate of Walter, though scarce two years his junior, now heard with unfeigned delight, that he was to leave the great, gloomy Grange, and become an inmate of their own pleasant home. She could not help feeling joyful, (though she checked the expression of it, for fear of giving pain) at the departure of his mother; for though Mrs. Spencer had always been kind to her, yet her haughty bearing and stately manners, had always impressed Lucy with awe, and she feared, rather than loved her. But now Walter was to be one of their own family, and when her domestic duties were performed, and her lessons learnt, she could take her sewing till his tasks were done, and then they would walk together; and in the long winter evenings they would all gather round the cheerful fire, and Walter would read while they worked. At the time Walter went to reside at the Parsonage, he was a tall, pale, serious looking youth of sixteen, with dark, shadowy eyes, and a mild, expressive face. He inherited neither his mother's beauty, pride, nor prejudices, but was ready and willing to receive all useful knowledge. Thus four years of unclouded happiness passed by, and then Walter and Lucy separated for the first time since their acquaintance, and set out for their different destinations; Walter for the University, and Lucy to commence her apprenticeship. Lonely, indeed, seemed the Parsonage, when they were gone; the dreary autumn days seemed even more cheerless than usual; and when the long winter evenings came on, and the pastor and his wife took their accustomed seats at the fireside, they missed the cheerful voices and pleasant smiles that were wont to greet them; and when the evening hymn was sung, Walter's rich bass, and Lucy's bird-like carol were wanting. But Winter, be it ever so long and dreary, must pass away; and at length sweet, balmy Spring came with spicy breath, and wherever she trod, verdure sprang up, and the trees put forth their tender shoots, and the birds filled the air with melody.

'From the streams and founts, she loosed the chain;' and all nature owned her vivifying influence. She was followed in turn, by glowing Summer, laden with wealth of roses, and other Floral treasures, and filling the poor man's garden with beauty, and his heart with delight; but nowhere was the beauty of the season more deeply felt than at the Parsonage; for the midsummer vacation brought Walter home, and Lucy having finished her trade, was again established there.

During the day, Lucy's employment called her from home, but at its close she returned, and was always ready for the long twilight ramble, or to sit with Walter in the little vine-clad arbor he had made for her, and alternately relate or listen to all that had happened during their separation. Ah! those six weeks were destined to give a deeper and different coloring to the future lives of both Walter and Lucy. Almost imperceptibly, a deep and fervent attachment had been growing up between them, and now a change was coming over those sentiments of affection; it was no longer the calm brother-and-sisterly affection of past years, but that holy, yet passionate tenderness, which only young, pure hearts can feel or know; that love which blossoms but once, and though others, perhaps as fervent and more enduring, may spring up in its place, yet the passion that made

‘Our pulses beat and bosoms burn,
In youth’s bright morn, can ne’er return!’

and such was the love that was daily gaining strength in the hearts of Walter and Lucy. The vacation drew to a close, Walter returned to the University, and Lucy continued to pursue her usual routine of duty and business. Not a syllable of the deep engrossing love, which now made, as it were, a part of their very lives, had past their lips; yet as by intuition, each had read alike the feelings of the other, and were satisfied and happy in the consciousness of their mutual attachment.

Thus far, Lucy’s life had been almost cloudless; and had it continued so, perhaps she might never have been the ministering angel she is, the pride and blessing of our village; for dress-making is not her only vocation—she is nurse, physician and watcher, to all who require her services; and though she never leaves her employment for her own pleasure or amusement, she is ever ready to attend the suffering, and to appropriate her earnings to their relief.

About a fortnight after Walter’s return to the University, the family at the Parsonage were one morning startled by his sudden re-appearance. He had been summoned to join his parents, as his father was very ill, and it was thought could survive but a short time; and after taking a hasty but affectionate farewell, he departed with the promise of sending them immediate intelligence of his father’s state. In less than a week, a letter arrived, and a glance at the black seal told the tidings it brought. Walter had arrived only in time to receive his father’s blessing, and to close his eyes; and as soon as the funeral was over, Mrs. Spencer proposed returning to the Grange. Deeply did their friends sympathize with the mourners, and the day after the reception of the letter, the minister’s wife and Lucy went over to the Grange, and saw that the house was well aired, and put in order for the arrival of its widowed mistress; they remained till a short time before the travelers were expected, and then with true delicacy returned home, that no eyes might witness the emotions of the mourners on their entrance to the happy dwelling of former days. Lucy had looked forward to Mrs. Spencer’s return with mingled feelings; and a sort of presentiment of evil, would find its way, spite of herself, to her heart. She had perfect confidence in Walter’s love, but his proud and stately mother, what would she say to her son’s alliance with the humble village dress-maker! But hope is ever a tenant of young hearts, and when Lucy met the kindly smile and greeting of Walter’s mother, she allowed herself to hope, that now he was all she had left to lean upon, she would sacrifice much to promote his happiness; poor Lucy! she knew not half the aristocratic pride and prejudices that lay deep hid in the breast of that haughty woman!

It was not long after Mrs. Spencer’s return, ere she heard vague rumors in the village, of her son’s attachment to Lucy Murray, to which at first she gave no credit; she knew he was often, very often at the Parsonage, but then it had been his home, during the four years of her absence; they had all shown him every attention and kindness, and to Lucy he had seemed almost like a brother; was it not natural, that he should also think of the favorite of his friends with kindly feelings, and more than ordinary sympathy, as an orphan, who having no natural ties, clung with double affection to those with whom a kind Providence had placed her? Thus did Mrs. Spencer reason with herself, and thus she tried to believe; but the unpleasant conviction would force itself upon her, that it might be all true, and after vainly endeavoring to persuade her reason against her judgment, she at length determined to sound her son upon the subject, and if an attachment really existed, to do all in her power to crush it.

‘Where have you been, Walter?’ she inquired, one evening, as he entered the parlor, where she sat awaiting his return.

‘At the Parsonage,’ was the reply.

‘As usual, you might have added; I have been wishing to speak to you, Walter, concerning your frequent visits there; for since my return, my ears have been often offended by vague hints and insinuations of an attachment between you and the orphan protégé of our friends, Lucy Murray; and though of course I gave them no credit,'—she continued, without appearing to notice Walter's kindling eye and flushed cheek, as he rose from his chair, and began pacing the room,—'yet it is not impossible that your attentions to her may lead her to entertain hopes, which could never be realized, and would therefore bring her only misery, and might cause you self reproach.'

'Mother,' replied Walter, stopping in his walk—'did it never occur to you, that I might sue for the love, which you seem to think it would degrade me to receive?'

'Impossible, Walter! you, in whose veins flows the blood of two of the oldest families in Britain, to wed with the low born daughter of an American mechanic.'

'Nay mother,—with the good, the gentle, the pure-hearted, excellent daughter of good and pious though poor parents—one whose daily life is a pattern of virtue and propriety, and who would not disgrace the proudest name in the world; and shall she be put in competition with rank and wealth? I have sued for her love, as one whose "price is far above rubies;" this very night I gained her promise to be mine; and mother, though I would not willingly pain or offend you, you must look upon Lucy Murray as the future wife of your son!'

'Never, Walter! you are my only son, and I have garnered up all my hopes of happiness in you; but sooner would I see you a corpse at my feet, than the husband of Lucy Murray! and mark me, Walter, on the day that she becomes mistress of the Grange, your mother will be as a stranger, and an alien from your roof!'

That night Walter and his mother parted in anger for the first time in their lives; but on this subject he remained immovable, and it was not resumed again. 'Pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall,' said the wise man of old, and so must it ever be. A few days after the above conversation, as Mrs. Spencer and her son sat at their silent breakfast, letters were brought in; Walter opened the first, but ere he had finished, uttered an exclamation, which brought his mother instantly to his side. The bank in which Mr. Spencer's whole property was invested had failed, and all was lost. It were impossible to describe the consternation of Mrs. Spencer, at the intelligence, and even Walter was at first stunned by the blow; but he knew that something must be done immediately. The Grange was all that remained, and as there were still some debts of his father's unsettled, there was no alternative but to sell the mansion; Mrs. Spencer was too completely stupified by the shock to offer any opposition; preparations were made speedily, and the sale took place. When all was settled, but a small sum remained; Walter purchased a small house, whither he removed his mother, and the kindness of Lucy arranged every thing in it for her comfort and convenience; while Walter procured a situation as clerk in a mercantile house where his father had been known. Mrs. Spencer seemed to have grown old before her time; she had never entirely recovered from the effects of an attack of fever and ague, from which she had suffered during her sojourn in the West; her dark hair was thickly sprinkled with silver, and she seemed completely debilitated.

But her greatest trial was yet to come. The close confinement of a counting room had made rapid inroads on a naturally slender constitution, and Walter's appeared to be rapidly sinking beneath it; till at length his kind employers bade him leave his occupation for a while, and seek a little relaxation in a visit to his mother. He returned home, and his friends fondly fancied him better; but consumption is a deceitful syren, and her flatteries long succeeded, till at last he was forced to take to his bed. There was one, who, when all others hoped, felt that there was no hope; whose heart told her that its idol was perishing; she knew that the brightened eye, and the flushed cheek, were but the precursors of the icy hues, and the cold sweat of death! Lucy felt that Walter must die, and from the hour of his return, she began to prepare herself for the severing of the cherished tie. Day after day, she was at the couch of the invalid, smoothing his pillow, moistening his parched lips, reading to him from the Book of Life, and ministering to his every want; and through the still, silent watches of the night, she sat by his bedside, watching with unwearied devotion his disturbed slumbers, and whispering words of consolation to the bowed and broken-spirited woman, who had 'reviled and persecuted her,' and whom her pure and blessed example had taught to weep bitter tears of shame and contrition.

But the time came, when those who had hoped most, could hope no longer. Walter Spencer was dying! but none had courage to tell him of his doom, save her who loved him fondest and best—she nerved her woman heart, and took his cold, clammy hand in hers, and wiped the moisture from his livid brow, and told him that his spirit was fast winging its way to an eternal home! There was a deep struggle in his heart—it was hard to leave those whom he loved so well, but there was a better land of re-union beyond the grave; the conflict was severe, but it was soon over—the immortal spirit triumphed, and with a look of love, that the icy hand of death had no power to chill,—with radiant hope and faith for a lamp to his feet, Walter Spencer entered ‘the valley of the shadow of death!’

Much curiosity was expressed by the villagers respecting Lucy’s future conduct; and some ventured to prophecy, that now Walter was gone, she would take no farther interest in his mother; ‘and who,’ they said, ‘could blame her? when Mrs. Spencer was rich, she had despised the humble dress-maker, and now she was poor, she must expect similar treatment.’ But they were mistaken. When the simple funeral rites were over, Lucy, with the consent and blessing of the minister and his wife, took up her abode with Mrs. Spencer, and performed to her all the duties of a daughter. Mrs. Spencer was lost in admiration and gratitude; she had learnt by experience to appreciate the meekness and forgiveness of Lucy’s temper, but she had not dared to hope so much as this.

‘I am unworthy of your kindness,’ she exclaimed, when Lucy made known her intentions; ‘I have spoken hardly of you, and tried to injure you.’

‘Jesus said, “Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, pray for them that hate you, and do good to them that despitefully use you,”’ was Lucy’s reply.

She became an inmate of the red cottage, and led by her example, Mrs. Spencer too, became an humble christian. Many wondered at Lucy’s conduct, but they were those who could not comprehend the whole extent of her self-devotion.

‘She is Walter’s mother,’ was her reply to all their comments, ‘and it is a duty I owe to his memory, and a satisfaction to my own heart, to be enabled to render good for evil.’

Reader! my sketch is finished, and if I have failed to make you too, love Lucy Murray, then is my ‘labor of love’ lost indeed. She is no creation of fancy, no being of romance; but she lives amid the sober realities of life—lives, not for herself alone, or a particular circle, but dispenses her charities and her love to all; her smiles illumine the dwellings of the poor, her soft voice breathes consolations to the mourner, her hands minister to their temporal necessities. Hope sits enshrined on her brow; Faith looks out from her calm, holy eyes; and charity, the chiefest of these three, Charity, that ‘suffereth long, and is kind,’ Charity that ‘never faileth,’ lives, breathes, and moves in every look, tone, and action. Her post is at the bed of sickness, at the couch of the dying; her rule of life is the word of God. With the blessing of the pure in heart to brighten her way, she glides calmly and smoothly down the stream of life; and when at length her bark shall reach its destined haven, and be moored in safety in the port of peace, hath she not good cause to hope that ‘henceforth there is laid up for her a crown of Righteousness,’* and ‘an everlasting inheritance that shall not fade away?’

CHARLOTTE.

* This phrase of the Apostle Paul is often quoted, by the press and pulpit, ‘a crown of glory.’ He spake of a crown of Righteousness, or right-doing. He wrought not for fame or glory, but for the approbation of God; and the christian church and the great Head of the church, have crowned him as faithful, and he will ever wear that honorable crown. We once heard a Baptist clergyman, when ridiculing Universalists and their faith, make an attempt to quote this passage. ‘Here is a murderer,’ said he, ‘whose hands are reeking with the blood of his fellow man. He lifts them with the dagger clenched in his grasp and shouts, “I have kept the FAITH! henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of glory!” We need not remark on his deeming murder a sufficient proof of one’s having kept, or having been faithful, to the faith of Universalism, but we must ask the reader to consider how much more absurd would have been the quotation, had he cited it correctly! It would have rebuked the introduction of the figure of the murderer. Universalism prompts to no acts which would dim a crown of Righteousness. B.

Song of the Sea Nymph.

BY MRS. SARAH BROUGHTON.

COME, mariner, down in the deep with me,
Where the coral banks are growing;
And glorious wonders I’ll show to thee,
Far beneath where the tide is flowing.

Thou gazest with pride on the works of man,
Where the columned temple towers;
Come with me, and greater marvels scan
In the depths of the sea-green bowers.

Come down to the giant mountain’s base,
To the nereid’s mystic chamber;
Where sleep the loved of the human race,
On beds of choicest amber.

No lamp in those fret-work halls is seen,
No radiant lustres gleaming;
But rubies and pearls in their starry sheen,
O'er the couch of the dead are beaming.

There ocean-nymphs to soothe their rest,
Weave the symphonious numbers,
And delicate sea-weeds wave o'er their breast,
To curtain those peaceful slumbers.

There the wild tocsin never rings,
To wake their dreamless sleeping,
But myriad throngs of silvery wings,
Bright watch o'er the dead are keeping.

There, the deafening thunder's dreaded crash,
That bows heaven's mystic arches,
Is never heard; and the lightning's flash
O'er our pearl-gemm'd towers ne'er marches.

The song of the wildly moaning wave
In our bowers rings soft and holy;
And sweetly in many a ruby-lit cave
The echos are sighing lowly.

In our reedy saloons the anthem-tone
From many hued shells is ringing;
Glad strains to the upper realms unknown,
The bright sea-maids are singing.

There the wanderer rests in his sad career,
And the golden sands are his pillow;
And the requiem sounding above his bier,
Is the dirge of the roaring billow.

Come, for our bowers are bright with gems,
Though the waves roll chill and darkling;
And pearls that would grace earth's diadems,
In the dim sea-caves are sparkling.

Sublimity of Thought.

I HAVE many times recalled a speech made by an eccentric clergyman in one of our conference meetings, in which he took occasion to remark with great enthusiasm, 'When I was a Calvinist, I could sing 'glory to God high!' and when I became an Arminian, I could exclaim, 'glory to God higher!' but when I became a Universalist, I could shout, 'glory to God in the highest!' — Since that time the speaker has become an Arminian or Calvinist, and as oft as I have recalled his speech, I have been made to feel that his mind has fallen from the loftiest height of sublimity of thought, and the grandest conceptions of the Deity are no more his. The terms high, higher, highest, as here used, do not imply degrees of distance in space, but sublimity of thought; as when we read, 'As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts.' Here ideas of space are used to illustrate sublimity of mind—loftiness of thought and comprehension. And well were the terms applied in the remark quoted, for it seems impossible that any mind should decide that sublime thoughts of God should be enjoyed by the mind that limits salvation, than are enjoyed by him who adores its universality. The Calvinist sees the Deity in the elevation of Sovereignty, scanning the universe of beings, electing and reprobating. According as the believer finds persuasives that incline him to increase the extent of the elected portion, the enthusiasm of his tone in exclaiming 'Glory to God high!' will increase. But his spirit is not satisfied—his heart yearns for a better vision, a more extended glory, and a lovelier amiability in the divine government. Thought bears him on, and he soars into a different atmosphere. The elements mould him till he is fashioned into an Arminian; he finds himself above what before was a wondrous height, and he sees God as a Savior. The clearer and clearer this vision dawns upon him, as cloud after cloud passes away, the more and more earnestly he ascribes 'Glory to God higher!' There is a wonderful remove between the conceptions of the Deity he once deemed sublime, and those which now awake and direct his adoring powers. But still the progress of the spirit is not finished—the wings of thought have not developed their full strength, and the soul struggles as if bound. And bound it is. It looks out from its eyrie, and there are Alps above it, whose base throws broad shadows out far and wide. The soul is still restless, and pants and pants for freedom and strength to try another flight—to get out beyond the overhanging crags and soar to the highest peak visible. It pines not; but prays; it yields not to sloth, but labors; and lo! the wings move with a strange might! Out soars the bird of light, and up and on is its course, till, behold! it stands on the loftiest point, far above all that can intercept the vision in its glorious range. The heart expands as the mind enlarges, and God is seen as a Universal Father! As there the soul drinks in the breath of a higher life, every faculty is engrossed in the sublimity of the scenes revealed, and the shout rises louder and clearer, 'Glory to God in the highest!' It can go no further, for it is dwelling amid the sublimities—the moral grandeur of Universalism, and soon it is forced to add:

'Come then, expressive Silence!
Muse his praise.'

Is there any of the 'sophistry of zeal' in this exalting of our faith? I cannot discern it; but must still regard as one great excellence of our view of christianity, that it feeds man's love of the grand and sublime, lifting the spirit up as nothing else can. When the advocates of a less extended and complete salvation, draw pictures of the future—of the glory of Christ and his conquests, to gratify this same love, it is like the frost work on our windows—beautiful indeed, but no true order, and the whole vanishing at a breath. They deny too soon the certainty of what they picture; and that which seemed to the people a beautiful vision of eternity, is removed away as a garnished door of a sepulchre. I recall this moment a testimony from my own experience. I listened one evening to a discourse from a minister of the Methodist order, which displayed considerable talent. He gave a glowing description of the love of God in the mission of his holy Son, and expatiated long and enthusiastically on the glorious effects of the ‘unspeakable gift.’ I wondered at the temerity of the preacher in advancing such clear Universalism, and marvelled what would the end thereof be. The congregation enjoyed it. Perfect silence pervaded the assembly, and the strictest attention was paid. The people seemed to be listening to ‘good tidings of great joy,’ and they felt, undoubtedly, a deep, personal interest in them. But there was a pause; the eagerness of the assembly continued, and they wanted the theme renewed. The preacher again broke the silence; and it seemed to me that a dark cloud had mysteriously entered the hall and spread the sudden gloom over the people, when the preacher uttered the words—‘And thus the curse of Adam was rolled off, and mankind was placed in a salvable state!’ O what a fall was there! all this eloquence had been spent in simply describing an imaginary past, not a certain and glorious future! What we had thought to be the breathings of a glad prophetic spirit, rejoicing in the mighty workings of Jehovah’s grace, and the grand conquests of Redeeming Love, were but the shadows of the past gilded by human fancy. Did ever pictures on clouds—airy vapor, so deceive, or vanish so speedily! and whereas the exulting soul was ready to shout—‘Glory to God in the highest!’ it was suddenly let down from mount Pisgah, and plunged into one of the dark caverns of Jordan, fearful of the swelling floods and mighty winds. And there it must have dark thoughts, as there it thinks—God has not always loved man, for man was once out of a salvable state; and now that he is in, there is no certainty of benefit therefrom—there is no sure salvation!

We turn with joy to the great facts of God, and rejoice that it is written—‘God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them.’ The love of God was the moving spring of the Redemption, and not an infinite sacrifice to a justice that could be satisfied with the sufferings and death of the innocent as fully, as by the punishment of the guilty. That love was tabernacled in Jesus, and he was ‘full of grace and truth.’ The infinitely varied operations of that ‘grace and truth’ were and are ‘the ministry of reconciliation.’ The field for that ministry is the world—all are its subjects for whom Christ died, and he ‘tasted death for every man,’ and God ‘will have all men to be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth.’ The effect thereof will be the reconciliation of all to God—no trespasses imputed to them, but all enjoying the freedom of pardoning and sanctifying grace, and progressing in the light and knowledge of a diviner life with angels and seraphim. Here is the sublimity of truth—the grandeur of the Gospel. Here is a consummation the glory of which transcends all other glory. Yea, nought is glorious that does not reflect some portion of this glory, as the dew-drop, the streamlet, the brook, the river, the sea, the ocean, borrow beauty in reflecting the light of the sun. As we gaze on the end, God is seen to have a purpose and life has a purpose; He would have a grateful creation, and we should serve him with gratitude. To think of Universal Salvation, is the first approach to true christian elevation; to feel it, is the next; but we must give it expression continuously in our lives, we must perpetually act it, in order to cultivate fully its spirit, appreciate its evidences, and enjoy its pleasures and consolations; and thus only can we in the truest manner ascribe ‘glory to God in the highest!’

The Conquest of Love.

‘Ah, see that smile,—’tis like a dazzling beam
Of the bright sun upon a placid lake;
It gives to those expressive, dark gray eyes
A richer sparkle, and to that fine form
A more bewitching grace. But trust it not;
It covers dark designs, as flowers conceal
The fatal pit, and by their beauty oft Allure to its dark entrance. Trust it not.’

So spake the faithful friend of Isabel
As Henry went, with slow and lingering step,
Forth from their presence. Gladdened was his heart
And light its beatings; the fond, gentle girl

Had given him the richness of her smiles,
Affection's tones, to lift its boundings up,
And all the treasures of her love,—sole wealth
Of woman's heart. But friendship's eye beheld
That she had been inclosed in serpent folds,
As if to her warm bosom she had pressed
The 'venomed snake, and joyed to feel its fangs.
As friendship ever pleads, so did the friend
Of that fair, trusting girl. She spoke of vows
Light-made and broken, and of winning smiles
Which while the gazer looked would turn to frowns,
Or with their treacherous beauty ruin her
On whom their well-feigned lustre fell. She spoke
Of follies that were awakened in his breast
By fortune's blinding beam, and intertwined
With filaments of pride, well rooted there,
Had bound it to the grossness of the earth.
Then of the sparkling goblet, filled to song,
And mirth and revelry, or quaffed by stealth
In private hours, where curious eyes were not.
She spoke with tears, and prayed that Isabel
On such unstable basis would not build
The costly structure of her happiness
And towering hopes, a temple for her heart,
And paint it o'er with fancy's favorite hues,
Lest its own weight should shake its narrow base,
And, like the castles dreamers build in air,
Its fall should crush the bold, rash architect.
'The ardent, deep devotion of thy soul
He values not; he holds thy trusting heart
That when he wearies of it he may toss,
With rude and careless hand, the gift away.
O, do not lay thy heart's rich offering
At a polluted shrine; on barren sands
Pour not the choice libation out, to sink
And run to waste in its unfruitful depths.'

Then proud, and lofty were the answering tones
That trembled on the lip of Isabel.
'If any but thyself, dear girl, had said
Detractive words of him, my tongue would deign
No answer to the charge, so foul and false;
And I would spurn the pressure of the arm
That feels my heart's quick beatings. None but thee
Should utter words like these, and yet repose
Her moistened cheek where thine rests now. To me
E'en now, dear friend, the moisture of thy lip
Seems like the traitor's, poisonous as warm.
But we will hush these cold, distrusting words,
Lest friendship's vigorous growth be rudely checked,
And all its beauty lost.'

With much less ease,
Indignant flashes from her restless eye
Did Isabel restrain. Alas! the pride
Of woman's heart, if friendship's finger throw
A shadow o'er the name engraven there;
On her one idol if a stain be placed.
Ah! woe for woman's trust!—how can she think
The fragrant softness of the breeze will rob
The glowing cheek it fans, of its fresh bloom?
When Henry spake of love so tenderly,
And lauded virtue's charms, a zealot warm,
And when his breath came on her lip, as pure
As the untainted infant's, could she dream
Of ill? What could she do but trust, and love,
And blindly worship? Nought could Isabel;
She could not force her heart to do ought else,
Or, with the proudest scorn, she would have cast,
As a foul, worthless thing, though loved and dear,
The tainted being from her path, with all
His soft, bewildering looks, and low-breathed tones,
That held her fettered soul a prisoner
In their resistless charm. She would have owned
The nameless fascinations that had bound
Her heart to his till they were one,—one thought,
One life, one joy, one hope of future bliss,
No more; she would have thrown them off, as chains
That wear the limbs of those in bondage held.
But woman trusts a smile; ay, and she will

Though death be in its beam. She trusts the eye
That looks in mute, unuttered fondness down
Into the holiest place within her heart,
And reads long hidden tales of sympathy.
So Isabel did trust; and vows were made,
Vows ne'er to be recalled.

Time passed away,
As oft he does, on light progressive wing;
And habits grew and strengthened, as they will
When we neglect to root them out; like weeds
Whose wild luxuriance robs a valued plant
Of proper nutriment. Then Henry held
O'er midnight wine and song, degrading watch;
He gathered thence disrelish for his home,
And unkind thoughts bestowed on Isabel,— Thoughts in their very stealthiness that gave Reality to his imaginings,
And turned to frost the solar ray of June.
Oh, death had been more welcome far to her,
Proud, humbled Isabel. Then burned her cheek,
As Clara's disregarded warning rung
Its trumpet notes in memory's startled ear,
Not disregarded now. Oh, how she loathed!
But 'twas in secret done; for, if the scales
Had fallen from her eyes, and she beheld,
Too late, her shame, she saw a path marked out
Through all her misery, of duty high;
She heard a voice: 'Walk here, and trust in me.'
When grief or anger swelled her breast, she turned Unto its quiet soothings, and found peace,—
Peace that absolved the erring one, and changed
Her quick resentment into pitying,
Forbearing love. She studied pleasant looks,
And saved her smiles, and soft, persuasive words
For him whose wayward steps she would recall
From rough, unequal paths, that lead astray.
Oh! 'twas a holy sight to look upon
These silent, unobtrusive acts of love,
The noiseless brooding of its influence
Above the wanderer's way. Sin was abashed,
And dared not meet the clear, kind glance which fell,
From mercy's eye, into its lowest depths
Of hidden vileness. Better feelings came,
And, day by day, grew strong, as herbage grows,
With progress imperceptible, beneath
Soft dews, and gentle air, and constant sun.
Oh, these are heaven's agents,—so is love;
And love upon the human mind still works
Unceasing miracles; resistless power,
Omnipotent in its own potency.
It works unseen, unheard, unnoticed, too,
In mute, pathetic secrecy. Its choice
Is quiet conquest, and its gifts around
It sheds in still benevolence, like all
God's blessing ministers. Its strength is shown
By all its noiseless work, betokened well
In all its silent movings; and it bends,
Ay, by the force of its own mildness, bends
The haughty to its sway. We gaze, and bow;
We feel but cannot see its power, and yield
The heart all sheathed in pride, and dark with hate.

Yes, 'ye shall reap, if ne'er your souls do faint,
A rich reward for all your trusting toil.'
And Isabel did not;—she did not faint.
What her reward?—ask thy own heart, thou wife,
Left to thy lonely vigils; it will tell,
Will tell thee how she felt when Henry sat
And wiped her tears once more, and hushed her fears,
And led her out upon earth's lovely spots,
And wooed the banished rose back to her cheek,
And saw her smile, again, her confidence
Into his face, and her eye speak the joy,
Unspoken else, that she had won him back
To friendship, duty, love and happiness.

Day Dreaming.

BY MRS. N. THORNING MUNROE.

WE are dreamers all! from the grey-haired old man, with his feet hastening to the grave, to the little child, with mimic sword and drum; from the bold and daring, the proud and haughty man, to the fair young maiden, around whose path but eighteen summers have scattered their flowers. We dream amid the slumbers of the night; we roam through fancy's domains; we leave the world behind us, and we awake and know 't was but a dream,' an illusion, and it vanishes from our minds. And we dream too, amid the glare and bustle of day, and these dreams are oft as illusive and as visionary as our midnight ones; and yet, how we do cherish them, how we do let them take hold upon our hearts, and thus cheat ourselves with our own wild and high-wrought conceptions, and leave the realities of life, sweet though they may be, all neglected, and still dream on!

It is pleasant we know, at times to give wings to the imagination, to form fairy pictures of life, and to revel in the delights of a world of our own creation, bright, dazzling, and blissful. Yes, it is pleasant to indulge in these day-dreams, but yet it is hurtful to our capabilities of usefulness, and destructive at length to our real happiness, to give too much of our time to this employment.

Many there are at the present time, who are much given to day-dreaming. The politician dreams of party triumphs and high offices in state. The speculator has his golden dreams of riches, splendid houses and broad lands; the scholar has his dreams of fame; the maiden hers of love and happiness; and childhood, poring over its dull task, dreams of its play-grounds and its pleasant spots. And all this might be well enough, did we dream of nought but what was within the power of man; it would be well enough, did these dreams but incite us on to necessary action; but how often do we dream of what is not possible, or at least, not useful; and how often too, do we leave it to others of a less dreamy cast, to act and gain the wished for prize! We can all theorize, concerning great and good things, but we do not all practice.* We spend our strength in dreams.

* Coleridge once called this day-dreaming 'mental robbery,' as it was the desire to possess without deserving—wishing the end and overleaping the means. 'Shouldn't you like to go to England in the Acadia?' asked a gentle-

But we need not resort to fancy, we need not seek in day-dreams alone for the bright, the glorious and the beautiful. If we but open our eyes and look around upon all the works of God, and his dealings with man, we shall see, in colors brighter than those of fancy, realities which far outshine the brightest dream of the poet, and manifestations of purer feeling than ever glowed in the fanciful brain of the novelist. Is there a brighter picture than the 'home of affection, where friend meets friend around the social hearth; or where the prayer ascends from grateful hearts, gathered around the family altar, to the God of all love? Is there a purer feeling than the love of a mother for her child, the father for his daughter, or the husband for his wife? Is there a deeper fount of happiness than that which gushes within the mother's heart, as she sees the child of her affections, the boy whom she has borne within her arm in infancy, going on in the strength of his manhood, in the path of usefulness and happiness? or the fond feelings of the father, as his daughter gently smooths his pathway to the tomb?

And yet, these are what we may see and feel every where around us, in the daily routine of life. They are not dreams nor fanciful sketches, but strong realities. There are bright pictures in life, blissful realities, though the loveliness of many a holy scene is veiled from the casual gazer and the impure. There are hours of happiness to be enjoyed, though they may be broken in upon by the fierce passions of men; and the heart may find in its own depths rich resources, when the outward is unattractive; and that this might be, there is mingled and interwoven with our earthly nature, some feelings of a heavenly character, and they shine forth amid the darkness that surrounds them, like bright stars amid the clouds of a midnight sky.

But to return to day-dreams. We are not placed upon the earth to dream, but to act. It was not dreaming that aided the progress of civilization amid the wild haunts of the Indian. It was not dreaming that felled the mighty forests, and formed the ships to plough the great deep, and carry the commerce of a world. It was man in my hearing, of a lady. 'I should like to get there, but I shouldn't like the getting there,' was the reply. Much envy and covetousness results from this—the desire to possess and enjoy, without a willingness to submit to the discipline necessary to attain to the desired good. We often apologize to ourselves for our want of energetic action and perseverance by attributing to 'good luck' in others what was purchased by these qualities.

not dreaming that aided the sons of liberty and raised the flag of freedom upon our own American shores. Neither was it dreaming that propelled the steam-car on its iron way, or the steam-ship across the broad Atlantic wave, and brought, as it were, the two hemispheres in communion. These were the results of disciplined thought—of the activity of mind, busy and wise with facts.

But all things have their uses, and among these are day-dreams. As the visions of the night in the course of things may come to pass, so may day-dreams. The poet has his day-dreams, and he may clothe them in their beautiful garb, and send them forth into the world, and they may perform their mission, and soothe many a sad heart and weary hour; and they may incite to virtue and usefulness. They may reach the heart which could not be softened by advice. With their sweet influence, they may touch some secret spring, or stir up some long-forgotten association, and the stubborn one may become a very child, and go forth into the world holier and better. But it was not dreaming alone that did this. Action must be employed, even as it was requisite that the healing waters of Bethesda should be moved, ere the sick could find benefit from the descent—the bath. Then let us remember that dreams alone are of no avail; they may be beneficial, if used aright, even as every other faculty which a good God hath given us. But let us not waste our time therein, nor dream all the day, but act while we have the power. Let no one give his time to this, when he should be employed upon the realities of life.

Let the minister, when he finds he is dreaming too long, arise and go forth among his flock, and enter into the realities of life. Let the statesman, when he dreams of party conquest, go on with an active heart and hand for the good of the country, not party. And when the mother dreams of beautiful beings and fairy lands, let her look into her own child's soft, starry eyes, and ask herself what is more beautiful? and plead of God for wisdom to preserve the loveliness of innocence.

The Romance of Woman. No. 5.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

ABBASSA.

THE name of Haroun Al Raschid is one of the most illustrious in the history of the ninth century. A pretty correct idea of his private habits can be gathered from the famous 'Arabian Night's Entertainments' in which he figures largely, either in person, or through the instrumentality of his grand vizier, Giafar the Barmecide. This same Giafar was distinguished for his bravery, his personal beauty, and his loyal adherence to the house of Abbas. With the caliph he was deservedly a great favorite; but this very partiality led to his subsequent misfortunes. Haroun had a sister, named Abbassa—'one of the loveliest of Arabian women, skilled in all the learning of her age.' A caprice entered his head with reference to her and Giafar, which he was determined to gratify. He wished to see together the two most beautiful beings he had ever met—the two who were dearest to him in all the world; but as Arabian customs forbade the unveiling of woman save to her husband's eyes, he could bring about his design only through their marriage. They were, however, expressly forbidden to meet except in his presence, under pain of his severest displeasure; for Giafar, though of illustrious birth, could never presume to unite the race of Barmec with the proud and royal house of Abbas. In Haroun's presence, therefore, they met; and at their first meeting, loved. The peculiarity of their situation increased their attachment, till at length they dared all hazards for the sake of love. Their meetings were discovered—Giafar was slain, his race exterminated, and the innocent and beautiful Abbassa sent into exile, where she soon after died in poverty and neglect.

Haroun Alraschid sat at meat
Within his palace hall;
And young Abbassa to his side
Had hastened at his call.
Her veil was lifted from her brow,
She came, a blushing bride,
To meet her husband's first fond glance—
The valiant Barmecide.

A timid smile was on her lips,
Soft beamed her hazel eye,
And, trembling, from her gentle heart
Escaped a tell-tale sigh;
But far more beautiful than love,
Which every heart can feel,
Was the placid meekness of her brow
Where thought had set its seal.

And thus to meet, and only thus,
'Neath Haroun's jealous gaze ;
Ah Giafar ! 'tis a fearful thing
To meet her eyes' soft rays ;
Fearful indeed for thee to feel
The influence of her mind,
And worship loveliness and grace
To which thou shouldst be blind !

And thou, Abbassa ! what to thee
Are love's deluding dreams ?
Thy Giafar may not walk with thee
By Bagdad's ancient streams.
Forbidden e'er to meet thy smile
Save 'neath the caliph's eye,
Twere better thou shouldst quell thy heart,
'And, conquering thus,—to die !

Nay, listen not to Hope's sweet voice—
She sings delusive songs ;
The joy that she hath promised thee
To happier love belongs.
Go read the poet's thrilling page,
Or wake the lute's soft strains ;
In these, alone, for thee, young bride,
The hope of peace remains.

And thou of Barmec's loyal race,
Thou young, and brave, and good,
Thou who at Haroun's own right hand
In valiant fight hast stood ;
What now to thee are place and power,
Since at thy monarch's whim,
Thy heart must yield its gentle hopes,
And life and love grow dim ?

Ye fated and ye beautiful,
Life's cup is not all bliss ;
The sparkles round its gilded brim
Are dregged with bitterness ;
And ye will learn, too sadly learn,
The anguish and the strife
That poison at their purest springs
The streams of human life.

Ay, ye will learn what all must learn,
Who dream of human bliss—
That the glory of the upper world
Can only dawn on this ;
For clouds o'ershadow with their wings
The sunshine of the heart,
And hopes that seem all fraught with life,
Are earliest to depart.

'Tis well !—We thank thee, holy One !
For every broken tie ;
For when our dearest hopes are fled,
'Tis easier, then, to die.
Scourged at the heart, and faint with grief,
We murmur for release ;
Our woes have brought us to thy feet—
Oh Father ! Give us peace !

Dangers of Marriage.

I AM aware that my theme will be regarded as a very unattractive one, but though unattractive, it may be made useful ; for among all the perils to which the young are exposed, there is none that demands our attention more than those of improper marriage. Strange indeed is it, that parents and friends show so little anxiety on this subject. Were I to say that force should be used to prevent a young person from keeping company with the object of his choice, I might well deserve to fall under the censure of all liberal minds : and were I to give to all parents, and all elderly friends, the credit of possessing more judgment than the young candidates for marriage, I should betray gross ignorance of the world. He whose chief love is for wealth, cannot be able to discern the cause of his daughter's preferment, when she gives her heart to a young man of real worth, who has his fortune to make, and rejects a wealthy suitor, whose claims may seem to him to be far greater. But it is the good fortune of some young persons to possess candid, liberal, and enlightened friends. These friends are chary of their advice, in proportion as they are qualified to advise discreetly. They are fearful of exhibiting a meddling or inquisitive spirit, on such occasions : and this arises from the fact that they have not sufficiently examined the subject of love and marriage. To a young person in love, the object appears altogether lovely ; and hence arises a belief that no other individual could make him happy. Often as experience has exploded this notion, it is entertained, and will probably continue to be entertained, by those who have yielded to the engrossing influence of first love. Many a person who has seen one of the opposite sex but once or twice, and feels convinced that longer acquaintance would have ripened into love, becomes attached to another and a very different individual, and is soon heard to say that he or she is necessary to their happiness. Any person who could give credit to such an assertion, made under such circumstances, would believe anything. 'We were made for each other,' is the frequent declaration of individuals, who could have become quite as strongly attached to thousands of others, had they fallen in with them.

Young people of opposite sexes often form an attachment for each other on account of some similarity in their views and sentiments, and this they proudly term, mental love. After they have passed several years together, in the indissoluble bonds of wedlock, they discover that the similarity of mind which decided their fate, exists only on certain subjects : and that, in all other respects, they are as unlike as the statue of Minerva and the pedestal which supports it. But this they did not discover during courtship, because then the points of resemblance between them engaged their whole attention, and all their conversation turned upon those subjects in which they were mutually interested. It may be illustrated by two travelers who fall in with one another on the public road, when they soon discover that they are both acquainted with one man who resides in the city whither they are bound. This simple fact gives rise to conversation, and establishes a certain degree of intimacy between them. As this is a theme in which both feel equally interested, they converse principally about their mutual acquaintance, his family, his business, and his prospects: but, having arrived at their journey's end, they go, each one to his respective place; and although they may often meet each other in the street, yet there is no unity of pursuit or of sentiment to render a renewal of their acquaintance desirable.

It often happens that a young lady's friends express their surprise on seeing her united to some man, destitute both of personal and mental graces, and altogether unsuitable for her. A moment's reflection would convince them that the infatuation of love might easily account for her strange procedure. Some trifling peculiarity in the man attracted her fancy, and then all was lost. One grace or virtue sanctified all his deformities; even as a handful of bold men gaining access to a besieged city, may throw open its gates and let in the whole enemy. Had reason's voice been heard, this would not have happened. But the fire of love being kindled, though at but one corner of the mansion, will inevitably envelope the whole building, unless vigorous and prompt measures are taken to extinguish it. And where is the cure for love when it has fairly established itself in the heart? Nothing short of matrimony will heal the distemper, and that 'remedy is worse than the disease.'

Think not that I am endeavoring to decry marriage. The unwedded portion of my female readers would hardly thank me for doing so. It would be like putting an extinguisher on the brightest star of their morning. It would be a piece of cruelty worthy only of a Caligula. I am only trying to persuade the youth of both sexes, that great circumspection is necessary, in choosing a partner for life—that they should be satisfied with all, or the balance of the characteristics of the person whom they wed. Methinks I hear some lisping damsel say, "In that case, who would get married?" I have but one answer to make, Then remain single forever. Far better is it to continue alone and independent, than to unite your destiny with one whom you do not sincerely respect; and one ounce of respect is worth a ton of love. Rational respect is like the sea-coal, which neither snaps nor flashes, but keeps the room of a consistent temperature, until the hour for repose arrives; while love, without respect, is like the crackling thorns which blaze up brightly for a moment, and then crumble to ashes. The dread of remaining single has been fatal to the happiness of many a charming bud of loveliness. I candidly believe that a good old maid is one of the happiest creatures alive. I entertain great respect for worthy women who have had sufficient firmness to escape the snares of mercenary or vapid wife-hunters, and who fear not the sneers of thoughtless fashionables. Thankful may they be for their escape from a world of care, anxiety, and cruel bondage. They have had leisure to improve their minds; they have dared to form opinions without asking permission of a master; they are not afraid to say that their souls are their own. Often, when contemplating the serene and independent life led by these daughters of freedom, whose ministry is of the most amiable character, and who are welcome in every home, I have felt and mourned the injustice of much sneering and mockery vented against the old maid.

On the Picture of a Child at Evening Prayer.

BY MRS. C. W. HUNT.

OH! fair are the golden sunset rays,
When they fall at eve o'er glassy bays;
And fair are the cots, and hedge-rows green,
That, mirrored far in the depths, are seen;
But oh! there's no sight so fair to see,
As sinless childhood's bended knee.

Sweet is the breath of the joyous Spring,
When it wakes the flowers, and streamlets sing;
And sweet are the turtle's mournful notes
As the lulling sound on the night air floats;
But oh! there's no voice on the viewless air,
So sweet as childhood's, raised in prayer.

Yet, wherefore pray—sweet, joyous child!
No sorrow is thine—no passions wild
Have swept o'er thy soul; no withering grief,
Has plucked from life's rose one festal leaf;
Thy sunny brow is unshadowed by care,
Oh! why is thy young head bowed in prayer?

Why! Oh! pray for strength,—for power to bear
Thy woman's lot; unyielding to wear
The mask of joy with a breaking heart,
And smile through all, tho' the life-cords part;
To mark each vision of youth decay,
As shadows flit o'er the hills away.

Yes, pray! for free as the wild bird's song
 Are thy orisons now; no blighting wrong
 Now fetters the breath of thy vespers, given
 In undimmed purity unto Heaven;
 Oh! blessed art thou in thy happy days,
 To be taught to lip thy Maker's praise.

Yes—kneel and pray! for no sound of earth,
 No fairy scene to which spring gives birth,
 In life's dark days shall possess such power
 As the prayer of thy childhood's vesper hour;
 Earth's brightness may fade, but this still will be,
 Greenness and beauty, and song to thee. C. W. H.

Zeal for Christ.

It is frequently urged against the doctrine of Universalism, by its opponents, that it affords no motives for zeal in the cause of religion. We are informed, that if all men are to be saved, we need give ourselves no trouble about virtue or vice, righteousness or unrighteousness; for that, do what we may, we can neither make anything better or worse—that all is fixed and decided, and we might as well sin on until death, enjoy the delights of wickedness, and then take our stand among the ranks of the beatified, in the day of resurrection. We know not what superiority the system professed by the believers in partial salvation may have, in this respect, over ours. We know not what greater motives for zeal in doing honor to God, they can render, than those which influence us. Will they pretend that the dread of an endless hell is calculated to inspire men with stronger devotion to the cause of Christ? Will they say that the prospective torments of the greater part of the human race are calculated to kindle our love for the Being who devotes them to destruction? Such appears to be the theory of our opponents.

But if there be anything in gratitude, if there be anything lovely in mercy and benevolence, if there be any reason for promulgating doctrines which are calculated to do God the highest honor, and to produce peace, good will, virtue, and happiness on earth, then indeed has the Universalist more cause than any other man that we know of, to go forth and proclaim that a Savior has risen, and that God is the Savior of all mankind. His zeal has its spring in love to God and man, and its object is the awakening of a kindred spirit in others, a spirit from which all goodness issues.

THE best business to follow, is each one's own.

Romance and Reason.

A DEAR sister friend, in one of her letters, writes: 'You say some good things about Romance and Reason, a very pretty alliteration, by the way. Perhaps you deem, that in the indulgence of the former, I throw the latter to the winds. It may be so, yet if it be, it is no longer properly romance, but idle folly; since romance, in the true acceptation of the term, is but the unsealing of the tenderest affections of the heart, by the acute touch of the very finest and most divine perceptions. It is the union of the most refined capacities of the mind and heart. Romance is to reason what the spirit is to its embodiment—giving it life, sensibility, and grace; and therefore, the stronger and more vigorous the reason, the healthier will be the action, and the more powerful will be the developments of the spirit that refines it.'

And now, reader, what do you think of that plea for Romance? To my mind it appeals with the force of justice, and I love Romance more than ever. It has always been the sun that spreads a roseate blush on the snowy hills, giving a smile of warmth to the glittering frost; and that tinges with the delicatest pencillings the infinite variety of flowers and fruit—each in its season. And yet it takes nothing from the strength of what should be strong, nor does it diminish the attributes of usefulness in that which should be useful. Romance is the eye for the beautiful, the heart for the affectionate, the spirit for the religious. It will not permit the soul it tenants to look on the outward, and be content with the visible, but breaks for it the spell of sense, and shows behind the rent veil the glories of the inner world. It is like Christ's power in the miracles. Men were betrayed by the steady uniformity of nature's laws, by the eternal silence of the infinity of stars. They forgot and forget the living Spirit, above the wheel within wheel vision, and his almightiness. But the miracles shew and show, that behind all these was and is a living and all-controlling Force; and as men saw and see these mighty works of Jesus, the wheels flash out light, the parted clouds let through the glory of the Unapproachable, and ten thousand voices break the awful silence, and speak and sing of God! Romance now works such miracles. It will not let the mind stop at 'the mount that may be touched,' but urges the soul on unscathed through the fire and tempest. It will not let the heart sleep, while Jesus is transfigured before it; nor turn away in terror when the veil of the temple is rent; nor despair at the largeness of the sealing stone at the door of the sepulchre. It is the angel of the resurrection; it is Christ meeting Mary in the garden; it is the heavenly messenger on Olivet, speaking of the ascended Lord. It leads captivity captive, and gives gifts unto men, revealing the powers of the world to come.

When the imagination greatly predominates over the judgment, when eccentricities of character prove the little sway which right reason has in the mental kingdom, use is made of the term Romantic to designate the character. When the young lady neglects the duties of a useful ministry at home, giving her time to gypsying, and her thoughts to Utopian schemes, conversing in a tongue fit only for fairies, and expressing wishes that become none but dreamers,—it is said of her, as sufficiently descriptive, 'she is romantic.' And so it is said of her who dwells by herself, in melancholy separation from her kindred, in their home, and whose one apology for the silence of her thoughts, and her aversion to any confidant, is, 'they cannot understand me.' Such are not, by our sister's definition, romantic, but foolish. The imagination runs riot, and there is no balance of character. They do not live among the really Beautiful and Spiritual; for they feel not, and do not appreciate the beautiful in humanity, affection, home; nor do they recognize the spiritual ties of devotion to human wants, of self-sacrifice, and communion of heart with heart, while sympathies are gushing and flowing, like the waters of a fountain whose streams call up verdant things to a happy existence, and mingle music with the melodies of bird and wind.

Romance and Reason are twin sister and brother. The smiles of each are made lovelier and warmer by the reflection of the other's. The one might become too volatile, were it not for the sedateness of the other; and reason might become too stern and frigid, were it not for his sister's winning sweetness and amiability. They teach each other. Together they look out on the visible works of God, and talk of the invisible. They believe earthly things, and Jesus tells them of heavenly. And as they listen and believe, earth reflects more of the light of its Maker, and they use and improve the good of the world, without abusing it, remembering that its fashion passeth away. They look for a better world, and for fashions of immortal loveliness and fitness, where the beautiful, the affectionate, and the spiritual will have sovereign and universal sway.

A Lesson for the Sorrowing.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

THERE is sadness in thy heart, Enrique; for the young flower of thy hope hath perished. The light hath gone out upon the altar, and the vestal that guarded it hath vanished. The smoke from the dying embers hath darkened the dome of the temple through which thou gazest upon heaven, and thou believest there are no stars there, and that even Orion, the glorious, hath veiled his face from mortal eyes. Come forth with me, young mourner, where the light is breaking upon the hill-tops. There is a sublime promise written upon the brow of the morning, which, if thou wilt read it aright, shall strengthen and sustain thee through a long and lonely pilgrimage.

Canst thou not read the handwriting of God? Where it is traced in the green valleys, and the blue streams, and the bright cascades, there canst thou discern and understand; knowest thou not also the language of that bleak old rock, and the voice of the thundering cataract?

Hush, Enrique—there is the low bleat of the poor ewe, whose lamb has been slaughtered for the food of man. What discerneth she of the goodness of God in the loss of the little innocent that gambolled at her side, and for whom she scented out the sweetest daisies, and the freshest of the white spring-clover? Thy heart is not the only one that has been bereft, my gentle friend. Even now, from the bosom of that magnificent old elm, saileth forth on the rosy air of morning a minstrel whose song was ever sweetest beside our streams, and earliest at our cottage door. Silently now she quenches her music in her heart, for the voice that rose in concert with hers to heaven is lost in the stillness of death. She feeds her young alone; and thinkest thou, dear Enrique, that her simple thought can comprehend the mystery of death? She finds that the green bough is a solitude, and that the bright wing that sheltered 'the nursing nest,' returneth no more from its long and weary flight; yet, verily, she understandeth not why this should be the recompense of her morning praise, and the meed of her kind and faithful love.

Art thou like that bird, my friend? Hath never a hand unfolded to thee the veiled beauties of thy grief, or drawn aside the covering that envelopes the mysteries of the tomb? Too long hast thou dwelt in the shadow of thy desolated sanctuary. Thou hast not yet studied the universal heart of nature, on whose chords are continually vibrating the varied touches of God's own finger—its music now swelling forth in deep and solemn strains, or cleaving the vault of heaven with its piercing sweetness; and now lingering within its very fibres in tremblings of unappeasable anguish and despair.

The human soul has many a lesson to learn of other sorrows than its own, ere it can put on the armor of one who is resolute to conquer and to save. Hast thou never yet learned that the most beautiful results of Divine Providence are achieved through suffering? Did it never enter into the perceptions of thy philosophy that throughout all animated nature, both in times past and present, pain and grief have been blended in almost equal degrees with the principles of life and enjoyment? Everything suffers loss and privation. Everything is touched with infirmity. Annually the tree sheddeth its wealth of leaves, and annually the dumb brute bringeth forth its loved ones for the slaughter. Even the merry stream at our feet, that singeth songs of gladness through the cloudiest days and the darkest nights, perishes beneath the burning heats of our glorious mid-summer; and the sweet flowers that are fed upon its waters die idly upon its brink, unsanctified by the baptism that fell upon their infant heads, and called them into glad and beautiful being.

And what Enrique, is the true reading of these mysteries? Is not the love of God the only key to the ordainings of Divine Wisdom, be they administered in sorrow or in joy—in blessings or in privations? Shall we then turn back because there are clouds overspreading our pathway? Shall we shrink from the forked lightning that darts around our heads, or cower beneath the crash of the thunder that shakes the earth at our feet? No, Enrique, rather let us wrap the mantles of our faith closer around our hearts, and with calm brows and firm steps, go on steadfast alike to victory or to death!

But I have said that there is promise in the morning—a sublime promise which extends like a rainbow across the heavens, and spans the earth with sunbeams. At this hour, thou sorrowing child of God, rose thy Redeemer from the arms of death. The angels came down from heaven, and sat at the side of the empty tomb that they might proclaim to his mourning friends the sublime truth—'He is risen! He is not here!'

'The Grave, betrayed, with trembling hand,
Unlocks its iron door,
And lo, oh God! Thy Son comes forth,
And lives forevermore!"

If thou art sad, dear Enrique, with this at thy heart, what wouldst thou have been had the grave never restored one captive back to life; if all who have tasted death, had mouldered forever into dust; if from the tomb no voice had spoken, and given us the assurance that we shall all yet live again in a purer and happier being than this? Like the brute that moans for its dead—nay, a thousand fold more hopeless wert thou, Enrique, in thy memory of her who hath passed, so suddenly from the light and gladness of life to the silence and the coldness of the grave.

I do not bid thee fill up the place in thy heart which she has left vacant. It is a green spot in the desert of thy life, into which the wild beasts of passion have never entered, and where the burning winds become balmy and refreshing, that they may sweep over thine after life with a less oppressive power. But Oh Enrique! into this beautiful oasis not all thy thoughts should be gathered; here should they not forever linger, for the waste is before thee, which thou must make glad for others. There must thou plant the roses and unseal the fountains; thither woo the singing birds and sportive fawns; and thus people for those who follow thee, an isle of beauty in the place that hath been ever to thee a wilderness of sorrows and of trials. And shall not the rose that thou plantest for another yield its fragrance also to thee? and shall not the fountain thou unsealest for those who follow, gush forth also at thy feet; and wilt thou not thus in thy very labors be continually blest? Return not then to thy desolate sanctuary, but make the whole world a sanctuary, and the great heart of humanity an altar on which thou shalt lay thy daily offerings, that they may breathe eternal incense unto heaven.

Sonnet. Where shall we Pray?

Go FORTH and worship : but not where
The crowds assemble in their pomp and pride ;
Go in the free and joyous air
To some lone glen, or on some mountain side.

Go kneel upon the sea-beat shore ;
Go stand beneath some dark and solemn wood ;
Go where the stars are bending o'er
The spot on which some ancient city stood.

Go in the dead and hush of night,
When all but winds and waves are still ;
Go when the first pure morning light
Comes flowing down o'er plain and hill.
These are the places and the times for prayer,
And all we ask for will be granted there. D. B. H.

Prayer, its Times and Subjects. No. 2.

OUR Savior should be the pattern for us to follow in all the duties of a christian life. And from what is recorded of him, it seems that he had no set times for prayer, but that he unburdened his thoughts to his God and Father, whenever and wherever his mind was thus disposed. He prayed when night's sable pall had mantled the earth in her darkness, when there was no human eye to see or ear to hear. He prayed at the morning dawn, and when the evening shades gathered around, when contemplating God as manifest in his Providence, when in silent and lonely meditation upon his condition, and the great work he came to perform. He prayed when with his disciples and for them, when his mind was burdened and weighed down with heaviness, as on the night before his betrayal, in the garden of Gethsemane.

He prayed when in deep distress and anguish of soul, as upon the cross, when he breathed forth his last breath in a fervent petition for his persecuting enemies, saying, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

In all places, and at all times, when his soul was filled with emotion, he prayed and poured forth his thoughts in mighty accents of gratitude to God, expressing entire confidence in him.

And so we ought to pursue the same course with regard to our private and social devotions. It is proper for us, yea, it is our duty to commune with God in secret, and there, in the silence and solemnity of the place, to ask for the forgiveness of our sins, and for wisdom to carry out every noble purpose we have formed. Prayer is proper, and a duty at the family altar, when the little circle are gathered to offer up their evening or morning sacrifice to their benevolent Creator for the rich blessings of life.

Prayer is proper, and it gives us relief when in trouble, when we are oppressed in feeling, and desponding in spirits. Prayer should be offered at the bed-side of the sick and dying, when dissolving nature is about yielding up its spirit to the being who gave it, and then to point the eye of faith far beyond the gloomy vale of death, to that bright spirit land, where kindred never part nor grieve, for death and sorrow find no place there.

The humble and believing christian often feels like pouring out before his God that praise which is due to him alone, when he sees this beautiful world in its glory fitted up for his habitation—when he contemplates him as revealed in his providence and in his word. Such reflections call upon his soul to praise him, and he involuntarily obeys. And such is the nature of the mind, that it would be extremely unhappy were it debarred the privilege of thus expressing its thoughts to our great benefactor.

And it is such a prayer and none other, that is acceptable to God, or that does us any good. He who feels this spirit of prayer burning in his bosom and sends up his thoughts and desires on high, will find a holy joy and a sacred fire kindled up in the soul. It matters not whether he be a Jew, a Mahomedan, a Pagan, or a Christian, if the heart is prepared for God's spirit to dwell in it, he will find a sacred pleasure in prayer.

But we will pass to consider the most proper subjects of prayer, or in other words, for what had we ought to pray?

The answer to this question may be found in our Lord's prayer, in which we find the principal subjects upon which we should dwell, and for which we should ask in our petitions.

We suppose that he did not design it to be repeated word for word at all times and on all occasions, as the prayers of liturgies are, but rather that it should be the pattern for his disciples to follow. The subjects of this prayer are so familiar to all, and so generally understood, that they need not here be repeated. All, however, who have given the Lord's prayer much consideration, must have discovered, that its simplicity and sublimity, its conciseness and yet its comprehensiveness—the spirit of devotion and reconciliation which it breathes, at once show, that it is not only the best form of prayer, but that it was conceived by a mind truly filled with divine love and heavenly light. There is nothing in it dictatorial, nothing but pure benevolence and divine illumination. Bishop Proteus says, 'this prayer stands unrivalled, in every circumstance that constitutes the perfection of prayer, and the excellency of that species of composition. It is concise, it is perspicuous, it is solemn, it is comprehensive, it is adapted to all ranks, conditions, and classes of men, it fixes our thoughts on a few great and important points, and impresses on our minds a deep sense of the goodness and the greatness of that Almighty Being to whom it is addressed.'

The Benefits of Christianity and the Study of the Bible.

THE book, which contains the revelation of the principles of religion, is of such a character, as not only to encourage an acquaintance with the liberal sciences, but to render it absolutely necessary. Nearly every people, in whatever age, or whatever may have been their religion,—if they have had any knowledge of letters,—have had these sacred books. These books have been deemed worthy of perusal, and a diligent examination. They have exerted an influence corresponding to their character, not only on the moral, but the intellectual condition of the people. To christians, the Bible is the sacred repository of religious truth. It is more generally circulated than any other book. Its deep recesses of wisdom and knowledge are explored, with an ardor and perseverance unknown in any other department of literature. But the Bible is not a dry detail of speculative theories, and didactic precepts. It embraces a great variety of most interesting facts. We find, on almost every page, references to the history, language, manners and customs of the nations celebrated in classic story. The student of the Bible finds his path winding along over the fertile fields of Judea, the plains of Chaldea, and the land of the Nile. He sees, rising in splendid magnificence before him, Jerusalem, Babylon, Ninevah and Tyre. The empires of Sesostris, Nebuchadnezzar, Cyrus, Alexander, and Cæsar, pass in review before him. He is introduced to an acquaintance with the Jews and the Samaritans; the Egyptians and Assyrians; the Medes and the Persians; the Greeks and the Romans. The most important facts of biblical history are intimately connected with the history of these ancient people; and the most essential doctrines of revelation are illustrated by numerous allusions to their laws, manners and customs. It thence becomes matter, not merely of curiosity, but of necessity, that those who would thoroughly understand the Bible should become acquainted with the history of the ancient world.

And how much has this department of knowledge been extended by its connection with the Bible. What fountains of information, concealed under the accumulated rubbish of ages, have been discovered by the researches of biblical students, and opened, and purified, and made to flow in innumerable channels, accessible to all ranks of society. In this way, an incredible amount of knowledge, deeply interesting, and well calculated to enlarge the conceptions, and promote the improvement of the mind, is brought within the reach, not only of the learned, but of all orders of society where the Bible is read. Had it not been for the influence of christianity, what should we have known respecting the East? What vestiges of her ancient kingdoms; her splendid cities; her millions of inhabitants, and their curiously interesting customs, could now be traced? Did not christianity throw an enchanting interest around Palestine, and the adjacent countries, who of the moderns would have gone there to explore her desolate coasts, and to unlock her hidden stores of long forgotten legends? The inspired writers in illustrating their doctrines, have brought in requisition every science, and every art, known in their age of the world. The physical sciences,—so far as they were understood;—the science of morals and law; the usages of commerce; the implements of agriculture; the science of architecture, from the rude tent to the splendid temple; all the variety of mechanic arts; with many of the fine arts, are brought to view. We meet music and poetry on almost every page;—poetry full of passion and sublimity;—poetry abounding in the most brilliant imagery;—poetry that touches the deep feelings of the soul,—that sets vibrating every string of the human heart,—that kindles up in the human mind a fire, quickening every faculty with electric energy. How rich a treasure of literature is contained in this book of books. Here are mines inexhaustible, and open to all. Here grows the tree of knowledge, bringing life to those who taste its fruits. Here is, for the inquiring mind, a paradise of knowledge, guarded by no flaming sword, but opening its gates alike to all who approach; inviting them to come in; and presenting before them an entrance into every department of inquiry, which can please and interest intelligent minds. Strike from the memory of man the knowledge which can be legitimately traced to the influence of the Bible, and you would inflict, on the cause of literature, a calamity far greater than it suffered by the burning of the Alexandrian Library.

That christianity does exert these influences, will be evident to any one who will examine facts. Where do we find the most general diffusion of knowledge, and the highest degree of intellectual improvement? Is it not where christianity the most triumphantly prevails? What do heathen countries exhibit, but a barren waste, an intellectual desert? No ray of light penetrates the thick clouds of darkness which hang fearfully over the land. In vain may genius spread her wings, and attempt to rise. Superstition palsies her nerves. In vain may mind struggle for freedom; superstition binds her in chains. Go, survey the world, look at those countries on which falls no ray of light from the sun of righteousness. Look at Persia, Arabia, and Turkey, countries on which the waning crescent of Mahomet sheds her feeble rays. And as you cast your eye over these desolate regions, you may be reminded, that they were once in natural advantages the fairest portions of the earth. Here are splendid cities famous in ancient records. Here are centres of intellectual light, sending rays in every direction. Here the primitive apostles of Jesus first preached the doctrines of christianity and established churches. But Mahomedanism, like the pestiferous wind from Arabia's desert, has swept over the whole land, carrying intellectual death, wherever her poisonous principles are inhaled. Science has departed; literature is no more; the arts have perished; and the human mind has become the scene of devastation. Pass on to India, a country distinguished for natural resources; here too the intellectual prospect is cheerless and gloomy—the inhabitants are slaves to a most cruel and degrading superstition. In their intellectual character, they are scarcely elevated above the standard of the brute, into which they expect to be transformed after death. Visit Africa, survey the whole extent of that quarter of the globe; with Bruce, follow the Nile to its source; with Lander, visit the numerous and populous kingdoms on the banks of the Niger. See the embodied personification of mental degradation and superstitious ignorance. Go to the islands of the Indian and Southern Oceans; penetrate the North American forests; see the ferocity of disposition, and the dwarfishness of intellect. Every where, beyond the influence of christianity, the intellect is prostrated. The fabric of mind, in better days so splendid, lies all in ruins. Around you is a scene of dreariness and gloom; a desert, to which Sahara is a paradise. Not even a withered leaf from the tree of knowledge, can be discovered. Look again at christian countries—especially at England and America, where the purest forms of christianity prevail; look at our own New England; a land settled by christians, for the express purpose of carrying into full and unrestrained effect the principles of their religion. Here you may see the beauty, the grandeur, the power, the glory of mind.

To the brilliant age of the apostles and fathers of the christian church, there succeeded one of darkness. The morning rendered glorious by the rising of the Sun of Righteousness, was interrupted by an unnatural night, a long and cheerless night of a thousand years. Yet a few bright stars of the first magnitude occasionally broke the gloom, and sent a cheering ray across the horizon. If, like the wise men of the East, on the auspicious eve of the Savior's birth, we follow these stars, they will lead us to the bosom of the christian church. The world was then a barren desert, like the sandy wastes of Arabia. Yet now and then might be found a little oasis, watered by the tears of Christian piety, and embellished with beauty and verdure.

We now come to the period when the clouds and darkness suddenly gave way, and the Sun of righteousness burst in meridian splendor on an astonished world. Aided by Luther and his coadjutors, christianity burst the iron tomb of superstition and error, rose in her might, clothed herself in primeval beauty, and came forth the admiration of the world. The mind, simultaneously awakened from its long sleep of a thousand years, received a stimulus which urged it on through every department of knowledge. The fruits of intellectual enterprise soon appeared, in the discovery of the circulation of the blood, by which the science of human life was wonderfully improved,—of the making of paper, and of the art of printing, by which the means of knowledge were indefinitely extended, of the mariner's compass, by which a new world was raised from the wastes of the western ocean,—and of the telescope, by which were brought to the view of mortals whole systems of worlds, of which the imagination of man had never dreamed. Urged on by its newly acquired impulse, and aided by its preliminary discoveries, the mind seized in its powerful grasp, and reduced to the obedience of established laws, the most wild and ungovernable phenomena of nature. It subdued the elements and took the lightning from the clouds. But it stopt not here. It aspired to a higher sphere. Leaving the borders of its native earth, it visited the moon, measured her mountains, gave her laws, and called her to account for the slightest irregularity. Onward it goes. Jupiter, buried beneath a shoreless ocean, and accompanied by moons, yields to its authority. Saturn, the exiled monarch, is brought under law. Uranus, on the very suburbs of the system, pursuing his way alone through the fields of space, was not permitted to make his journey unmolested, but is compelled to yield. The wandering comet, making its eccentric path through the illimitable ocean of space, to the more distant frontiers of the universe, is sought out in its obscure hiding-place, and ordered back in a specified time. The complete subjugation of the whole solar system was not enough. The dominion of mind extended farther. It asserted its authority over other systems. Its piercing eye detected the most distant star. It arranged the countless systems of worlds in regular order; reduced them all to uniform laws; and secured perfect harmony and implicit obedience. To these worlds, circle after circle, in concentric order, to infinity, the mind gave atmospheres, and seas, and skies, refreshing showers, and reviving sun-shine, seasons, flowers, and fruits, and peopled them with happy inhabitants.

The light which burst at that period upon the world, has never been obscured. Luminary after luminary has arisen. As one after another, shining brighter and brighter to the last, has gone down in glory behind the curtains of eternity, hosts of others have arisen, until the whole firmament is in a blaze. Sons of the church, votaries of science, benefactors of mankind! your names are enrolled in the annals of fame, in blazing letters of eternal light, for the admiration of the human race.

Bow Brook.

[Inscribed to my friend S. C. E. of Shirley Village.]

THERE'S a lovely dell where a graceful stream
Is gliding as bright as a poet's dream;
Now tranquil and still among leaves and flowers
It sleeps through the long, soft summer hours;
Then up, and away, till the calm, blue sky
Looks down where its cradled pebbles lie,
And the sunbeam touches its tiny sand,
Till it gleams like a gem from the fairy land.

There the delicate sweet-briar leans to lave
Her fair, meek face in the silvery wave;
And the wild-vine is weaving her starry crown;
And the celandine throws her gold-drops down;
There the cardinal-flower lifts her head in pride,
As her bright cheek glows in the mirror-tide;
And the beautiful things of the woodland lone
Still follow the path of their roaming one.

But there!—They have given an artist's hand
To the free glad stream of the forest land,
And chained to the noise of the busy loom,
It toils in the factory's dinning gloom;
But its thralldom is o'er; away! away!
Where the sunbeams smile, and the soft winds play,
Again it is singing its wild-wood song,
As it flashes in leaping joy along!

List! list! for those waves to the musing ear
Have spirit-like voices distinct and clear;
There's one speaks of hope, and one tells the tale
Of the young heart's dismay when its gay dreams fail,
And one from the past bids its phantoms appear,
Bringing life's last, and its beautiful near,
And one with a solemn, yet lifting moan,
Is breathing of faith in each trustful tone.

And many an earthlier minstrel there
Flings soft, sweet sounds on the summer air,
And 'tis well that its fragrant hush be stirred
By the gentle voices of bee and bird,
And the insect, whose low, monotonous sound
Accords with the harmonies floating round,
For the pure in soul, and the rich in mind,
A home by those radiant waters find.

Beautiful stream! We are hastening like thee
To an unknown home in a stranger sea;
Like thee may we gather around our way,
The gladdening things of our transient day,
Sweet spirit-voices, and bright spirit-flowers,
With beauty, and balm for the gliding hours,
And, the smile from above on each wavelet's crest,
Serenely pass on to our destined rest. L. J. B. C.

Not Fancy Sketches. No. 1.

JOHNNY JUMBLE.

'FULL well they laughed with counterfeited glee,
At all his jokes, for many a joke had he.'

GOLDSMITH.

JOHNNY Jumble was a school-master, a principal in one of the writing schools in the city of B. He was a sprightly old man, but how old nobody exactly knew. He was called old Johnny forty years ago; and those who knew him then, say that he does not look a day older now.

In person he was short and chubby. His face was as round as the moon, and as white as an egg-shell; and every feature and wrinkle spake good humor in the most unequivocal language. There was something too, really jovial about his round and profusely powdered head, which looked somewhat like a plump peach that had been rolled in flour.

Johnny Jumble was a genuine Yorick, full of jests, and jibes, and jokes. He was seldom angry, and when he was, his anger would be soon over, for he would brush it all away by some funny expression, or laughable witticism. In a word, he had too much humor for a school-master. Its frequent manifestation produced a familiarity between himself and his pupils, which was subversive of all discipline and good order.

Another prominent trait in Johnny's character was avarice; at least, this failing in the old man appeared to great disadvantage in his transactions in the school, although it was said he was quite extravagant in his style of living. But this we know nothing about. And as we profess to sketch only what we have seen and what we know, we let this latter charge pass as mere scandal. That Johnny was tight, as well as good humored, will appear from the facts stated in the sequel.

While in the school-room, he generally sat in an old yellow arm-chair, which arm-chair stood upon the top of an old hair trunk, which trunk stood at the head of the broad isle. This chair and trunk composed what Johnny facetiously called his 'throne.'

'What boy has overthrown the throne?' said he one day as he entered the room, and saw the chair lying on the floor, beside the trunk.—'What boy has overthrown the throne?' he repeated, with emphasis, half in earnest and half in good humor with himself at his successful play upon the word throne.

'Kone done it, sir,' 'Thomas Kone done it,' bawled a dozen voices at once.

'Thomas Kone! stand upon the trunk,' said Johnny, taking off his coat, and slipping on his calico gown, and let me make a truncated cone of you.'

The boy laughed, and took his station on the aforesaid trunk, and Johnny laughed, and took his old red cow-skin, which he had used time out of mind, and which by the way, was called 'the old doctor,' and, giving Thomas two or three smart blows, very near the boy's neck, so as to take off, as he said, 'the head of the cone,' told him to go, and be content with sitting upon the bench, and never to aspire after the business of meddling with thrones; if he did, he (Johnny Jumble) would make an inverted cone of Thomas.

Johnny had a great many humorous things to say about 'the old doctor;' he generally called it Dr. Cowskin, but he declared that if he had to employ it so often in skinning calves, he should be obliged, for the sake of appropriateness, to call it Dr. Calfskin. 'This doctor,' said he one day, as he stood up on the throne, and flourished above his head the worn and battered remnant of what was in its day a very neat and graceful cow-hide, 'this doctor is no fool, boys; he knows a thing or two. He has had a deal of practice in his day, which is much better than all the theories that ever were broached, or all the diplomas that ever were printed or written. This doctor is a genuine practitioner. He is doctor of medicine, doctor of divinity, and last and best of all, he is doctor of laws. He knows when you are out of order, without you're telling him, and will call on you without being sent for.'

A few moments after this speech from the throne, the venerable doctor was seen whizzing through the air, turning over and over, and speeding straight on towards three boys, who were intently engaged in playing push-pin in a remote part of the room. It was a rare thing for Johnny to miss his aim; but he came rather near doing so in this instance. The cow-skin struck one of the offending boys upon the top of his sleek head, but in consequence of nobody knows what, it glanced from the head to a pane of glass in the window, which was close at hand, and shattered it to atoms. When the glass rattled, Johnny Jumble rose from his chair, put his hands in his pantaloons' pockets, stood still four or five seconds, and then gave one long soft whistle with the rising inflexion. This done, he stepped from his trunk, and whistling softly no particular tune, walked slowly up to the place where the mischief was done.

'William Goodwin,' said Johnny, addressing the boy whose head had been hit, and at the same time rubbing the head hard enough to have taken all the hair off, 'have you any pain in this part of your system?' 'No sir.' 'Well, William, there's a pane gone from this window, and I am sure the doctor did not intend to remove it. He intended to produce a pain in the heads of you three boys. And it is painful for me to know, that he has made such a mistake, after taking so much pains to render you a service. Boys,' said he, still speaking to the three delinquents, 'do you bring me five cents each to-morrow, to pay for getting this window mended, and then think yourselves well used to get off so easily.'

With this consolatory peroration, Johnny Jumble walked away, and climbed upon his throne. The next day, the three boys gave Johnny five cents apiece; and the day after that, the cover of an old writing book was found wafered over the broken glass, where it remained till the school-room was repaired by order of the committee, about six weeks after Johnny's painful catastrophe.

That Johnny was a real skin-flint, will be made to appear, when we notice, as we shall do now, his little schemes of financiering. A week seldom passed, without his levying a contribution for some purpose or other. Some new floor brushes were needed, or a new water-pail, or a new watering-pot, or some new drinking cups. There was always something wanting. All Johnny would say, whenever he wanted a contribution, would be, 'Boys, I want you to bring two cents to-morrow, to buy a new pail. Boys that bring two cents, will go half an hour before school is done.' These two brief sentences were sufficient to raise about twice as much money as was needed. What became of the overplus the boys very well knew; but they cared not, since they obtained in their estimation, an equivalent for their money, in the shape of half an hour's play.

But among all these little money-getting schemes of Johnny Jumble, none was more talked about, or laughed about, either in school or out, than the plummet scheme, so called. Plummetts were small pieces of lead, made in the shape of a chisel, and used instead of pencils for ruling writing books. Boys were notified, day after day, for nearly nine months, that plummetts were wanted. And the usual inducement in such case made and provided, was officially announced in the daily proclamation from the throne.

What became of the pounds and pounds of lead put into Johnny's possession, in the shape of plummetts, was a great wonder among all the boys in school, many of whom had exhausted their resources of old scraps of lead and bullets. At last the mystery was explained; the base uses to which these contributions of metal had been applied, were discovered by Thomas Kone. Thomas was one of some twenty boys who were accustomed to go of Johnny's errands, those that were needed at his house, as well as those that were required at the school. One forenoon, in the summer of 18—, Johnny bade Thomas Kone go to neighbor N's and borrow a wheel-barrow, and then carry a bucket of coffee up to the house. Thomas went off with the wheel-barrow and the bucket in it. But what kind of coffee could that be in the bucket, which was so very heavy. The unusual and unexpected weight of this bucket of coffee, excited Thomas Kone's curiosity. He must, he would see it, for he knew, he said, it was bad coffee. With these thoughts in his head, Thomas applied his hand to the cover of the bucket. But it would not come off; 'twas nailed down tight. He could'nt start it the breadth of a hair. 'Ah,' said Thomas, as he told us the story after school, 'ah, then I thought it must be the plummetts; but when I shook the bucket, then I knew it was them.' That Thomas Kone was right, we all agreed when some of the other boys, who had been sent to the house the day after, reported that two stone cutters were at work there, that they had been putting new stone sills into his cellar kitchen windows, and were then engaged in fastening the ends of a new iron grating to the same, by pouring melted lead into the holes where the ends of the bars were inserted.

In my rambles through the city, I sometimes pass Johnny Jumble's old residence. I always pause and look at the two stone sills, and the iron bars, and the little rings of lead that hold them like a vice.

Letters to Elizabeth. No. 2.

RONALDSON'S BURIAL GROUND.

I HAVE many things to say to thee, my friend, of this fair city of the dead, this beautiful cemetery where I so often spend a leisure hour. I would tell thee with what true Philadelphian elegance of taste it is adorned; how sadness and affection here have come to wreath the grave with cypress green, while hope and faith have added brighter flowers; and how many a touching history of surviving love is told in the sculptured marble, or the clustering rose. My first visit to this garden of graves, was on a sunny autumn day, a day in which it is a joy to live. We had walked far, and were wearied, even as many a spirit that hath sought a resting place therein. The monument that first attracted my attention, was one which in its beautiful simplicity has dwelt in my memory since. A broken column of plain white marble surmounted by a wreath of thistles, told that a son of Scotland slumbered there. Was it not very, very beautiful?

Slowly we passed along, now pausing over the low stone that spoke departed worth, and anon admiring the lofty column that had been erected in no deeper love. Many a marble slab told that the glad smile of infancy had departed from the fireside group, and the music voice was hushed amid its frolic glee. At the end of the same walk we lingered by a spot where the hand of affection had been busy, but it was not seen in formal words of eulogy. A sculptured wreath encircled one word,—Charles. It was the inscription of a mourning heart, that required no other remembrance of the grief it would not bid the stranger know. No bud or blossom dwelt around the grave, the cedar only, whispered, 'think of me.' Could the spirit of the loved one, hover near, would it not read the emblem?

A place has been set apart 'to Scottish strangers,' where the countrymen of Burns may find a resting place after life's weary work is done. There is a charm in the very name of Scotland unto me. Well do I remember the fascination with which even in early childhood, 'The Scottish Chiefs' was endowed, and the beautiful sadness of 'Lights and Shadows of Scottish life' has moved me to tears long ere I learned to weep for mine own sorrows. Thou wilt not marvel then, that I should linger long over this last earthly home of the wanderer.

A marble monument, entwined around by the graceful ivy which speaks so eloquently of 'Woman's love,' led us nearer to read the inscription, 'To the memory of Mrs. ——— who died at Richmond, Virginia, aged nineteen.' It was surrounded with soft green moss that in the garden groweth, and a delicate cluster rose, half-unfolded in its gentle loveliness, seemed like a guardian spirit there.

'Ay, twine the rose and cypress wreath,
To shadow forth her doom,
To show how linked are life and death,
The bridal and the tomb.'

We passed on to the spot where mine own friends repose. We bowed to inhale the perfumed breath of many a budding rose, and trained anew the honey suckle that had been thrown down by some rude wind, and was hiding its delicate blossoms amid the grass. Meet is it that they here are seen, for beautiful should be the home of peace.

The day was well-nigh done, and the shadows of evening rapidly gathering around ere we turned to depart. A funeral train intercepted our way, and turning, we sought the open grave, by a shorter path than that in which the mourning train advanced. It was that of a female in the early dawn of life. A short prayer was offered, a few words addressed to the bereaved friends, and earth knoweth her now no more forever. Thus do we pass away from our accustomed places, and save in some few hearts, we leave no cherished memory. There are tears in the eyes of love, a shade of sadness on some friendly face, another pang in some true, sorrowing heart, and we are numbered with the things that were, and are forgot. And were it not a selfish wish, to pray that it might not be thus? Shall we ask fresh tears from 'hearts that ache to bleeding,' lest haply our unworthy names and more unworthy deeds should pass from earth? How much of selfishness is in the heart. Thus musing I left this beautiful burial place, where come so many to yield up their cherished treasures at the bidding of the conqueror, whose name is Death.

Thou, who knowest so well my passion for visiting burial places, wilt not marvel that I returned again and again to visit this lovely spot. I would that every place of graves resembled this, in its quiet beauty, its classic monuments, its budding flowers, wooing the mind to turn from earthly cares, and banishing afar that fear that hath torment, the fear of death. I wished thee by my side, Elizabeth, for my thoughts dwelt upon the day we spent together, 'amid the place of thousand tombs,' our own Mount Auburn, so short a time ere last we said farewell. Here were no hills, nor woods, nor quiet dells, nor sunny isles like that beneath whose willow shade we then spent so blest an hour, but here were shrines on which affection's garlands hang unwitheringly, graves wherein full many a gentle heart hath laid its all of human hope, and fond attempts to save from time's rude hand the memory of the loved.

'Father, if I die, shall I be buried in this garden?' said a gentle child, on whom the hand of sickness had been laid. The simplicity of childhood had given unto the grave-yard a name more appropriate than man with his 'many inventions' has ever bestowed. Let us often walk in these gardens of love, and gather the flowers of peace, and hope, and heavenly trust. 'Shall I be buried in this garden?' I musingly ask, as I wander through its quiet paths. It were a sweet place wherein to rest after life's weary pilgrimage, but methinks I would sleep beneath

'The sky that bent above
My childhood like a dream of love.'

It is not weakness that bids us thus care for this tabernacle of clay, even after its spiritual tenant has departed. It is the impulse of nature, which, however weak, is never all weakness. The red men mourned to leave their fathers' graves, and the pale faces have consecrated many a beautiful cemetery to the memory of buried love. Amid the cities and villages of our land, the burial places are becoming, more and more, the objects of care. They are speaking unto us with a voice we may not forget of 'a time to live and a time to die.'

There is a time to live,—
'Tis while God wills our stay
Amid the sunshine and the shade,
That fall upon our way.
Our Father wills it—be it so,
And may faith nerve each heart,
To bear the suffering and the toil,
That must in life have part.

There is a time to die,—
'Tis when our task is done,
When sorrow borne uncomplainingly
The victor's crown hath won.
When we have trod the heavenward way,
And braved temptation's power,
With hope undimmed and spirits pure
'Mid suffering's darkest hour.

My reverie was interrupted by a joyous laugh from another part of the enclosure, jarring painfully upon my spirit, saddened as it was by the dreamy mood in which I had indulged. Very heartless, indeed, did that mirth seem, until memory recalled the scarce repressed joyousness of spirit with which I first visited Mount Auburn. Now that it hath passed away and may return no more, methinks I never valued aright that youthful gladness over which even the tomb had then no power. When we have given unto the quiet grave, those whom we held most dear, and in the weariness of earth-worn hearts sighed for a rest like them, then, and not till then, do we look upon it as our own home. For how many precious lessons are we indebted to that unpriized teacher, grief. The flowers are withered by the wintry blast, and I may haply not be here to welcome the buds of spring, but Ronaldson's burial ground will long hold a place in my memory.

Written for the Repository.

O Look Not on Me.

O LOOK not on me! pass me coldly by;
I cannot bide the glance of that bright eye!
For I have sought to nerve my soul to bear
Indifference from thee—and to strive to wear
A cheerful mien, to hide the swelling heart,
That sad and lonely, hath in thine no part.
But when thine eye, in kindness meets my own,
My strength of purpose, best resolves are flown;
And I am lured, as by some magic power,
To fondly deem, that at some future hour,
My patient love, will win me thine at last.
But ah! how soon the hopeless dream is past!
Then look not on me! pass me coldly by,
And though the heart be pierced, and filled the eye,
'Tis easier far to bear, than thus to be,
Alternate, wrecked and calmed upon love's sea. C. B.

Comfort in Affliction.

WHEN man is alone in the world, and all hearts which loved him have ceased to beat, and in the bustle of the crowd pressing on in their eager pursuits, there is no one who will remain by him; when his solitary groan arises from the hard couch, and no voice answers, but the heartless echo; his tearless eye seeks in vain for another, and his withered hand tries to no purpose to grasp the hand of another, and the coldness of man tortures him more keenly than the coldness of winter, which penetrates his gloomy chamber; in this chamber, in which so many mourn, there is still one who forgets not the forgotten; who breaks the thorns of pain. There is near the lone sufferer an eye which kindly beams upon him, and a hand which raises him from his bed of straw. Upon the compassionate heart of the Father of men he may repose, as a sick child on the bosom of its mother, and forget all his sorrows in that fountain of unceasing love.

Our Book and Memoranda Table.

[NEW VOLUME. We are making arrangements to do something for the next volume that shall make our work unsurpassed in point of 'typographical beauty by any in the country, and to fender the literary department a rival of any work of a similar character in the land. Look out for the particulars in our next No. We trust our friends and the friends of liberal christianity, will come up nobly to aid in the effort to give more influence to the Repository. We are in earnest.

THE LADY'S ANNUAL REGISTER, and Housewife's Almanac, for 1842. Wm. Crosby & Co. Boston.

We are right glad to see this useful and neat work continued, the present issue being the fifth of the series. It is full of interesting and valuable matter, and is published in a very neat and convenient style. We commend it to the notice of our lady readers.

THE CHRISTIAN TEACHER. This is the title of a monthly work, published in Lafayette, Ia. Erastus Manford, editor. It is published in pamphlet form, 24 pages, and is devoted to the cause of Universalism. The Thomas and Lee discussion is to be inserted—it has been commenced. The editor is a busy man, for we perceive in the list of notices appointments for him to preach in thirteen different places between the 12th and the end of December last. Success to our brother—he is a Man to ford difficult passes.

THE STAR OF BETHLEHEM. This periodical, mentioned in our last, has come forth enlarged and in beautiful style. It is creditable to the Denomination, and we trust it will find a generous support. A. Tompkins is the Boston publisher; E. Case, Lowell, is the proprietor and publisher.

TALES FROM LIFE. By George Rogers. We recur to this neat volume again to say that we hear many expressions of pleasure in its perusal. It finds favor with a large class of readers, and many respond to Br. Waldo's opinion in our No. for August last. These tales are 'designed to illustrate certain religious doctrines and practices which prevail at the present day,' and effectually is this design carried out. Such illustrations as are here given are needed to make men think, and to realize the injurious effects of 'spasmodic religion'—of the wild schemes and worldly policies by which, in the name of religion, the duties of home are neglected and social order is destroyed. 'The Pleasant Rencontre,' and 'Truman Troth's Experience,' are very natural sketches, and we commend the volume to the notice of our friends and readers. We should judge that a large circulation might be given to this work at the South and West, and we trust that measures will be adopted by our brother, the author, to send it far and wide. Published by A. Tompkins, price 50 cts.

THE WASHINGTONIAN; Utica, N. Y. We have received the first No. of a very neatly printed and well filled sheet, to be issued every Friday and devoted to the cause of Temperance on 'Washingtonian principles.' 'Names,' surely, 'are things,' for it would be difficult to discern the right meaning of this name thus applied, without a knowledge of the thing itself—of the Reform it designates. The Washingtonians are right—as God moulded our being with the breath of kindness, they are right; and eternally, regeneration and the law of love will be united. The old reform was good, but not the best; it had too much of the spirit of the priest who passed by the betrayed and wounded, and too little of the Samaritan's fidelity to the promptings of kindness. The old phalanx strove to keep back the advancing hosts from the pit-falls of destruction, but deemed it useless to do anything for those already fallen. 'Keep the young, innocent of the great transgression, for there is no hope for the drunkard,' was the common cry. Hence they spake as those speak of what they despair of, and no faith in the recovery of the vile breathed in their speech. The spirit of the Reform is changed, thanks to God whose glory is his goodness! (Exod. xxxiii. 18, 19.) Man has confidence in the immortality of an improvable spirit—in a resurrection to the 'dead in sins,' and he goes forth beseeching, by 'the gentleness of Christ,' the degraded to arise and enter the army of Light. Our hope is great when we read as a motto for the press: 'There is a chord even in the most corrupt heart that vibrates to kindness.' Here is the right spirit; and now all the study is, to make that spirit manifest in the clearest and most amiable manner, and bring it to bear and operate most effectually, that there may be the music of God in the heart—vibrations, the sensorium of which is heaven. A Washingtonian must feel kind, and to be successful he must be cautious and prudent to embody the kindness he feels in the actions he performs, and there will be a divine power dwelling with him. The Washingtonians have been true to this in reference to the poor inebriate, but have not some of them forgotten the right principle when treating of the producer and seller of ardent spirits? The producer and seller are foes of temperance, whose conversion should be anxiously sought for, and faith in kindness should not falter when they are to be dealt with; the Quaker should not be thrown off when the discussion is to be carried on amid the paraphernalia of ruin.

We perceive the initials of Br. A. B. Grosh appended to several excellent articles, and suppose that his earnest spirit will give aid to the paper in the future. We hope the paper will find good support; it is published by William Allen, Utica, Oneida Co., N. Y. at $1 per year, in advance.

'THE BALM OF GILEAD, and Practical Universalist. We have received the first No. of a very neatly printed monthly periodical of 16 octavo pages, published in Contocookville, N. H., by J. F. Witherell, at 50 cts. per annum, in advance. The design of the paper is good, and the articles in the present No. are of a practical and devotional character. One by Br. J. G. Adams, on Earth's changes and Heaven's immutability, is very excellent.

A COMPANY. Since our last was made up, the 'Nazarene,' Philadelphia; the 'Magazine & Advocate,' Utica, N. Y.; and the 'Gospel Messenger,' Providence, R. I., have commenced new volumes. The form of the first has been changed to quarto, and is well executed. The second is improved with new type, and is vigorously sustained. The last has been enlarged, and is published simultaneously in Providence, R. I., and Worcester, Mass., Br. Landers, of the latter place, having become co-editor with Br. Baker. Add to these the 'Gospel Banner,' which is to be enlarged and altered by improvements, if the people come nobly 'to the raising.' We have no doubt that they will, for Br. Drew has divided the number of subscribers wanted among the counties of the State, and we suppose the people have a true Irishman's love for their 'own county,' and the county-men of each will let no other beat them. Br. Drew can successfully compete with any paper in the order, if the people will give him the means to provide for the outward, transcendently speaking. We wish success to all—and that a pacific spirit may unite us in common aims and ends.

'THE BUILDING SERMON; a Discourse delivered at the dedication of the Universalist Meeting House in St. Stephens, New Brunswick, Sept. 28, 1841. By John Bovee Dods.' This is a discourse, like all the published discourses of the author, full of ingenious and strong thought, truthful remarks, and glowing imagery. The discourse is founded on 1 Kings vi. 2. In the prosecution of his purpose, the author first gives a concise history of the temple, and then speaks of it as being made a figure of the spiritual Temple of which Jesus Christ is the foundation—the corner stone. He then proposes the following particulars, the treatment of which forms the body of the discourse:

'1st. As Solomon executed the plan of the Temple, and prepared all the materials before he laid them in their final resting place, so God had laid the plan of salvation—the plan of the spiritual Temple before the foundation of the world, and moved the human family into existence as the living stones to compose it.

'2d. As Solomon employed all the necessary means to take those stones from the rubbish, and exerted a sufficiency of power to hew, cut, carve, and polish them; as he brought them to Mount Zion, and reared the temple exactly according to the original plan, so God has employed all the means to take the human race from the rubbish of sin and mortality, and has given to his Son a sufficiency of power to prepare them for the spiritual building on Mount Zion above, through a resurrection from the dead according to his original plan.

'3d. As every heart was filled with joy and gladness, and all nations at peace, and as the sound of a hammer, axe or iron tool was not heard upon the house, so in preaching the gospel of Christ there is to be joy, gladness and peace in every heart, and friendship among all denominations; and while this spiritual temple is rearing there is to be no noise, no terror, no dread and alarm; no excitement, slandering and hatred.'

'COUSIN LUCY AT PLAY; 'COUSIN LUCY AT STUDY; 'COUSIN LUCY'S CONVERSATIONS.' These are three more of the Abbot series of Juvenile Books, on the same plan as the 'Rollo Books,' which have been so very popular. They are of an exceedingly interesting character, and will be ever great favorites with the young. The 'Rollo' series was for boys; the 'Cousin Lucy' series is for the other sex; and together they form a beautiful family collection for children. They are all well printed, and the plates are in neat style. B. B. Mussey, publisher.

THE BOY AND THE BIRDS. By Emily Taylor. Here is a little gem of a book, rich in interest, and beautifully illustrated. It is filled with descriptions and lively conversations concerning birds—birds which are ever objects of engrossing interest to children. The plates—quite a number, are colored, and the whole is executed in good taste. We received our copy from B. B. Mussey.

THE FLOWERET. A gift of Love. By Anna Maria Wells. New York; Samuel Colman, 1842. Here is the very prettiest thing of the season, full of sweet rhymes, which make it the child's own book. The beauty of its binding, &c., will incite the owner to keep it with care, while the dear little poems will sound like bird music to cheer the home. We are obliged to Mr. Mussey for the copy sent.

THE COMMON SCHOOL JOURNAL. This semi-monthly publication, under the editorial care of Hon. Horace Mann, is one of the most useful of the day, and has commenced a new volume—the fourth. The editor's opening address is a fine specimen of good writing, and is full of earnest and profound thought. Teachers and parents should patronize this work. It solves for them many serious difficulties, and affords the best hints and suggestions in reference to the right discipline of scholars and children. William Barry is now the publisher, Boston. One dollar a year. Volume commences Jan. 1, 1842.

BABEL BUILDERS, Ancient and Modern; or two chances for Salvation. By Rev. Wm. Andrews. Utica: O. Hutchinson. 1842. This is a small pamphlet of twelve pages, just put into our hands, and we have had no time to peruse it. The idea will be very easily drawn from the title copied. We doubt not but that the discourse is a good one, for the subject. The mention of the idea of two chances of salvation against one, always recalls the conversation of an Universalist and Methodist. The latter declared he had two chances to the other's one, when the former answered, 'My one hope is in the Mercy of God,' and now what are yours? The Methodist did but echo the declaration of his heretic brother, and could not find the supposed or imagined second, or other chance.

BR. GROSH: We tender thee grateful thanks for the generous plea in our behalf in your paper for Jan. 14. Will his 'esteemed correspondent' point out a specimen of what he objects to, as we are ready to show that no tale has been published since we have edited the work, worthy of such condemnation. There may be indirect moral teaching, as well as direct, and was it not thus with all the Savior's parables?

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS. In our last was a most beautiful article which has attracted much attention and drawn forth much commendation, 'Blendings,' by Miss L. M. Barker. Were she aware of the esteem in which we hold her favors, and the pleasure and instruction they give our readers, she would, we think, let us hear from her oftener. Shall we acknowledge a new favor soon?

We have found a poem by Julia, which we supposed had been published, but which has not, entitled, 'My little Bird.' It is a very pretty thing, and shall have a seasonable abiding place soon.

We beg to be excused by S. C. E. if we call attention to the exceedingly beautiful and holy article in this No., entitled, 'A Lesson for the Sorrowing.' It is one of enchanting sweetness, and will be dearer to many than cool dew to a parching flower.

A dramatic piece is required to carry out the idea of our correspondent A. G. L. His poems have merit, but not enough for their length. We thank him for his good opinion. 'Written for the Repository,' was by some mistake left off of the heading of 'The Sad Festival.'

'Lucy Murray,' is a sweet sketch. We must value it for its holy ministry in speaking to us of the beauty of 'a meek and quiet spirit,' active in usefulness. This is the fourth of an excellent series of female characters. They will be continued.

Our readers will be glad to welcome our esteemed correspondent N. T. M. again to our pages. We were afraid that she had become addicted to 'Day-dreaming,' but if so, the dream is broken, and we are made thankful. Her prose article will be found very useful to wake many dreamers. The plaintive strain—'The Lonely Burial,' is full of melancholy music.

'Clara Belville' has considerable merit, but not enough to justify a publication. The authoress should study out her ideal more perfectly, for though her language is good and her style neat, yet the indistinctness of the object aimed at, mars the whole. Her heroine was appreciated as a gentle and devoted being, and if her sorrows, &c. were not understood, the fault was her own—she made no heart her confident, and she is no character to admire.

'The Conquest of Love,' is a poem none should be deterred from reading by its length. It is an earnest plea in full sympathy with the very excellent sketch by Mrs. Broughton, 'Should Love ever Tire?' and with the spirit of our affectionate faith. Shall we hear again soon from Mimosa? We should have given her name with the poem, but her signature hinted that it might not be agreeable. We respectfully decline the publication of the 'Two Mothers.'

We waited patiently and the vision came, and lo! 'Bow Brook' and the inmates of its happy home came all before us beautiful and dear as ever. Verily, 'Bow Brook' in this No. is the sweetest poem we have met with for a long time. Every word is a music note, and its harmony and melody are as exquisite as chiming silver bells heard over a moonlit sea. Many thanks to Mrs. Case for it. We shall wait hopefully for the coming of the other vision. It is sweet to look to the future when we wait for the melting away of distance in the full belief that the coming of the reality will be bright and lovely. There is music now for us, but the jar of the busy city prevents our hearing it; we wait—the notes are floating on the air, and on some of these clear starlit nights we shall hear them. Oh how eager we are to listen.

There is a most excellent sermon in the fine poem, 'Are we slumbering now?' by Miss M. A. Dodd. We hope to receive many such estimable favors.

'Johnny Jumble,' may be one of those articles in which some readers can discern no moral. To us it is not only comic, but conveys an excellent moral; for how many persons are there—ministers even—who love a jest so much as to sacrifice real good to let it off! We have known a sermon spoiled, and a serious meeting ruined, in this way. Johnny Jumble tells us also of the meanness to which avarice inclines its votaries. We hope for the continuance of these sketches.

THE POST MASTER of Warren C. H., Pa., writes us that three copies of our paper sent to that office, are not taken out. S. Brazington owes $6; J. F. Osgood owes $9; and W. V. Follet owes $10.50. Mr. Brazington, the Post Master, writes, says he took the paper one year, and ordered it stopped. It is strange that the paper should be sent three years, and suffered to lie in the office two years! It would be very agreeable to us to have our dues of these individuals.

We give a very rich No. this month, we think—over thirty articles, besides notices—and can assure our readers that our treasury is not, nor like to be, exhausted. We have several good articles on hand.

The Beatitudes;

Or the Elements of Christian Happiness.

CHAPTER IX. SELF-SACRIFICE.

'BLESSED are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.'

OUR Lord was an honest Reformer. He flattered none with great honors and bright results pleasing to worldly ambition. The path of Duty was open to his sight, and he saw the difficulties and trials he would be called to meet, and which must be shared in by his followers. He knew that the spirit of self-sacrifice was the essential requisite to fidelity to life's highest purposes; and that where this was not, there could be no true stability of character, no true heroism of soul. He, therefore, desired to wake a love of goodness and a willingness to suffer for its sake—to meet and bear and conquer all the antagonists of spiritual integrity, clothed in the imperial armor of Light.

As our Lord was about to utter the last Beatitude, he doubtless felt in earnestness of soul, that the virtue he was about to commend was that which alone could shield all others, and preserve their attributes in true perfection and harmony. He blessed the true Heroic. He commended the martyr spirit that knows no evil equal to yielding the sovereignty to error and sin. And, doubtless, at that moment there passed before the mental vision of the great Teacher, the prophets 'who have spoken in the name of the Lord,' and are 'an example of suffering affliction and of patience;' and he realized the fact of history, that human progress has been through paths of persecution. Error in power has alway tyrannized over truth in weakness; and wherever a new truth has been uttered, it has touched self-interest or pride somewhere, and a brood of scorpions has been awakened. As hath been the past, so is the present, and such will be the earthly future; and therefore, the true soul must possess the power of carrying out into society, and preserving there, 'the independence of solitude'—acting out the firm convictions of duty formed when the spirit was undisturbed in its efforts to decide respecting the Right, the True, and the Good.

In the exercise of divine honesty, our Lord plainly made known the perils of discipleship, and how essential was the possession of that spirit of self-sacrifice which counts nought as worthy to be compared with the value, importance, and necessity of Truth. In the previous part of his discourse, he had dwelt on the virtues needed to be cultivated by men in order to prepare them to hear aright his doctrine, and understand the spirituality of his religion; and now he approached the virtue needed to impel them to love the truth for its worth's sake, and be willing to suffer and bear reproach in its behalf. Thus he declared it: 'Blessed are they who are persecuted for righteousness' sake; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.'

That there was happiness in being persecuted, was not the idea of Jesus. The meaning lies deeper than the surface. For to be the object of persecution, could not to a good mind be happiness; and cannot be such to any one save some desperate spirits whose element is a storm, and who are never exulting save when they hear, or fancy they hear, the cracking and splitting of huge fabrics. To the good, the simple fact of being persecuted, is very grievous—grievous because of the revelation thereby made of the unfriendliness of his fellow man—the tyranny over thought—the little estimation of the worth of mind—the weakness of the desire for truth—the pride of opinion, and the power over all the better feelings of our nature held by the spirit of exclusiveness and dictation. To see these revealed, is no pleasant or happy sight to him who loves goodness, who desires truly and deeply the spread of truth; for he knows how these shut up the heart—lock, bolt, and guard it—against the entrance of all that is averse to its long cherished opinions; and if these opinions are connected with self interest, as well as intellectual pride, the Reformer well knows his fate with such an one. It is a trite reference, but ever emphatic to refer to what we are told in the stories of ancient history of a famous robber of Attica, named Proustes. This leader of a great class had a bed on which he placed all his guests, and if they chanced to be short, he would stretch them till they filled it; and if too tall, he would cut and clip them till they were rightly fitted to the bed. How many such beds as that are there now in our world in reference to truths or opinions! If the opinions of a fellow man are according to the fixed rule of the antagonist in power, all is well; but if not, they must be stretched or clipped till they are.

The idea of the Savior to our mind appears to be this: Happy are they who, with true love of goodness, pursue its duties in accordance with the rules I have given, and who meeting persecutions, are by these virtues able to triumph over them, by confidence in the superior worth of truth and goodness, and the Providence of God. He referred to the true spirit of self-sacrifice; that indwelling power that gives to the soul such a lofty idea of duty as to make it willing to meet all and bear all that should step in to deter it from the straight forwardness of Right. Whatever gives this to the soul, may be regarded as a means of its happiness, for this alone can make it triumphant over all the power of the enemy. We are told of a Roman wife who would have her husband die free from dishonor, by not yielding himself a captive to his enemies; and when she saw his faltering looks, she plunged the dagger into her own breast, and as she fell, exclaimed, 'It is not painful!' But how much nobler an heroic spirit does the true and fervent love of truth and goodness give! How often has it nerved the gentle heart of woman to meet the fiercest woes, unshrinkingly in the name of her Lord Jesus to bear the lash and feel the consuming fire, and with her last breath, through her desire to cheer others, sing, 'It is not painful.' And truth has given itself utterance when thus the persecuted sung:

'Let the world despise and leave me—
They have left my Savior, too;
Human hopes and looks deceive me,
Thou art not like them untrue;
Go then, earthly fame and treasure,—
Come disaster, scorn and pain;
In thy service pain is pleasure—
With thy favor, loss is gain.

Soul! then know thy full salvation!
Rise o'er sin, and fear, and care;
Joy to find in every station,
Something still to do or bear!
Think what spirit dwells within thee—
Think what heavenly bliss is thine;
Think that Jesus died to save thee,—
Child of Heaven! canst thou repine?

O in the presence of such a spirit, how mean appear all those distinctions among men which are bought by the sacrifice of christian principle! How weak do those appear who by fashion, popularity and outward interest, are led away from self respect, from devotion to their convictions of right and truth, and who give up inward and distant good, to the petty enjoyments of the hour! How utterly unworthy of our nature is every thing that comes in competition with what christianity demands and enlightened reason enjoins! When—when will the distinction be rightly made by men between the earthy and the heavenly—the sensual and the spiritual!

To be 'persecuted for righteousness' sake,' implies a devotion to Right as perceived by the mind; for the luke-warm, half-way, indifferent disciple, does not often meet persecutions, being like the class of which our Savior spoke when he said: 'He that received seed into stony places, the same is he that heareth the word, and anon with joy receiveth it; yet hath he not root in himself, but endureth for a while; for when tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the word, by and by he is offended.' And of such, after the offence came and they fled, the Apostle John wrote, 'They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would, no doubt, have continued with us; but they went out, that they might be made manifest that were not all of us.' Endurance for the sake of truth and goodness, seems, then, to be the sentiment connected with the last Beatitude, and we are to show how it is connected with human happiness.

In doing this, we must regard as beyond controversy the fact, that truth and goodness constitute the proper element of the soul—throwing around it the only healthy atmosphere of its existence, and promoting, as it is breathed in, vigor, vivacity, and joy. This is the idea that pervades all the Beatitudes—that is the spirit of unity to christianity, and to be recognized as living truth before man can understand the nobility of his nature, the worth of righteousness, the joy of a holy life, and feel within the energy commended and blessed by our Lord.

The cultivation of the spirit of endurance for righteousness' sake, contributes to human happiness, because it gives man one of the best proofs he can have of his own sincerity and depth of principle. When a man sacrifices self-interest to duty, policy to right, and withstands temptations to the sin that doth easily beset him, he has one of the best proofs of the sincerity of his desire to be good, such as nothing else can give him; better proof than mere daily prayer, sorrow for sin, and frequent lamentation over the follies of other men. When we read the biography of a good man placed during his life amid many incitements and temptations to swerve from duty, but who continued on true to righteousness and duty, we feel in our souls a deep reverence for his character, and earnestly desire the same energy of soul. But if we also can trace in his temptations a type of our own, and see in his devotion to goodness and conquests over evil our own adherence to right and victories over the enemy mirrored, do we not have a better evidence of our own desire being deep seated and sincere than can otherwise be given us? It is natural that it should be so. It is but the application of a common rule, that we can know what we can do and resist better by what we have done and resisted, than by any speculations or conjectures. The goldsmith can guess, but the refiner can best decide how much of the precious metal there is in lump of ore and its quality; and it is so with speculation and experience in reference to a man's own goodness. Experience is the Lord's furnace, and the records of the Analyzer's trial and scrutiny are written on the tablet of memory. Happy is that man who can read there encouragements to confidence for the future, for he may feel that the kingdom of heaven is his—the reign of goodness is set up in his heart, and swaying a sceptre over all the earthly and sensual.

Endurance for righteousness' sake gives to man a conscious elevation of character that is grateful to feel. The desire to be great—for exaltation—for dignity not now possessed, may be regarded as a general feeling, though various in its operations and course,—in one leading to the pursuit of the noblest objects of human attainment, while to another it is the spring of foul and infamous deeds. But what is greatness that does not bear the stamp of christian goodness? It is human littleness—a littleness that would have made David, had he possessed it, wear Saul's armor that he might appear somewhat bolder and mightier than reality; in short, it is Oliver Cromwell standing by the side of Jesus Christ. There is no true elevation of character, which is deep seated as consciousness itself, separate from christian goodness, and by no other means can the soul exult as when truth and goodness send to it the report—'We have met the enemy and they are ours.' When the voice of calumny was loud and fierce against Jesus, what calm and soul felt happiness was it for him to feel a conscious elevation of character such as the world could neither give, nor take away. And what must have been the unhappiness of thousands who have heard the most fulsome flattery and high toned praise, while in their souls they knew they deserved the execration of mankind. Mordecai sitting at the king's gate, with all the thoughts of the humbled state of his nation, was happier than Haman at the Queen's feast, with all the honors bestowed on him. One word of applause from conscious goodness, is worth volumes of praise upon actions that never sprang from real desire to do good:—

'More true joy Marcellus exiled feels,
Than Cæsar with a Senate at his heels.'

Devotion to truth and goodness brings happiness from the conviction of the worth of Example. Wealth is power, knowledge is power, and so is character—so is Example power. The great power of christianity on the moral affections lies in the blending of the character of Christ with his doctrine; these united are as apples of gold in pictures of silver, one borrowing from the other beauty and attraction. And is it not a real joy to feel that we are sending abroad an influence for good—that the social power we have is rightly directed—that we are escaping the degradation that must fasten on consciousness from an opposite course? To look around—to mark the subtle and many influences of one upon another, and how society is operated upon by sympathy, will make every one feel the power of character; and as we dwell on the character of a companion, or friend, which has received much of its form and fashion from our own example and influence, will there not be a great difference of feeling if that character is a noble one, than if it is of a miserable caste? We must reverse the very constitution of our nature before we can take any satisfactory enjoyment in sending out into the world the influence of an evil example. When episcopacy, soon after the Restoration, was introduced into Scotland, Leighton was consecrated Bishop of Dunblane. At the time of his entrance into office, Sharp and other bishops intended to enter Edinburgh in an ostentatious manner, against which measure Leighton remonstrated. 'But,' says Sharp, 'how can these men expect moderation from us, when they themselves imposed their Covenant with so much zeal and tyranny on others?' This was said with his usual vehemence and bespoke the intolerance of his soul. Leighton mildly replied, 'For that very reason let us treat them with gentleness, and show them the difference between their principles and ours.' What a difference must there have been in the influence of the example of the two—what a difference of satisfaction; the thoughts of the one fed the wolf that knawed into the heart, but the other quieted the lamb that nestled closely to the heart, or slept sweetly in the bosom of the other.

The very consciousness of having the ability to bear trial for Righteousness' sake, imparts happiness to the true disciple. The enthusiastic artist who meets with difficulties on every side, finds an element of happiness in the thought that the love of his art gives him strength to bear all that comes upon him, and still preserve an elasticity of spirit that nothing can weaken. So it is with every good man engaged in a good work. Over his soul comes sorrow as he meets persecutions, but he is soon relieved and blessed as he gives God glory that he is able to meet them all, and by the love of goodness rejoice even amid tribulations. It is this that gives him true self-reliance. It is by this that he is made to feel secure in his virtue—that when trial comes it shall find him 'strong in the Lord and in the power of his might.'

We have thus considered the elements of christian ambition—Conviction of the depth of principle, elevation of character, goodness of example, and consciousness of ability to suffer manfully for Christ. These give a high aim and purpose to life, spreading out before the mind's vision good and great objects to be pursued, and giving a noble force of character, decision of mind, and expansiveness to the affections. Thus, and thus alone, is the heart wedded to the True and the Beautiful; thus and thus only is a far reaching power of thought granted to the mind; and thus and thus only is true self-approbation secured and enjoyed. This, and this alone, can give the assurance of heaven's high approval, of doing something for the progress of our race, and bringing humanity nearer the Divinity. This, and this alone, fixes the root of goodness down deep in our being, so that it may send its life through every portion of our nature, making us fruitful in the works which are to the praise and glory of God.

Without this spirit, no man could rightly follow Christ in the Regeneration—be his true disciple, and make his the joys of the spiritual kingdom of righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit. Without this, it is the same with man now. The externals are different, but the true spirit of discipleship is the same, as in the days of the Savior. A thousand temptations and evil influences are around us, persecuting the indwelling spirit of goodness; and we need the determination of soul to resist, that can alone give us triumph and make us true to ourselves, Christ, and God. 'Duty!' must be our motto, and all the energies of our souls must be pledged to loyalty. Then shall we know how holy adherence to the right will keep the heart humble and meek, and give to the mind a calm and steady reliance on the Sovereign Good, who will give grace and glory to them that fear him. 'If any man suffer as a christian, let him not be ashamed, but let him glorify God on this behalf; for the spirit of glory and of God resteth upon him.'

We have now finished our meditations on the Beatitudes, and laid open to view the elements of christian happiness. Happiness has been well defined as the 'gratification of our desires within the limits assigned to them by our Creator.' 'Restraint is the golden rule of enjoyment;' and the restraining virtues, which alone can preserve harmony, are those to which the name of Beatitudes has been given. Our happiness depends more upon what we are, than what we have or possess; and it must everlastingly be true, that our chief good is indissolubly connected with fidelity to the endowments of our nature according to the perfect rule of life in Christ and christianity.

'Tis not in books, 'tis not in lears,
To make us truly blest,
If happiness has not her seat
And centre in the breast,
We may be wise, or rich, or great,
But never can be blest.' B.

Implora Peace.

Oh give me peace! The cloud is o'er my way—
Dimly the stars are burning in the sky;
The torch of hope hath lost its guiding ray—
The singing stream is mute, and joy's bright fountain dry.

Oh give me peace! The dove that left the ark,
And found no spot to rest her weary feet,
Returned less gladly to the sheltering bark
Than I would seek, Oh Peace! thy lowliest retreat.

Oh give me peace! And is it, Death, with thee
That I must find the refuge Life denies?
I murmur not—so let the mandate be—
No grief remains to him who on thy bosom lies.

Prayer—Its Object. No. 3.

It must be granted that man is perfectly dependent upon a higher Power than himself. His being is a gift, and it is preserved by an energy dealt out to him by the Almighty. The food he eats, the air he breathes, and the light he enjoys, are blessings coming from the 'Father of lights,' from whom comes every good and perfect gift which we enjoy.

Man is a pensioner upon God—he is 'a mendicant supported alone by the charity of the Giver of all things.' But it has been asked notwithstanding this entire dependence, what is the object in praying to God, since he is immutable in all his ways, and cannot be altered by our entreaties, or by any circumstance whatever? There are many who pray to him, as though he was a being filled with wrath, and that they expected to avert his displeasure by supplication. They seem to act as though he, 'in whom there is no variableness or shadow of turning,' could be wrought upon in the same way that frail man can be, and grant their requests, even though they might be contrary to his purposes, and contrary to their happiness. And there are those, who, instead of offering their petitions in a calm and serene manner, break forth in a fanatical eloquence, reminding one of the account given of the prophets of Baal, when they cried from 'morning till noon, saying, Oh Baal hear us. But there was no voice, nor any that answered.'

Then Elijah said, 'Cry aloud; for he is a god, either he is a talking * * * * or he is on a journey, or peradventure he sleepeth, and must be awaked.' The objects of prayer cannot be effected in this way and by such means. There should be nothing like fanaticism in our worship, and in all our devotions, reason should bear rule, instead of a feverish excitement. The sincere desire of the soul is just as acceptable to God, as though it was vociferated by ten thousand voices, and all the objects of prayer are accomplished, so far as the individual is concerned, if it is only felt in the heart, whether it be uttered or not.

Prayer is not designed to change the designs of God, or to affect him in any sense whatever, but to affect ourselves; not to alter his purposes, but to bring our minds in unison with them; not to bring him down to us, but to lift our souls up to him. Dr. Blair says 'The change which our devotions are intended to have is upon ourselves and not upon the Almighty. Their chief efficacy is derived from the good dispositions which they are calculated to raise and cherish in the human soul. By pouring out pious sentiments and desires before God, by adoring his perfections, by expressing our dependence upon his aid, our gratitude for his past favors, our submission to his will, our trust in his future mercy, we cultivate such affections as suit our place and situation in the universe, and are thereby prepared for becoming reconciled and happy.' The blessings or objects of prayer, like most other blessings we enjoy, are secured by certain means. When these means are employed in a right manner, the object for which they were made is effected, and this granting blessings when these means are thus used, and withholding them when they are not, does no more imply a change on the part of the Deity, than granting the husbandman a crop when he ploughs and sows his ground, and withholding it, when he does not, implies this change. He has promised 'seed time and harvest' only upon the condition that proper means are taken to produce a harvest; and so he has connected the benefits of prayer with the proper employment of the right means to effect such blessings.

'Prayer, like hope, may be compared to an anchor. Let the anchor of a vessel be cast upon the shore, it will not draw the shore to the vessel, but the vessel to the shore. Let the anchor be cast into the bottom of the harbor, it attaches the ship to the bottom, and not the bottom to the ship. So prayer draws the soul to God, and fixes it there, instead of drawing the Deity down and fixing him to the soul. The anchor of prayer as well as that of hope, "entereth into that within the veil." The objects of prayer are very great, and properly considered, it is the food of the soul. It draws out the mind in all that is lovely, beautiful, and good, in all that is amiable in life and excellent in religion and virtue. It prepares us for good and great ends. In health and affluence it sweetens the cup of human happiness, in temptations it shields us from harm, in trials it supports and comforts us, in sickness it is a solace, and reconciles us to our lot, in the hour of death it calms the soul and prepares us to die in peace, and in every condition in which we are placed, prayer improves the heart and makes us happy.

Let us 'pray without ceasing,' pray for all men, 'without wrath and doubting,' and in all things give God our hearts, our affections, and our most humble thanks.

The Parable of the Prodigal Son.

WHILE there is a pulse of life left in the great heart of humanity, the sentiment of the parable of the 'Prodigal Son,' like the spirit of christianity, will be admired and loved. Its beautiful imagery and its vivid contrasts of life and character, and its wondrous condensation of thought, will ever give it power to please the imagination, to awaken deep feeling, and bid the purifying waters of holy emotion to well up in the soul and freshen the world of thought. It is like a beautiful landscape—'ever charming, ever new,' as it is looked upon in the various moods of mind and from different points of perspective. It has a marvellous facility of affording gratification and good to the members of each of the relations of life; and the prodigal in his departure from home, his wanderings, his betrayal, his abode in the strange land, his loneliness and miseries there, his yearnings for home, his remembrance of the plenty there, his resolving to return, his journeyings, his thoughts as he travelled, his meeting with his father, his penitence and the parent's love, his entrance to the home of his youth, and his gladness there,—in all these, the prodigal is an object of intense interest to thousands. The father, the mother, the brother, the sister, the betrothed, and the friend, each have their peculiar reflections as they look on each of the several incidents of the pathetic recital; and our common humanity triumphs in the strong interest each feels for the wanderer and the returned.

Who does not pity the foolish son as he leaves the home and country of his youth? Let us thus pity every wanderer from innocence—the spirit's home, and echo the pleasant voices of that home in the simple ear of the misled.

Do we lament that he knows but little the real use of the portion given him? Let us seek for more of practical wisdom, and own that the father's thrift, experience and acquaintance with the use of times and circumstances, cannot be portioned out to him who leaves him for strangers. Would that this could be given to the children, rather than estates, gold and silver!

Do we mourn that in wicked revelry and mirth he seems to find enjoyment, and do we weep that he is spending 'his substance,' the real, as well as artificial wealth? let us condemn ourselves that we do not discriminate better between the corruptible and incorruptible treasure—between the cultivation of that which will fill the mental chambers with all 'precious and pleasant riches,' and that which only makes us of those who are wise 'in their generation'—for the present and not in view of the future. We ask too often for a portion of outward wealth—for what we deem our share, and show thus that our affections are too closely wedded to glittering dust. We have too little faith in the fidelity and goodness of our Father—that he will meet out what we need, and give us what we can use for real good, and therefore we want to see our portion set aside and marked, deeded and delivered, and then we think we shall feel it is ours. Poor souls! we little know what we ask! Were God to answer all our prayers, ours would be far worse than the prodigal's fate; we should soon expend our portion, and then we should remember our Father. Better is it for us in contentment to love, serve and trust Him, than to be 'wise in our own conceits.'

But I cannot minutely follow the wanderer and record my reflections, as space forbids it. I pass over all till I behold the son wending his solemn way towards home; and from the height whereon, in thought, I stand, I behold the father coming forth from his mansion, again to ascend the hill to look out in hope to catch the sight of his son's form amid some of the winding paths in the distance. O God! how many times has he ascended that hill and stood stretching his vision far abroad—one hand shading his tearful eyes from the scorching sunlight, and the other hand ready to beckon the traveller on. He had gone out there when the first light of the morning gilded the highest hills, and bared his reverend locks to the cool breeze, to fan the brow heated by the flush of hope, the fever of fear, and the toil of the ascent; and there he has stood, and looked and looked, and prayed and prayed, till the horn of the mansion sounded for the morning repast. As he replaced the turban on his head, its shadow was far less dark on his countenance, than the shade which passed over his soul, as he turned his steps homeward without his son—the wanderer, yet the loved! Even in the heat of noon, he has travelled up the steep height and sat under the broad-leaved palm, and looked out till his eyes ached and his brain grew hot; and then he would bow his head upon his palms and think of God and pray for patience. He would dwell on the long-suffering and gentleness of the Parent of all towards prodigal Israel, and his heart would gain new strength. Again he looked out, till the peasants had all returned, and the last rays of sunset were dying away on the mountains. Poor man! he must again return, and suffer another night 'the stern agony of thought.' O where is he—what roof is it that shelters his head to-night, and who are his companions? Often would he awake at night and leap from his couch, as some noise startled him, as though some one sought entrance, or from the vividness of a dream that too cruelly and successfully mocked his desire. The morn again comes, and once more he goes to the height; again he returns as before, and the food is only tasted to hide the sickness of the heart. He walks about his grounds in abstraction—he is lost amid the most familiar occupations, and his answers often betray the absentness of his mind from all around—that his spirit is searching after his youngest son. The noon is passed, and again he would toil up the mount of prospect. He is on the height, and again he gazes rapidly all over the various paths where human feet have trod. Again his heart dies within him, and with a vacant stare he faces the centre road. Now, he throws down his staff, and locks together his fingers as close bars to form a shade to his aged eyes, and lo! there is a man advancing—now he rises in full sight, and the father cannot be deceived—he runs, he leaps as when in his youth he hunted the deer, and now he clasps the neck of his son—he kisses him, and the full heart baptises the repentant with the sacred waters of love! O holy sight! the seraphim crowd in to the circle of the rejoicing angels that hover above—one, with rapt and uplifted face and clasped hands, adores the Mercy which has recovered the sinner—another fans the burning heart of the father lest it break in its excess of joy—another whispers to the son's spirit to confess all, and tell the whole story and the solemn lessons of his wanderings—another bids him to offer now his deep felt vow to resolve to tread with firm step the path of duty—another brings to his mind the image of an earthly, yet divine angel whom he may win to be his own, and all of them do a part to bring the 'heaven' that 'lay about him in his infancy,' again to circle him with a beautiful world. Happy Son! blessed Father! I gaze on ye with moistened eyes, and my heart beats quick in sympathy with yours. I will learn more of the divine lessons of parental anxiety and its deep springs, and I will ask for a more truly filial heart! Let me appreciate more the love of earth, that I may know more of heavenly grace; and when my Father looks out from 'the high and holy place,' may He see me in the valley of industry, or in the home of quiet happiness and repose, or in society to do good, or in the temple to praise his adorable perfections and pray for the everlasting benediction. Amen.

My little Bird.

Now, welcome back, my little bird,
Oh, welcome back to me,
And welcome to thy pleasant home
Upon the green-wood tree.

I fain would ask thee, what has kept
Thy truant wing so long,
While we have listened many an hour
All vainly for thy song.

Sure from a home so fair as thine,
Thou couldst not wish to rove,
For the summer in its loveliness,
Is over all the grove.

Its spirit dwells amid the flowers
Which all around us spring,
And echos in the tuneful notes,
Which through the forest ring.

It dwells amid the bending boughs
And in the sparkling stream,
Which dances on its pleasant way,
Beneath the sunny beam.

Why from a scene so beautiful
Shouldst thou desire to stay,
And leave the nest which thou hadst built
In thine own skilful way?

Some cruel cage must sure have kept
Thy wandering wing from me,
And thou hast come with gladsome note,
Now thou again art free.

My Father, at thy throne above,
Now may my prayer be heard,
And may my heart a lesson learn
E'en from this little bird.

Thus if within the paths of sin,
My spirit e'er should roam,
And fettered by guilt's chain should dwell
Far from its heavenly home:

May strength to break its prison bars,
By thy kind care be given,
And joyful may it seek again
The love of truth and heaven.

Thoughts and Hints.

REAP and Winnow; Sow the Wheat and Joy in the Harvest.

I.

IN the preface of a certain work designed to create 'a movement' in the theological world, the author confesses his fear that some portions of his work would be misunderstood, because the reader would not know the qualifications which existed in his, the author's, mind, and which governed or limited the meaning of some expressions or positions. This is a very safe retreat, for if absurdity, or inconsistency was clearly discoverable in the production, the answer would come—It only seems so, and if you had the qualifications which exist in my mind, you would perceive the harmony of the whole. This is a foolish reserve, but it affords a useful lesson to all preachers, teachers, and indeed to all who ever attempt to unfold principles and justify any controverted position. They should be careful to qualify correctly all they set forth, that the limits or extent of an assertion may be properly understood. This would prevent many a serious and long continued war of words, in public controversies and private circles of conversationists or debaters. The sophist trusts much to the use of equivocal words and terms; the man of truth leans on correct ideas, and pleads for principles.

II.

The complacency with which some men consider the future life, while acknowledging perpetual evil as well as good, is sometimes a matter of astonishment. They seem to have never dreamed that they may be of those who they fancy are to be ever in abodes of wretchedness, and therefore they ask Death to strike and Eternity to open its portals for the freed spirit. If there is really the dark uncertainty hanging over the fate of man till a great day in the far future, as is commonly asserted, it surely becomes those who receive the idea, to be less bold in the exultations of the spirit imagining eternity. Humility should teach them not to clothe themselves too quickly in an angel's robes, as there may not be any for them.

III.

A certain theological writer, 'of the contrary part,' says: 'How often has God manifested that he can change the hearts of men by apparently feeble motives or means. How often has a word, a sentence, a perfectly familiar expression or thought, been set home upon the mind with such new interest and power, that conversion has been the speedy consequence. All such instances go to show that, in a world like this, God can never want motives with which to operate in turning the hearts of sinners to himself.' To this we would add, that in no world, or state of being can God want for means to turn sinners to himself; and who can declare with positiveness, that the new birth of the soul into an immortal life, will not afford motives enough to make it a child of God? 'Death is' not 'a mere physical change.' It is nowhere spoken of as such in the scriptures; and if it were a mere physical change, are we prepared to deny that moral changes attend important physical changes? We cannot; for we reflect too much on the moral benefits of sickness, of seasons of pain and distress, to declare that great physical changes are merely such, reaching not to the spirit. What changes has the breaking of a limb produced? Sir Walter Scott tells us in some of his letters, that his whole life, every current of his intellectual being, was changed by the accident that maimed him and confined him to the house—compelling him to seek in books, which he disliked before, relief from the tediousness of confinement. Will death be a mere physical change to the idiot, whose soul has been like a Mozart, confined to the use of an untuned and untunable instrument? It is presumptuous in any mortal to decide what is the extent of the agency of death. It is one of God's universal agents; and as such we can believe it to be ordained in goodness—that by it his wisdom, as well as his power, will be manifested; and in the hope of glory 'wait till our change come.'

IV.

The Psalmist acknowledged himself once as envious of the seeming prosperity and rest of the wicked; but so ashamed was he afterward of his feelings at that time, that he declared he was 'as a beast,' so ignorant was he of the true relations of the Right. Yet many now echo his envious speech, and forget his after repentance. Many now proclaim much about the prosperity and ease of the wicked; but if they know anything of vital godliness and heartfelt piety, they know that what they say is all fiction—the breath of half-uttered truth. What more daring impiety is there, than to openly declare, with earnestness, as many do, that the wicked are happier in following the suggestions of licentiousness, than the righteous in the obedience of virtue. Let us look at some facts in reference to this declaration.

And, first, it is a fact that no parent is willing to teach his or her child so. It is a fact, that we honor the man of virtue as we cannot the vicious; we can and do depend on the one as we cannot on the other; and we readily admit that a general imitation of the one would perfect society, while a general imitation of the other would destroy the social fabric and pollute every altar of good. It is a fact that we are glad in nothing so much as in virtuous thoughts and deeds, when we review the past. It is a fact that only by the cultivation of virtuous feelings and affections, by pious thought and deed, can we nourish sympathy with divine things, and awaken in the soul the strength necessary to climb the Mount of Prospect and behold, with anointed eyes, the glories of the new Jerusalem.

Consider the Virtuous and Vicious as individuals—strive to penetrate to their secret feelings, or correctly suppose what they must be; consider them as members of society, and question the influence of their examples; consider them in sickness and when death is nearing, as life is reviewed with solemn thought and feeling; and then consider the memory left—the difference in the legacies they leave for the living;—gather the impressions of these varied reflections, and never more will thou forget 'the exceeding sinfulness of sin,' or the heavenly beauty of heart-dictated obedience of God's law of Right and Duty. B.

To a Friend, on the Death of her Husband.

HE has vanished from among us! and oh, why should we mourn,
When earth's frail ties, however fond, are thus asunder torn;
Why should we seek to hold him here, from mansions of the blest,
'Where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest.'

And yet it is a grievous thing, when cherished friends are torn From our embrace, by death's cold grasp, and hurried to
'that bourne,
From whence no traveler yet returned,' to paint the glorious rest,
Of those who labored here for Christ, and now with him are blest!

He has left his earthly dwelling, and thine eyes are veiled in tears,
For him, in whom were garnered up the hopes of many years;
The husband of thine early love,—the kindest and the best,
He has past through many a weary scene, and now has gone to rest.

A brighter, happier home is his, and yet we wept for him,
When the golden bowl was broken, and the lamp of life grew dim;
But richest comforts soothed our hearts when to his side we crept,
And let the tears of friendship flow—we know that 'Jesus wept!'

And mourn not for the fatherless!—thou hast no cause for fear,
The widow's, and the orphan's God, will be thy helper here;
And when thy race at length is run, with him mayst thou be blest,
'Where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest.'

Cunning is not Wisdom.

THAT worldly wisdom so often spoken of in the Holy Scriptures, may be denominated low cunning—a phrase which is generally understood pretty well, but which we are too apt to confine to paltry transactions in business; while, in truth, all worldly wisdom may be considered no better than low cunning.

I am sorry to be under the necessity of saying that even these paltry transactions in business, and crafty speculations of the most contemptible character, sometimes receive the applause of those who make professions of piety. As I wish to be fully understood, I will illustrate this by a few examples. The following is a fact, and I am afraid that such occurrences are frequent. An orphan girl was brought up in the family of her uncle. This family professed to be pious—even the children were deeply imbued with a regard for the outward forms and ceremonials of religion; while the parents would as soon have thought of setting fire to their own house as to neglect their attendance at church on Sundays. Nevertheless, the orphan girl who was thrown upon their hands—notwithstanding that sufficient property was left for her support, all of which was in the hands of the uncle—yet she did not receive from them that attention which she merited; but her guardians were ever prone to institute invidious comparisons between her and their own children. She was a child of remarkable candor, and would, at any time, have suffered herself to be wronged, sooner than to deceive or take advantage of another. But, strange to say, these high professors of religion regarded this trait as an evidence of her want of intellect! They thought she was not so 'smart' as other children, because she would not take advantage of their ignorance, when she had an opportunity to do so. Reader, will you be kind enough to apply a searching examination to your own heart—to look over your own line of conduct, and see if you can discover anything of this disposition in yourself. If so, be assured that your professions of religion are worthless—totally worthless—for you are still in the gall of bitterness, and the bonds of iniquity.

But to proceed;—on one occasion, a lad much older than the orphan, and son to her guardians, offered to purchase some articles of her which she valued, but which she was willing to exchange for a book owned by her cousin. He produced the volume, and took the articles, and exulted immediately in his 'good bargain.' The book had been torn and soiled, so that it was of no value at all. The trustful little girl found, too late, that she had been duped, and she burst into tears—tears of disappointment and wounded sensibility; but the mother and sisters of the lad did not reprove him for his act of deceit—they rather smiled as though he had manifested a commendable tact and ingenuity, while at the same time they jested the little girl, as if she had been guilty of a want of sagacity in permitting herself to be deluded in this manner!

This may appear like a very trifling occurrence to some of my readers, but straws show the direction of the wind. Our Lord gave the clearest and strongest precepts against 'small sins,' and the Psalmist was wise in praying to be guarded from 'presumptuous sins'—those sins which people presumed to commit from deeming them of little consequence. And here is a folly to be guarded against, for indulgence is ruinous to the formation of a well balanced character. Who could wonder if the lad, thus unreproved for an act of consummate meanness, should, in riper age, become a swindler of his fellow men—a grinding and marble-hearted oppressor of the poor! But the people who thus encouraged him to persevere in so injurious a course, were very pious—in their own way. They would as soon listen to a speech from Satan incarnate, as to hear the doctrines of impartial grace promulgated by a preacher of the truth.

I was privy to another instance, in which a lad received great praise from his pious parents for working himself into a profitable situation, at the expense of the unsuspecting youth to whom it was first promised. This is a common sin of 'low cunning.'

But these cases are, by no means, rare; and it is only when they are enacted on a large scale, that they lose the name of 'low cunning,' and are regarded as the mark of great talents for diplomacy.

'There is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding;'—but that understanding which comes from this high source, is not the knowledge of duplicity. That is the wisdom that cometh from beneath. The wisdom that comes from above, never taught one person to overreach his neighbor, or to take advantage of his simplicity—which simplicity, by the by, may be the result of candor too open and sincere even to suspect the intentions of others.

Much is said, in the christian Scriptures, about the wisdom of this world. We are told that 'the children of this world are wiser in their generation, than the children of light.' What are we to understand by the phrase, 'in their generation?' Simply that the knowledge which answers for present purposes is possessed by them, to a great degree. The short-sighted wisdom which leads one to take advantage of existing circumstances, in order to secure a present gain—but the end whereof is darkness and death—is possessed by the children of this world: while those who are imbued with the spirit of Christ, are governed by those high and immutable principles, which, although they may seem, for the present, to promise little success in our selfish speculations, and even to be adverse to them—are the only means of obtaining that happiness which endeth not. Those who have tried this wisdom, and who have forsaken the supreme love of houses and lands, fathers, sisters, and mothers to obtain it—who have sold all to purchase this pearl of price, feel no disposition to return to the sensualism from which they have been delivered. They feel that they are saved already—and that the kind of happiness which proceeds from well-doing, is eternal in its nature.

Those who are willing to gain wisdom of God, do not ask in vain—yet wisdom will not be vouchsafed to them from above, any farther than they are willing to use it. Like the manna which fell in the wilderness for the children of Israel to eat, it will be sent no faster than it is made use of—and like that manna, it cannot be hoarded up for future use. Those who would learn of God, must obey his will. They must live upon the knowledge thus obtained, or their eye will be darkened.

If we do, in things convenient, walk by the law of the Lord; and in other matters, consult only that selfish wisdom which is from beneath, we shall make poor progress in the way of salvation. If any man have not the spirit which was in Christ, he is none of his; and if he have that spirit, it will be as a lamp to his feet, and as a chart by which he will direct all his ways. Being under the law of grace, he will no more commit sin; for the truth will be a continual spring of living water in his heart.

It will be impossible for an individual while under the influence of that wisdom which cometh from above, to be a diplomatist in great matters, any more than in small ones. It will be his aim to do right, fairly, candidly, and openly. He will have no secrets—no covert plans. He will be a stranger to intrigue, in all its forms. He will not use speech that only persons of a certain class can understand—but his will be 'the gift of tongues,' that his thoughts may be made known to all the different nations of the earth, irrespective of condition or character. True wisdom cannot exist in connection with disguise—while the wisdom of this world is dependent upon craft and private speculation. 'Thinking themselves wise men become fools;' but we must make ourselves 'fools for Christ's sake,' before we can have true wisdom.

Simplicity of heart and conduct is the trait of the true christian: and no man can enter the kingdom of heaven until he becomes even as a little child.

Lake Erie.

BY T. B. READ.

I've wandered by the stormy lake
And heard the wild waves roar:
I've seen the white caps madly break
Along the rugged shore.

I've heard the sea bird's thrilling scream—
The thunders rolling by:—
I've seen the livid lightnings gleam
Along the angry sky.

I love the storm that wakes the sleep
Of Erie's sullen rest:
It sympathizes with the deep
Emotions of my breast.

Brotherly Kindness.

If there is one virtue needed upon our earth, if there is one which shines brighter, and glows warmer, and more adorneth the heart of man, than any other, it is brotherly kindness; or that charity to our fellow man which suffereth long, and teaches us to do unto others as we would that they should do unto us. 'Be ye kind one to another with brotherly love,' saith the Apostle. We are all travelers on the same road, ought we not to mutually endeavor to make the way pleasant? We have all one Father, ought we not to love each other as children of the same great Parent? But how often do we forget these truths, how often do we let our anger kindle against our brother, and treat him harshly and unkindly. 'If thy brother offend thee forgive him, not until seven times, but until seventy times seven.' Deal gently with thy erring brother, thou knowest not how great hath been the temptation, nor how much, nor how long he strove with the tempter ere he fell. Deal gently with him, a word of kindness may bring him a penitent at thy feet, while a harsh rebuke will but harden him in the way of transgression. Judge not harshly, hadst thou stood in his place, surrounded by the same temptations, thou mightest have fallen even lower than he.

There is a spirit abroad in the world which is much at variance with the spirit of brotherly kindness. We see it manifested but too often even by those who stand in high places, and who perhaps are unconscious of the feeling they are fostering in their bosoms. It hath its origin in envy. We have seen it in children; he who stands at the head of this class is envied by those below him, and to envy succeeds unkindness, taunting words, and at last hatred. The heart that will cherish these feelings, that will let indignation rise from such causes as these, has but little of the spirit of brotherly kindness and charity. What if our God hath given to another higher gifts than to ourselves, should we let our evil passions rise against him on that account? And upon how many warm, young hearts hath the unkind spirit manifested by its fellow man fallen like the blight and the mildew, till it was fain to say that the world was cold and unfeeling, and that its praise was so filled with hatred and envy, that it turned away in disgust and disappointment.

How many of the best and noblest emotions of the soul it hath chilled and stifled in their very birth! How many good feelings and glowing hopes and ardent aspirations it hath laid in the dust! How many a heart hath it turned from its pure and holy worship, to bow down to earthly idols and images of clay! Ay, this spirit of unkindness, this meeting the young warm heart with coldness and selfishness, this uncharitableness to our brother man, how much, how very much hath it to answer for. More fatal hath it been to the aspirations of genius and the love of the good and holy, than the cold hand of poverty, or even the dark spirit of persecution!

I have an instance—a sad one, within my mind even now. May it prove a warning to others. It is of one who came from the halls of learning with a heart glowing with a love of the holy gospel it was his to proclaim—a soul lit up with the fires of genius, a temper joyous and sunny, and a frame vigorous and spirit buoyant. He went forth into the world, it was to him bright as his own imagination. True there were frail, sinful beings within it, but his heart glowed with the love of God, and the good that he should do to those erring ones. He started in life with his heart and soul glowing with these noble feelings, and how did he succeed? Years passed on, and the young brow was furrowed with care, and the heart saddened by disappointment. His noble powers, and the use he made of those powers, had made him enemies—enemies where he had looked for friends, and unkindness where he had looked for love, and the spirit of bitterness and uncharitableness where he had looked for brotherly kindness and affection.

Those to whom he had looked as co-workers, had envied his great powers and talents; and first came the sly hint, the whispered fear, that though he was a beautiful orator and writer, yet his light would be brilliant and dazzling, but soon to sink in obscurity; and then it was whispered that he preached from motives of fame alone, that it was the world he worshipped, and not his God; and some said he was too theatrical for the pulpit, too high flown, common minds could not understand him; and thus they went on. He found his highest motives had been misunderstood, his noblest purposes treated with unkindness. He looked back to the time when he had entered upon life's stage with all his hopes of usefulness and greatness. He sighed to think how the followers of Christ had turned from their true path, how they had forgotten the plain precept, Be ye kind one to another, tender hearted, forgiving one another. His was a sad story, a tale of hopes crushed, and noble powers but imperfectly brought forth. Had it not been for brotherly unkindness he might have shone far brighter, he might have stood far higher. But his heart was sensitive, he sunk beneath the spirit of unkindness, and the last time that I saw him, the brow was furrowed with care, the hair prematurely grey, and the heart saddened and humbled. Yet he was true to his God, and his life had been useful, and many a widow and orphan's heart had blessed him; and among the names of the blessed and the useful, his name will shine among the brightest.

Ministers and followers of Christ! ye who profess the gospel of love, ye who are followers of the Lamb, the meek and lowly Jesus! Be ye kind one towards another, with brotherly love. This spirit of unkindness and uncharitableness, cast it from you, as ye would aught that is evil; let it find no place in your hearts. Already we fear it hath found too much of a place there; but search your souls now, and if there remain aught of the bitter spirit, pray to your God for strength to resist it. It is more deleterious to the spread of the gospel you love, than the strong hand of persecution or oppression. And moreover, it is highly sinful. A minister of the meek and lowly Jesus cherishing a spirit of unkindness to his brother man, it is a contradiction in terms. Treat your brother, just entering the business of life, with kindness, cover his faults with the mantle of charity, and love and encourage his virtues. Let your example incite him to action, and be to him a brother; and to him who has borne the heat of the day, look up with reverence. He has grown grey in the service of his Master, look kindly on his little foibles, if he has them, be kind to his infirmities, and love him as one who has borne with much tribulation for the gospel's sake.

As you hope that the gospel will have free course and be glorified, as you hope that your labors will be rewarded, and the world made the better for your having lived in it, as you hope that you will be beloved by your fellow man, cherish the spirit of charity, and let brotherly love continue.

The Good Old Man.

THE following stanzas were suggested by Russell's beautiful and popular ballad of 'The Old Wife.'

THOUGH time, alas! has changed thy locks, from glossy brown to grey,
And thy proud, and manly form is bent, with age and slow decay,—
Yet true and tender, is thy heart, as when we first began
To tread life's path together, my faithful, good old Man.

A bright and joyous day was that, when in the bloom of youth,
With love and hope unchecked and free, I plighted thee my truth;
Thine have I been for many a year, yet never in that span,
Has murmuring word escaped thy lips, my dear, my good old Man.

And happy is the life we've led, tho' like an April day,
Where clouds and sunshine, smiles and tears, have held alternate sway;
But sunny hours have triumphed still, and grief been under ban,
For tears were never welcome guests, with thee, my good old Man.

And through the ever-changing scenes, that chequer human life,
Most blessed have I deemed my lot, since I became thy wife;
What need of words?—thou knowest well, the love language began,
And dearer than the bridegroom was, art thou, my good old Man!

A liberal mind is a giant in defence of right.
BEWARE of the tale-bearer when he goeth out among friends: his mask is hidden under guise, and he treacherously bears the sayings of the company with an evil report, and the fruit thereof is seen and felt by many an aching heart.

The Minister's Wife.

SOME considerable time since, we penned an article, intending to set forth what the Minister's Wife should be unto the people, or in her peculiar relations to the church. (Vol. viii. p. 201.) We carried out but a part of our plan, as we intended, as we now intend to reverse the theme, and treat of what the people should be unto her. We recur to the subject, impelled by the perusal of an earnest letter. This we deem of vital importance to the success of ministerial effort; and it is a matter to which but very little consideration is usually directed. We have heard addresses given to societies in reference to their duties to their minister, when we have known a great and pressing necessity for some pungent allusion to our theme; but not a word was dropped whereby we could draw evidence that any one save the installed brother was remembered. Our people are well enlightened on the subject of reciprocating pastoral duty and care, if we may judge from the number, frequency and length of addresses designed for this purpose. And it may be said that the minister's companion should not be made a public character, and also installed, and that she would not desire it. Neither should we, in the sense with which such language is generally used. We do not ask for her a place in the desk, but in the hearts of the people; we do not wish that she should be permitted to throw aside the retreating delicacy which is woman's peculiar ornament, but we do wish that the peculiarities of her lot might be understood, and her variety of griefs lessened. And while we speak of the minister's wife, we have in view the true character of such, and dwell only on such as sincerely and solemnly desire to be useful; who would put forth the utmost effort for the advancement of the truest interests of the church, and be a spiritual sister to the believers of her own sex. We think of such as received the blessing of Jesus, and who were commended by the Apostle Paul. Few who have not made it a special matter of investigation, can be aware how much is said in the Apostolic narratives and epistles respecting the healthful influence of woman in the church, how often she is commended, and how frequently affectionate regard is asked for her from the disciples. As in that age, so in the present, her influence should be acknowledged and respectfully valued. Thus would she be encouraged to cultivate greater fitness, and her sisterly affection would breathe out a richness of fragrance that would fill the atmosphere of the church with the odors of paradise.

'But,' asks one, 'why is the minister's wife any different from any other disciple?' She has, we admit, no mystic charms given her—no special gifts are sent down to rest upon her head; and she may not be so beautiful as some, nor so graceful as others, nor so fascinating as many. Nature, the schools, and society, may not have imparted any characteristics or qualities to distinguish, or exalt her. And so it may be with her partner as a man separate from his office; but with the name minister! does there not arise a different, and a tender and affectionate class of associations? If not, the term has not yet been understood by the heart—the heart has not the interest it should have in the office. For though we claim not for the minister what is asked for the priest, and though we recognise no such being as a priest, properly speaking, yet we do say that the sanctities of his office make the minister a peculiar man. Who like him has an entrance granted to the sanctuary of thought? Who like him is admitted to the retreat of guilt, bereavement, or blighted hope? And to whom, as unto him, is the life made bare, with all its strange minglings of the bright and the dark—the joyous and the sad? He consecrates the innocent of a few days to the God of infancy, and his words stole down into the parent-heart with a divine power, and there live like echoes of the voice of Jesus. He stands by the cradle with the mother, when paleness rests on the cheeks of the darling, and the light of the eye is dim, and the smile has quite forsaken the pleasant lips. Her heart is burning with fevered fears, and his voice utters words of tenderness that take away some of the wildness of her gaze, and her spirit is less sad, while her babe seems more beautiful. He is with her, and his hand grasps the palm of a little one, as the dead lies in the awful stillness of the unwaking sleep; and the little hand does not tremble now, nor do the parent's tears flow so fast and searingly, as they did awhile since, for he has brought Jesus and his salvation near, and opened the portals of everlasting life and glory to young and old. He comes in to still the agony of the heart stricken with guilt, or overwhelmed by a sudden message of blasted expectations and desolated joys;—where the parents bled over the ruined son, or betrayed daughter; where age covers its face that life should be lengthened to meet such stern trials. O nothing is too sacred for him to know, and the most timid ask of him direction, while almost as low as the voice of growing things, are the whisperings of the doubtful and perplexed spirit in his ear. It is these holy things which are the sanctifying rites of his office—it is these that separate him as one in, but not of the world.

And is not the one-companion of such a being a peculiar woman? has she not, or should she not have, peculiar claims upon the consideration of the disciples? By her union, she becomes his private secretary, and may be made his spiritual almoner to bear needed advice and comfort to troubled souls and wounded spirits, under circumstances which would make them 'doubly blessed' thus bestowed. She is his confidant, and a peculiar range of knowledge opens peculiar avenues of usefulness; but whether she will use that knowledge, or enter those avenues, depends very much on other than the influences of home. Through her many can come to the minister for essential requisites to happiness, as they cannot without; and where intimacy and cordial affection does not exist, there are many troubles, many evils, which otherwise would have been prevented, or checked in the budding.

The first duty of the people, and that which sums up all others, then is,—to encourage in all suitable ways, the minister's wife to cultivate a fitness for a ministry of goodness. Here is a difficult work, in some respects, as some would have the pastor's companion always on the wing, and thus preventing her from giving an example of faithfulness to home duties. She is to be a pattern in this, as in any thing else; and the weight of her character will depend in a good degree upon her attributes as a housewife. 'Let them learn first to show piety at home,' is an exhortation she is to remember, and consequently hers is to be an example of home piety. Many of the people do not consider this with due attention; and, from want of this consideration, they say and do many things which serve to discourage the heart and palsy effort. Each head of a hundred families, may regard it as a slight thing for the pastor's lady to give them 'a call,' or 'spend an afternoon' with them, frequently; but a hundred calls are not so easily made, nor a hundred afternoons found to spend away from home. When, therefore, her task is computed, it should not be by the wishes of one, but by the aggregate wishes of all. And then too, she is human, and her family are mortal beings, liable to sickness, and accidents, and perplexities, as much as others; and when necessity has confined her to home duties for a considerable time, it is not pleasant to be greeted with — 'What a stranger you are!' or, 'I thought you had forgotten us—that you was never a-going to call again!' as soon as she enters a dwelling. Her apology is deemed sufficient when made; but did she need an apology? If she had been remembered, might not her duties at home have been known, and the voice of sympathy greeted her instead of complaining? And what if a long time has elapsed since the last visit, what pleasure is there, or can there be, in the first words being those of murmuring? Does it bring a smile the speediest to the features, or open a heart warming conversation? Does it make them feel at once that there are lively religious sympathies in whose strength all little inattentions are forgotten, and that the moments or the hours are too precious to be wasted in recitals of mutual privations? Does it prove that the heart draws from its own experience to excuse what may seem to wear a repulsive aspect in others, and to hope that the joy of the present may fill up the blank of the past? Trifling as this matter may seem, it is an important one—especially important for the attention of those whose habitual greetings are such as we have noticed, and many of whom never think of returning a visit.

Each of a hundred can far easier find and use the opportunity of making a call on the minister's wife, than she can visit the hundred; and it is only by this course that a real intimacy or friendship can spring up and grow between the sisters. For as she goes from household to household, she carries into each the feelings awakened by the others, and the mingling of emotions and thoughts prevents her from individualizing as she can when in her own home, with her home feelings in full play, she opens her heart to each, and each has a warm place to sit in converse with her affections.

It frequently occurs that rumor's hundred tongues spreads wide the report, that 'the pastor's lady is quite a reserved being, keeping herself at a distance from all but a favoured few!' Now, here is a common evil, and one to be seriously examined. And first, is it not as natural and as reasonable for her to have her peculiar attachments, as for any other? May not circumstances, tastes, sympathies, and kindly charities of attention and advice of a domestic character, bring together the pastor's wife and a few of the sisters and intertwine the very pulses of their being, as others cannot be connected with her? She has her right to the circle of peculiar loves, and she is swayed in forming that circle as others are who have chords in the heart which do not respond to every touch. And it will generally be found that the members of this circle are those who came forth at the first to make her feel she was not amid strangers, but sisters, and whose generous frankness and open-hearted kindness woke feelings 'too deep for tears.' These first impressions of affection were made when the heart was peculiarly susceptible, and it yearned for what it had left or parted from, and asked in sadness for some trustful beings to fill the places of the absent. Is it a marvel that she should have her 'favoured few,' and is she worthy of any blame for it? It cannot be marvellous or blameworthy till the very texture of the heart is changed, and it be made the same to all, irrespective of tastes and sympathies. She needs and must have those to whom her soul is unveiled as it may not be to all, even though disciples of the same Lord, and her usefulness depends greatly on the discretion and prudence exercised in the selection.

But a different attitude may be assumed by the echoers of the rumor we have quoted. It may be said 'she is reserved more than the above should require, and is distant as a true christian should not be from the sisterhood.' She perhaps, would not be willing to claim the title of a 'true christian;' her life-long aim is, or should be, to develop more and more of the attributes of that character; she is far from wishing to make any other to be the test of excellence than her Lord; and if he call her by her name, it is joy enough for her to exclaim—'Master!' And then, again, it may be that the disciples are not a true 'sisterhood;' for what are the essentials of the character of a true spiritual sister? Let this be pondered. Is it one essential to be jealous or suspicious in a manner that will incline to the belief that the pastor's lady is distant and reserved, ere any attempt has really been made to approach her, or open the way for her advances? And yet many get the idea into their minds, that she is reserved and distant, and act accordingly; and she is as much at a loss how to act when they meet, as they confess they were.

They really act the reserved part, and a check is thereby given to the outflowing of her characteristic sympathies; and thus, they from imaginations, and she from ignorance that they are acting an assumed character, perpetuate a reserve that neither of them desire or enjoy. If there be in them a real wish to make her feel there is a sisterhood larger than the charmed circle for her to love and sympathize with, they will find means to let her see it—they will venture, even at a desperate risk, to show a little frankness—to wear one really amiable smile, and utter one tone that shall tell the sister-heart has spoken. Let this be done, and lo! the magic circle will expand, and whereas there were a few, there will soon be many mirrors to reflect the kindness of the central object. That any minister's wife can desire to limit her affections and sympathies to a narrow round, is impossible after she has known the true spirit of our blessed faith and its strong impulses to usefulness. Is there a heart bleeding over its crushed hopes and the withering of its brightest joys? She would be there as a sister, though the home be the lowliest cottage, as readily as though it were the mansion of wealth and splendor. What are wealth and splendor to her whose home is heaven—whose Lord passed by the mansions of luxury and affluence in Jerusalem, and pursued his twilight journey, after a weary day, to an humble dwelling in Bethany? If there be any whose spirits are lifted up by the pride of life, holding the relation we are speaking of, the disciples should, with earnest and solemn purpose and prayer, endeavor to throw around them influences to christianize their tempers, and introduce them to a knowledge of the beauty of humility and the exceeding loveliness of active goodness that recognizes no distinctions but such as Jesus recognized. There is guilt in heart-contracting pride in her who has given herself to the teacher of truth in its most sacred relations; and there is also, a want of christian firmness and sisterly interest towards her, amounting to guilt, in those whose course offers no check to the growth of this injurious passion. And surely it is unamiable, to say the least, to go about lamenting deficiencies in the pastor's companion, ere effort has been made to know whether diffidence has not been mistaken for pride, and reserve on their part for distance in her. The force of our faith when active in the soul, will beget frankness and affection; but as the charge of 'forwardness'

and 'importance' is so easily made against her, and when made furnishes so much matter for talk and gossip, that frankness can much better be exercised first by the disciples, and she will be led to enter where they thus lead.

Many a retiring spirit has dwelt long in doubt respecting the feelings cherished towards her by the sisterhood, till, suddenly to her, there came a clear expression of true love and esteem in a gift or token of friendship. Like to the warm and gentle rain to a flower pausing between blooming and fading, came the love-offering. She is no longer in doubt, and her spirit rejoices in a freedom the most ecstatic. Is it the abstract value or worth of the article bestowed that does this? No; for if this were only considered, the gift were but as so much money bestowed by charity. It has a value from the feelings which make the golden circles on the fourth finger dearer than a palace. That ring did not create any thing, nor was it given because the receiver was too poor to buy one. She could not buy such an one. The moment it was chosen and placed where the heart's pulses touched it, it was consecrated, and an array of jewelry could not purchase it—no art could fashion another. There are those who need gifts of the essentials of life because of their poverty, and we rejoice when christian charity supplies their need. But this touches not the principle of gifts bestowed, as outward tokens of inward love—as expressions of esteem. Yet some imagine it does, and would make us believe—it may be very honestly—that they can see nothing in gifts but charity! and that what is sometimes bestowed on the pastor's wife had better be given to the really poor! How do they know but that it is thus given? not indeed in kind, or precisely the same material, but otherwise. Is she not thus made able to do what she could otherwise only desire to do; and if they do not know that she gives any thing in charity, they should remember that they do not even know what drew the gifts from others to her, and that unpublished charities come nearest to the requirements of the great Teacher. Some of these cynics make serious Uncle Tim's jest. 'What town is this ere?' 'Its Farmington, sir.' 'Well, I want to know if you know any thing of a boy of mine that lives here.' 'A boy of yours—who?' 'Why, I've got a boy here, that's livin' on the town, and I tho't I'd just look him up.' 'I don't know any boy that's livin' on the town; what's his name?'

'Why,' said the old man, pushing his hat off from his forehead, 'I believe they call him James Benton.' 'James Benton! why that's our minister's name.' 'O wal, I believe he is the minister, come to think on't. He's a boy o' mine tho'. Where does he live?' Of course, Mrs. Benton lives upon the town, and if she be only comfortable, it is very foolish for any ladies of the parish to think of making her a present; if their husbands pay their taxes regularly, that ought to content every body!

Here is indeed a principle to be understood; for if doctrines which have been put forth concerning this matter are just, and 'charity' is the term to apply alike to the voluntary gift of a circle of ladies to their pastor's companion, and to the essentials of life furnished to a perishing family,—we know of some whose health, strength, and activity, will cause them to reject unequivocally all benefactions. But good sense, with suitable reflection, is only necessary to institute the right distinction; and that it should be established, is essential to the real and full enjoyment of a friendly act by her on whom it has been bestowed. So long as we are creatures of association—so long as material things are made spiritual by the transformations of affection and gratitude, so long there will be deep-reaching power in a token of friendship—of religious esteem. What an influence to awaken thought and kindle feeling is exerted by such! In the silence of home it has many a voice given to it, and gratitude to God for the friendship she feels is hers, inspires her to seek wisdom and increasing fitness for usefulness, wherever her lot may be cast.

In every society there are peculiarities which prevent the prescribing of any universal rule in reference to a proper reciprocation of kindly interest towards the minister's wife. 'Where there's a will there's a way,' is the old and true adage, as applicable here as to any other matter. But there is one subject which we may discuss on general grounds, and that is Female Societies. We lately saw a terrible lamentation in a Calvinistic journal against making the clergyman's wife the chief in every project—president of this, secretary of that, and treasurer of another, society, crowding the duties of a dozen upon one. It would seem that the evils resulting from this inconsiderateness had increased to an alarming magnitude, to require such an outbreak as we met with; but with us there is not the multiplicity of associations as exist within one society in other denominations; yet with our few, many evils arise from giving the chief place or office to the pastor's wife. We venture the opinion that, as a general thing, she can be more useful without, than with an office; as there is always some one more thoroughly acquainted with the members of the sisterhood, and as able, if not abler, in many respects to take the lead, or direction of affairs. She can do many things for the association, if she have not an office, which she cannot do if she have one, as her official character will be always kept in mind and will be thought to bias her judgment. Her advice can be drawn out oftentimes to better purpose, while she is one of them, and not over them; and in cases of difficulty, a healing influence may be exerted, as it could not be under other circumstances. Many times the presiding office is conferred on her as a matter of compliment, without reference to fitness, ere she has had an opportunity to become even slightly acquainted with those over whom she is to preside; and ignorance of peculiarities of character, betrays her into acts, which, though springing from the best motives, produce difficulties.

We have thus written, not in behalf of any individual, but of a class; and we have done so unprompted by any personal considerations.* We have no complaints to make so far as individual feelings are concerned, for our lines have always been cast in pleasant places, and ours has been a goodly heritage. But we are social beings, we have earnest sympathies, and for a class we plead. We look to the future, and we would have the disciples of Truth—the everlasting and all-satisfying Truth of Love, to cultivate more of those social affections and sympathetic feelings which are the beauty of Religion, and which give a heavenly warmth to zeal—zeal that preserves 'the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace.'

*The writer hopes this will be believed, for it is not a flourish of words, but fact.

SENECA, amongst many strained sentiments, and trivial points, has frequently a happy thought. As this on anger: 'I wish that the ferocity of this passion could be spent at its first appearance, so that it might injure but once: as in the case of the bees, whose string is destroyed forever at the first puncture it occasions.'

To Willie.

BY MISS M. A. DODD.

'Is thy face like thy mother's?'

O PLEASANT are the places
Where childhood's voice is heard,
And joyous are the echoes
By childhood's laughter stirred.

O pleasant is the mansion
Where gay young hearts are found,
And joyful is the cottage
Where children frolic round.

Blessed are little children!
And ever where they move,
Around them is the fragrance
Of innocence and love.

We watch their fairy footsteps,
Their glances glad and bright,
And list their broken accents,
With feelings of delight.

And what on earth can equal
The pure and perfect bliss,
When the sweet 'todlin wee things'
Put up their mouths to kiss?

There are no children round me:
I sing my song to-day,
To a bright boy who dwelleth
An hundred miles away.

I ne'er have seen thee, Willie;
And fancy vainly tries
To paint thy form and features,
Or the color of thine eyes.

But O my heart is open,
Thine image there to take;
For thy sweet name I love thee,
And for thy mother's sake.

And art thou like thy mother?
Hast thou her sunny face?
Can those who fondly loved her,
In thine her features trace?

Dear child, thy fair young mother
Early to death did bow,
But from her place in heaven,
She watcheth o'er thee now.

Thou knowest not this sorrow,
And we will not repine,
But rather joy in thinking,
A charmed life is thine.

Charmed from all sin and evil
Thy path must ever be,
For a pure white-robed angel
Is always guarding thee.

Thou art not near me, Willie,
But I seem to see thee now,
With the likeness of thy mother
Stamped on thine open brow.

Thy father gazes on thee,
Through eyes with sadness dim,
Then to his heart he folds thee,
For thou art all to him.

He sighs for one departed;
Gone in her summer years;
The loved and happy hearted;
The mourned with many tears.

Through the long day he thinketh;
Though care upon him press;
How he shall come at evening,
And meet thy dear caress.

How he shall part thy tresses,
And list thy lisping tone,
And press thy lip of velvet
So softly to his own.

Thy toys are all deserted
When his quick step draws nigh,
He hears thee murmur 'father!'
Then to his proud arms fly.

O Willie! to thy father
How very dear thou art!
Long may God spare thee to him,
Thou treasure of his heart!

Farewell now, little Willie;
My kiss and blessing take;
For thy sweet name I love thee,
And for thy mother's sake.

Woman's Influence.

[Inscribed in a young Lady's Album.]

'WOMAN! blest partner of our joys and woes!
E'en in the darkest hour of earthly ill,
Untarnished yet, thy fond affection glows,
Throbs with each pulse, and beats with every thrill.'

I AM no poet! Mount Parnassus I have never visited—the waters of Helicon I have never quaffed—not one of 'the sacred Nine,' in their airy flights, have ever yet alighted upon my poor pen. Whether I have not paid sufficient court to them in former years, or whether they have taken offence at some unfortunate neglect of their productions which I may have exhibited, I cannot determine; but certain it is, that whenever they have occasion to approach my presence, they invariably 'pass upon the other side of the way.' I must needs, therefore, plod along in sober prose, in recording the few thoughts which may be worthy of preservation. I might, perhaps, were the effort made, measure out a given quantity of parallel lines, and find for each a 'jingling' termination; but it would still be questionable, whether the production would be justly entitled to the appellation of poetry. If to be a poet, I must indite all the vapid sentiment, the arrant nonsense, the see-saw sillings, which is so often put forth to the world, by some who lay claim to this title, I beg to be excused from assuming the character. I trust, however, that the sentiments which I would trace upon these pages, will be none the less acceptable to the fair owner, because they are clothed in a plain and simple garb; instead of being arrayed in the tinsel finery which the rhymster calls to the aid of his 'airy nothingness.'

The influence of woman! How great, how mighty, how enduring! Who can doubt its existence?—who can question its power? What mortal has not realized its strength—has not submitted to its sway? From the cradle to the grave, its magic wand is extended over 'the sterner sex,' leading them as by a silken thread, and giving shape and consistency to their moral sensibilities and habits. Who watches over the couch of helpless infancy?—who gives the first thoughts to the mind, the first words to the tongue of lisping childhood?—who curbs, and checks, and biases man in the vigor of life, and restrains him in his wild career in pursuit of wealth, or fame, or power?—who accompanies him with untiring fidelity, 'when life's poor play is over,' and he totters upon the brink of the grave?—who smooths the pillow on the bed of death, and receives his last sigh? It is Woman. How powerful, then, is the influence which she exercises, in the various stations and relationships which she sustains in life.

It is true, man does not in our age, make woman the idol, the goddess, to be adored and worshiped, as in the days of chivalry. No romantic Troubadour now wanders from place to place chanting the praises of her beauty—no valiant knight-errant now buckles on his polished armor and massive helmet, to go forth and do battle in the name of his 'lady-love.' But notwithstanding the lack of these outward manifestations of devotion, I think that in no age has woman been more highly respected and admired—in no age has her beauty, not of person only, but of mind and heart, been more generally admitted,—in no age have her worth and value, the purity of her heart, and the benevolence of her disposition, been more appreciated—than the present! And consequently, in no age has her influence been actually greater. The declaration of Cato will apply as well to the modern American Republic, as to the ancient Roman,—'The Romans govern the world, but it is the women that govern the Romans!'

Possessing this unquestioned influence, it becomes an important inquiry—especially to young ladies—how shall this influence be exercised? Shall it be wielded for good or for evil?—to promote virtue, morality and intelligence, or vice, licentiousness and ignorance? I trust that every lady whose eye scans these lines, will decide for the former. It is undoubtedly true, that woman gives tone and character to the morality of society. Let me know what is the character of the female portion of any family, town, or country, and I can have no difficulty in determining as to the state of morality in their midst. The influence of wives over husbands, of mothers over children, sisters over brothers, and young ladies over the gentlemen with whom they associate, is such, that they can mould them into whatever moral condition they may choose. The morality of community is hence, in a very important respect, placed in their keeping. To mothers, wives, daughters, and sisters, must we look for the purification of the moral atmosphere from all those noxious exhalations which are destructive to human virtue and happiness. And if they are true to themselves and their sex,—if they are true to the modesty and purity, with which they have been endowed by the Creator,—they will discharge this duty in a manner calculated to benefit the world at large.

I have remarked that young ladies can exercise influence over the gentlemen with whom they associate. And should not this influence be turned to a good account? Ladies possess and exercise the privilege of selecting their associates of the opposite sex. They can determine who shall, and who shall not, mingle in their society and receive their smiles—they can decide what shall be the moral and intellectual characteristics of the young gentlemen, who seek the social circle to which they are attached. And let it be remembered by every young woman, that whatever reasonable exactions they may demand upon this subject, will be implicitly complied with! Young gentlemen will strive to possess such qualifications as they know will secure them a passport to the society of their female associates. If they are freely admitted to such society, when destitute of moral and religious principle, they will take no pains to secure these qualifications. But when they are given clearly to understand that they will be debarred the society and companionship of all virtuous females, unless they are themselves pure, honest and virtuous, they will unfailingly seek purity, honesty and virtue, to obtain the boon they value.

Young ladies having thus in possession a most important influence, I call upon them—yea, morality, religion, their own happiness, the welfare of society, all call upon them, to wield this influence as becomes them! Let them never receive the addresses of a man who is given to any improper habit. His companionship will but bring disgrace upon them—it would be an evil example in community—and a connection for life with him, would be an exposure to poverty and wretchedness. Is a young man vicious in temper?—is he indolent and unenterprising?—is he a spendthrift, a Sabbath breaker, a profane swearer, a gamester?—is he in the habit of partaking of intoxicating drinks?—is he a scoffer at religion? Avoid him as you value your own happiness—receive none of his attentions—enter not his company—discountenance him in public and in private! To mingle in the same circle with him—to meet him upon a footing of familiarity—will bring a taint upon your character, and prove you recreant to the interest and welfare of your sex! Let all young ladies adopt this principle of action, and how salutary will be their influence! How many a youth will in this manner be induced to abandon the tavern, the gaming table, the haunts of vice, the society of the depraved and dissolute, and be led into the ways of virtue and religion!

But I cannot pursue this topic farther in these pages. Young ladies! will you think upon these things? Will you reflect upon the influence you possess—upon the necessity of exercising it in the aid of morality and religion, and the claims which your Creator, your sex, and your race, have upon you to promote modesty, virtue and piety upon the earth? If these lines possess any power to urge you to these reflections, they will not have been penned in vain.

That you, my youthful sister, to whom these remarks are dedicated, will exercise the influence which you possess, faithfully and successfully, in whatever relationship you now or may hereafter stand—whether of daughter, sister, wife, or mother—is the belief and prayer of

Your sincere friend,

Epistolaire.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

Catekunemug, Feb. 15, 1842.

MY DEAR —: Every one likes to give celebrity to his own locale; and here I am, dating from an old retreat with a new name, all for the mere purpose of finding an excuse for writing to you about the Catekunemug, a stream never yet sung by bard, nor noted in the journal of a tourist, yet nevertheless, a pretty stream, winding through woodland, and glen, and meadow, and haunted by many of the sweetest wild-flowers that spring up in the soil of New England.

True, it is winter now, and the Frost King has laid our little valley under an interdict; so that the pleasant voice of the Catekunemug is no longer heard singing its hymns to the stars; but I have learned, and perhaps you have also, that we can always describe most beautifully from memory; for Time is like a light mist in the atmosphere, which softens, without obscuring, the scenes over which it is spread.

A brook, I do believe, is the most companionable object in nature. It talks to you like a sister, or, if you will, like a lover, in the lowest and gentlest tones. I read in 'Corinne,' to-day, this beautiful expression; 'Le monde est l'œuvre d'une seule pensée, qui s'exprime sous mille formes différentes;' the world is the work of a single thought, which expresses itself under a thousand different forms. Is it not indeed so? The serenity of a summer sky, the balminess of the air, the green beauty of the earth, the music of flowing water, are they not expressions all of one divine thought, varied indeed, yet perfectly harmonious?

A similar concord exists between the spirit of man and the great heart of the universe. Alike are they subject to clouds and to sunbursts; alike tuned to triumph and to grief. In the language of the Thanatopsis, (a poem that never wears out,)

'To him, who, in the love of nature, holds
Communion with her visible forms, she speaks
A various language. For his gayer hours
She has a voice of gladness, and a smile
And eloquence of beauty, and she glides
Into his darker musings with a mild
And gentle sympathy, that steals away
Their sharpness ere he is aware.'

Precisely of this character is the Catekunemug. It has never a discord for even my strangest moods. If, like the joyous woodlark, my soul would soar above and beyond the clouds, and bathe its wings, (of course the soul has wings,) in the golden light of morning, then are heard from the bosom of this stream the clear and glorious rejoicings of a spirit which can understand and appreciate. If oppressed with grief and discouragement, my heart is yearning for the tomb, a low, plaintive murmur steals from the depths of the waters, and tells me that there are tones of sorrow elsewhere than in my own spirit, and that like this voiceful brook, my hymn of triumph should swell far above the dirge-like tones of grief. The Catekunemug is the stream into which the little laughing Bow-Brook throws its sunny waters; and together they traverse a neighboring glen, which from its profusion of those little wildlings, I have sometimes called Glen-Viola. I do not know that there are any legends connected with this stream; doubtless it has its incidents, like every other spot of the habitable globe. It is certain, at least, that the Indian has had his residence here, for a fragment of his almost forgotten dialect clings still to the brook that furnished food for his simple repast. I should much like to know if ever the Indian maiden has trodden the same paths that I now tread along its wooded banks; if here the loud notes of the war-song have resounded; and if the bones of the warrior are still resting beneath these green mounds.

How many centuries will it be ere human feet trample as lightly over my dust as I now tread over the dust of those departed chieftains? And possibly they will be of another race too, to whom I shall be as strange as the sons of the forest are to me. My dust! How vain to imagine that what is now my own, will be spared in the great renovation which is constantly going on in the works of nature. Long ere centuries have passed, the wild-flowers will have been nourished by my ashes. No longer shall the coffin interpose its feeble barrier between its perishable contents and the sod that was heaped upon its lid; no longer shall the shroud cover the pulseless heart from the root that 'pierces its mould.' The dust that is now held together by the mysterious principle of life, shall be scattered abroad on the surface of the earth, or washed into the beds of the streams, or, may be, become a part of the noisy thoroughfare through which masses of human life are continually hurrying, as we hurry now, animated by similar projects, and pursuing the same glittering visions, that will end, as ours do, in vanity.

Are these melancholy reflections? No more melancholy to me than the scattering of the commonest dust of the street. I confess my heart has no clinging to the dust that perishes. The coffin lid once closed over the countenance of a friend; nay, even before that—the moment that the beating of the heart that loved me is stilled, I have not the slightest yearning toward its vacant shrine, not a single regret when it is consigned to the tomb. It is no longer my friend, whom I behold,—it is but a deserted tabernacle, the frame-work of a harp whose chords are forever broken.

I find a happiness, it is true, in standing by the graves of those who have been dear to me; but only because these places are consecrated to their memory, and because there is solemn joy in being thus brought to meditate on my own dissolution; not because I have any peculiar attachment to the poor clay that they have cast aside. No, thank God! faith lifts me above the tomb, even to His own hallowed presence. There is no dread in the dark and narrow house, no chill in the cold, damp earth; no distrust of the rigid and dreamless sleep. These come not near my soul. Life, life, LIFE, throbbing and burning in the unfathomed depths of the being, repels the miserable doubt that would affix itself to the silent and inanimate corpse.

'I feel my immortality o'er sweep
All pains, all tears, all time, all fears, and peal,
Like the eternal thunders of the deep,
Into my ears this truth—"thou liv'st forever!"'

To an absent Brother on his Birth Day.

ON this birth day morn of thine,
Absent brother—where art thou?
Does the light of gladness shine
On that glowing cheek and brow?
Art thou full of life and glee?
Let thy spirit answer me.

'Twas but yesterday, it seems—
Pillowed on a mother's breast,
In thy sleep of infant dreams,
I beheld thee sink to rest;—
How I loved thee then, sweet boy—
Angel of my childish joy.

Years of wondrous change have fled;
From thy early home away,
Where the tropic beams are shed,
Where the summer breezes play,
Thou hast gone, to dwell, to see
Ripening manhood's destiny.

But alone thou hast not gone,—
Love hath lingered in thy way,
And as other years come on,
From its light thou wilt not stray;—
Love that still, mysteriously
Binds a brother's heart to thee.

Dost thou not, fond brother, oft
In thy dreamy moods return
From that clime so bland and soft,
To the region cold and stern,
Where amid the north wind's roar,
Thou didst bless the homestead door?

And the fireside joys of home,
When the soul was young and free,
Do they not in brightness come,
Bearing their old words to thee,—
Words that—meet thee where they will,
Make thy deep heart-pulses thrill?

Yea belov'd, it must be so;
Hasten then thy glad return
To that home where thou dost know
Fires of love's devotion burn;
Swelling heart and beaming eye
Wait thy coming anxiously.

Mercy shield thee, absent one!
If a brother's soul and prayer
Can avail at heaven's throne,
Thou wilt find protection there;
And each birth day morn of thine
Shall with love's own radiance shine. J. G. A.

Isadore De Vaux.

'How are they waned and faded from our hearts,
The old companions of our early days!
Of all the many loved, which name imparts
Regret, when blamed, or rapture at its praise?
What are their several fates by heaven decreed,
They of the jocund heart, and careless brow?
Alas! we scarcely know, and scarcely heed
Where, in this world of sighs, they wander now!'

HON. MRS. NORTON.

I HAVE been musing on the changes and vicissitudes of life, and thinking of the early friends who launched their barks with me on its stormy ocean. My class-mates! it seems but yesterday, since we stood together in that dear old school-room, with tearful eyes and quivering lips, to bid it, and each other, adieu! but yesterday, and yet long years have passed, and that youthful group is dispersed, gone, I scarce know whither. One is a governess in the sunny South; another is wedded, and has made her home among the prairies of the far West; one, a fair, gentle girl, with soft voice, and angel smile, went forth in the fullness of hope and boundless confidence, to bear the tidings of salvation to the heathen—she sleeps in peace beneath the burning sky of Ceylon; her grey-haired sire mourns for the darling of his old age, but the tears of ransomed souls hallow her resting-place. And thou, gifted child of song, sweet E. H—, with thy pure, fair brow, eloquent lip, and soft, deep, spiritual eyes—thou, too, hast passed away! The fairest of our circle have departed, yet I

'Weep not for them! they died in early youth,
Ere hope had lost its rich romantic hues;
When human bosoms seemed the home of truth,
And earth still gleamed with beauty's radiant dews.
Their summer prime waned not to days that freeze,
Their wine of life has not run to the lees!'

No! I cannot find in my heart to mourn for those bright young beings; my tears are for those who remain—in whom the clear spring of warm and generous feelings has been choked by the rank weeds of worldly ambition, and who pass with hurried step, and averted face, the old companions and playmates, to whom fortune has been less lavish in her gifts—to those are my tears given, to the cold, the proud, the estranged, and not to the dear, departed ones. Yes, change and death have cast their shadows over the past, but the images of those fair girls, are still bright on memory's page, and my heart often yearns to greet them, as in by-gone days, ere communion with a hollow, heartless world, had chilled the warm fount of affection. But among them all, there is none to whom imagination clings so fondly, as to the memory of ISADORE DE VAUX. She came among us, a stranger and a foreigner, and though at first we were dazzled by her rare beauty, yet that feeling was soon forgotten in our compassion for her loneliness, and in the endearing manner with which she twined herself round our hearts; did I say forgotten? Nay, that were impossible—for hers was a face, which, once seen, was indelibly stamped on the mind of the beholder; and though years have passed, it haunts me still, and rises before me with such startling vividness, that I half expect to hear the cadences of that rich, mellow voice, and to meet the glance of those dark, loving eyes.

The father of Isadore De Vaux was a rich West Indian planter—her mother a beautiful Spanish girl, who had been induced to wed her wealthy suitor, to save an aged and beloved parent from poverty and privation; but in the second year of her marriage, she fell a victim to a prevailing epidemic, leaving an infant, the beautiful little Isadore, to the care of her father. Mr. De Vaux's grief was at first violent, but as usually happens in such cases, it soon wore off. He contracted no second union, however, but having placed his daughter under the care of his cousin, he gave himself up to the luxurious pursuits and pastimes of the wealthy planters. Isadore remained under the duennaship of her cousin, to whom she was fondly attached, till she was nearly fifteen, petted and fondled, and treated like a child, but possessing one of those admirable dispositions which no petting can spoil. Her acquirements, however, were of a very limited order; she was, like most West Indian girls, a beautiful dancer, and she had some knowledge of music, added to a voice which was melody itself; but beyond these, and the simplest rudiments of education, she was as ignorant as she well could be. About this time her father first began to think upon the subject, and after some deliberation, he resolved to send her to New-England—the fame of our schools having reached him often. Mamma, as she always called the friend who had taken care of her, from her infancy, was to accompany her, and a lady, whose daughter had been a pupil at our school, having recommended it to Mr. De Vaux, thither Isadore and her nurse, came. Miss De Vaux was to board with the principal of the Academy, and Clari was soon settled in comfortable quarters near her, but her health was very much impaired, and she survived scarcely a year, after her arrival in New-England.

Beautiful Isadore! I have looked on many a fair face, but never saw I thy rival yet! I do not belong to that class of persons, who, because destitute of beauty themselves, will not allow the possession of it to others, or at best, do it grudgingly. On the contrary, I am its ardent and passionate admirer—I love to see the goodness and glory of God, displayed in the works of nature—I read it, alike in the foaming billows, and in the peaceful rivulet—in the glare of noon-day and in the still moonlight—in the lofty oak and the humble violet—but most of all, do I love to see it in the ‘human face divine.’ Ay! beauty is a most beautiful and precious gift! it may be abused and deformed by the influence of evil passions—its purity may be sullied—its highest charm lost, but the signet of God remains there still. Chesterfield says, and I think truly, that a ‘good face is the best letter of recommendation;’ for however much we may love and value a friend, when we have become acquainted, yet there is no denying, that on a first introduction, we are far more apt to be attracted by beauty than by more sterling qualities. I would not convey the idea, that I set an undue value on personal appearance, or place it at all in competition with the graces of mind or heart; for well as I love to gaze on a beautiful face, or a graceful figure, yet dearer far do I prize intellectual loveliness, and the warm emotions of a generous heart.

Clearly defined as is the image of Isadore De Vaux in my mind, I can give you but a faint outline of her beauty. She was about the average height of women, and though but fifteen when I first saw her, her figure boasted a luxurious development, rarely attained by northern females at five-and-twenty; her complexion was of a clear, rich olive, save when the warm blood tinted her cheek with a soft crimson, and deepened into a ruddier hue on her voluptuous lips—her hair was black as night, and her large, dark, dreamy eyes, were full of the delicious languor which characterizes the women of those sunny climes. Her features were small and regular, and the general expression of her face rather pensive than gay; but when she did smile, the effect was perfectly dazzling:

‘But where it most sparkled no eye could discover,
On lip, cheek or brow, for she brightened all over.’

I feel that I have shadowed forth but faintly the charms of Isadore De Vaux, and with still less justice, can I delineate the generous qualities of her heart. Gifted with beauty, intelligence, and a warm and sunny temper, she came to the school, and when the first embarrassment of her new situation had worn off, soon won her way to our hearts. Her progress in her studies was rapid, and her ardent zeal for improvement, acted as a powerful stimulus to us. Those were the brightest days of Isadore’s life, and I love better to think of her then, in the unclouded sunlight of her existence, than in those darker days, when disappointment and sorrow had cast their shadows over it. But I must leave these reminiscences, and pass on to another era in her life—that eventful season to every woman, when love first throws its silken chains around the free, glad spirit of youth, and the light and careless mirth of the girl is laid aside for the graver thoughts and deeper feelings of the woman.

It was in the summer of her seventeenth year, that Isadore became acquainted with one, whose destiny was thenceforth to be in some measure interwoven with her own. I have before stated that she boarded with the Principal of the school, Mr. Vere—a gentleman, who added to extensive and varied information and high intellectual acquirements, all the graces of refinement and an urbane dignity of manner, that won the respect and love of all who knew him. Mrs. Vere was all that the wife of such a man should be; they were not blessed with children, and from the day that Isadore first came to them, she had been tenderly cherished as a daughter. It was during the summer holidays of her second year at school, that Arthur Crawford, a young physician of some note in a neighboring city, became a guest at Vere Place. He was the son of an old and beloved friend of the Preceptor, and this circumstance alone would have made him welcome, even had his own merits been less than they were. But the young physician was one whose presence was everywhere hailed with pleasure; handsome, and graceful in person, witty, and refined in manner, he could not fail to please. There was but one drawback to all these charms, —Arthur Crawford was poor! He inherited but little from his father, and though his patients were numerous, yet most of them belonged to the poorest class; for his kind heart forbade him alike to refuse his visits, or receive compensation. Such was the man to whom on the afternoon of his arrival, Isadore De Vaux was introduced by her kind friends, who smiled with gratified pride and affection, at the obvious admiration she excited. The consequences of this acquaintance may be easily foreseen; Arthur had at first intended to pass but a week with his friends, but long ere the week expired, he had lost alike the power and the inclination to depart; he was deeply in love with the beautiful West Indian, and Isadore returned it with all the warmth of her ardent and passionate nature. Day after day sped on, and still Arthur prolonged his stay; at length the holidays drew to a close—his business called imperatively for his return, and on the last night of his visit, he poured forth to Isadore the burning tale of his love, and received from the blushing girl the whispered assurance of its return. Ere they parted, it was settled that he should write to her father, and obtain his consent to their marriage, as soon as Arthur's circumstances would permit the event to take place. Arthur did write, frankly and eloquently; he spoke of their mutual attachment, and their hopes of his approval; he did not attempt to conceal his poverty, 'but with such a guerdon in view,' he wrote, 'what shall be too great for my ambition?' The letter was sent, and Arthur returned to the city, but every week now brought him to Vere Place, and the probable contents of the expected answer were fully and frequently discussed.

The important missive arrived at length, but it was to Isadore, not to Arthur; it was presented by a tall, thin, sinister-looking man, who announced himself as Mr. Rivers. Not a word was mentioned of Arthur's letter, but Isadore was commanded to return immediately with the bearer of the epistle; it was short and concise, and there was no alternative but to prepare with a heavy heart for the voyage. Meanwhile she tried to cheer Arthur and herself with the hope, that her father might not have received his letter, and that when she was once more with him, she was sure he would not refuse to ratify the happiness of his only child. But Arthur had dark presentiments of evil, which her words could not dispel; and both joined in expressing their dislike towards the man to whose care her father had entrusted her. The last evening she was to spend at Vere Place, Arthur and Isadore strolled forth together, and beneath an old elm tree where they had often sat, with the bright stars looking down on them 'like angel's eyes,' they plighted their faith, and at Arthur's request, Isadore severed one of the thick curls from his brow, and gave him in return, one of her own raven tresses. The day of her departure came; there was no school that day, for neither teacher nor scholars were capable of attending to their respective duties; but a little knot of her classmates was gathered in the hall, to say, 'good bye' to the dear girl, and many a group was scattered round the house and garden to catch a glimpse of her, we all felt for the last time! The lovers parted, with 'sighs and tears, and locked embrace,' and then with streaming eyes, Isadore bade the kind Preceptor and his weeping wife, adieu, and with a parting look of love, and a scarcely audible 'God bless you all,' as she passed through the hall, and down the steps lined with scholars, she entered the carriage, and —was gone! Two days after her departure, we saw her name among the passengers in a vessel bound for the West Indies, and in due time, we learned from the same source, that the vessel had reached her port in safety. Isadore had promised Arthur to write soon, and often; but days, weeks, and months went by, and still no tidings save the vague intelligence I have mentioned, ever reached the waiting ones. Arthur had despatched letter after letter, at first filled with anxious inquiries, and undoubting reliance on her truth; then as time past, and no answer came, he grew more painfully earnest, and besought her with all the fervor of devotion, to reply, if it were but a single line, to tell him that she lived and was happy, even though she had forgotten the past, and ceased to love him; but in vain;—not a line came to relieve the despair which was fast taking possession of his heart. His friends sought to draw his mind from the subject; they ventured to blame Isadore, and condemned her heartless conduct; but Arthur would not hear aught against her; and sought the Veres who alone sympathized with, and pitied him, and hoped for an explanation.

But we will leave them for a while and return to Isadore. During the ride to the city, she remained absorbed in grief and almost unconscious of all that was passing; and in this state on their arrival, she was shown to her room in the hotel. The next morning found her a little more composed, and after partaking of a slight refreshment, she accompanied Mr. Rivers to the vessel, which was ready to sail. During the voyage her companion left no means untried to render himself agreeable, but found all unavailing, for Isadore's heart and thoughts were with those she had left behind. Wind and weather were propitious, and after a short passage they arrived at home. Mr. De Vaux received his daughter with kindness, and welcomed with great cordiality her companion, whom Isadore now found had been almost domesticated with her father, ever since her departure. Mr. Rivers was an American by birth, and by profession a lawyer, but being poor, and withal of a mean and servile disposition, he had preferred quartering himself on the rich planter, to earning his subsistence in a more honorable way. But dame Nature, as if in contrition for her faulty work, had gifted Rivers with specious and insinuating manners, which he had most successfully used in gaining Mr. De Vaux's favor; and having heard much of the beauty of Isadore, and knowing her to be sole heiress of her father's vast property, he had determined, if possible, to secure both to himself. One evening while tete-a-tete with Mr. De Vaux, he threw out some vague intimations of his wishes, and meeting with no rebuff, he by degrees, artfully introduced the subject. His auditor was too highly prepossessed in his favor to demur long, and it was soon settled between them, that when Isadore returned from school, Rivers should be at liberty to address her. It was at this juncture, that Mr. De Vaux received Arthur Crawford's letter, which determined him to send instantly for his daughter, and Rivers was appointed to escort her thither, and thus gain an opportunity of rendering himself agreeable to his future bride. After her return, her father sedulously avoided every opportunity which Isadore eagerly sought, to tell him of her engagement, (of which she still supposed him ignorant,) and to gain his sanction. She wrote to Arthur, immediately after her arrival, but the letter was intercepted by her father or Rivers, as were all the subsequent ones, and also Arthur's. Thus, while he was mourning her inconstancy, she was suffering beneath his supposed neglect. Poor Isadore! the worm was fast gnawing at her heart—as by slow degrees, she awoke to the miseries of disappointed love and abused confidence, the bloom faded from her cheek, the light forsook her eye, and her step lost its elasticity;

‘With the light feet of early youth,
What hopes and joys depart;
Ah! nothing like the heavy step
Betrays the heavy heart!’

Thus far, not a syllable of the contract, into which her father had entered, had reached Isadore's ears. Rivers, as a member of the family, paid her a thousand little attentions which she would not have received under other circumstances; but not till the last gleam of hope had faded from her heart, did he dare hazard a word of aught beyond friendship and common courtesy.

Month after month wore on, a year had passed since Isadore's return, and Rivers grew impatient for the fulfilment of the contract; her beauty had even surpassed his expectations, and had it been less, her golden charms would have more than supplied its place. He had flattered himself from her passive reception of his attentions, that he should find little difficulty in gaining her heart; when, therefore, he found himself as quietly and passively rejected, he was at first not a little surprised—then disappointed, and finally seriously offended. In this dilemma, he applied to Mr. De Vaux, and Isadore was soon after summoned to her father's presence, where to her utter consternation, she was made acquainted with the engagement between her father and Rivers. She besought him with prayers and tears to revoke it; she pleaded her engagement with Arthur Crawford, and her deep and unalterable love for him; but her avowal was met with bitter sneers at her lover's neglect and at the affection which had thus been slighted and thrown back upon her heart. From that day, Rivers renewed his attentions, and continued them, despite the withering coldness and repulsive scorn of her manners; till at length worried, and worn out with fruitless opposition, and goaded almost to desperation by Arthur's continued silence and neglect, in a moment of irritation she consented to the hateful union. It was seized with avidity by her suitor, and hasty preparations were made for the ill-omened nuptials; but from the day when the unwilling assent had been wrung from her, Isadore sank into a state of apathy which no effort on the part of her persecutors could dispel. The bridal eve came, and the mansion of the De Vauxs was thronged with beauty and fashion. In the midst of the glittering assemblage stood Rivers with an exulting smile on his face, and at his side the Flower of the Isles, decked like a victim for the sacrifice. She had nerved herself for the trial, and called her woman's pride to her aid, to hide the ravages of slighted love; her marble cheek grew not a shade more deathly, her glazed and tearless eye quailed not, she neither trembled nor shrank; but many a fair cheek in that gay group blanched, and many an eye swam as it rested on her face, and even Rivers started, when he took her passive hand in his, for its icy coldness sent a shuddering chill to his heart. And when all was over, and the guests crowded round with congratulations, they checked their light words as they met the vacant smile that sat on her compressed and bloodless lips as if congealed there. But why should I dwell longer on that painful scene, why speak of that unconsecrated union, that mockery of God's holy ordinance where the hand is plighted without the heart! During the six months that succeeded her marriage, Isadore maintained the same statue-like composure of voice and manner; no murmur, no word of reproach ever broke from those lips, where the same fixed, unchanging smile still rested; no expression of the fearful agony that was withering her heart, ever marred the smooth, polished brow. But that terrible conflict could not long be sustained, and Isadore was gradually sinking beneath its intensity, when an event took place which roused into action every dormant feeling and passion. Mr. De Vaux left his house one morning, in perfect health, and in less than an hour was brought back insensible and dying; his daughter and her husband were summoned to his bedside, the slaves flocked around with mingled terror and surprise, and every means was tried to restore him, but all in vain; the disease was apoplexy, and ere noon Isadore was an orphan. Then for the first time since her marriage, nature asserted her sway, and she wept, for she felt that now she was indeed alone. Rivers was too much engaged in the settlement of the property to sympathize with her; and as soon as all was adjusted to his satisfaction, he announced to his wife his intention of returning immediately to his native land. She offered no opposition, for she felt that anything was preferable to her present situation, and a change of scene might produce a change of feeling.

The day before their departure, Isadore had been wandering listlessly over the house, and at length entered her father's chamber. How many scenes had that apartment witnessed! her own birth, and the death-bed of her young and beautiful mother, whose portrait still hung over the mantel-piece, and seemed to look down with pity and sympathy on her daughter;—in that room her father's lips had pronounced the doom which consigned his only child to a life of misery—and thither she had been summoned to look on that father's corpse! Overpowered by the recollections that came thronging on her mind, Isadore sat there for a while unconscious of the flight of time; at length she arose, and prepared to lock the drawers of the bureau; ere she did so, she opened each and cast a cursory glance over the contents; but as she was closing the last, her eye was caught by a carefully sealed packet in the corner, marked 'private;' curious to know its contents, she took it out, and seating herself, she broke the seal. There were several envelopes, each well secured with wax, and on removing the last she was a little disappointed to find it only a package of letters. But a single glance at the first sent the blood back to her heart; there were the letters she had written to Arthur Crawford after her arrival, and beneath them, directed to herself, were several with the seals unbroken! With a quaking heart, and trembling fingers, she opened and read them; no sound broke from her white, compressed lips, as her dilated eye wandered over the expressions of fervent and devoted love, of earnest entreaty, and passionate reproach; and when she had finished she replaced them in the covers, and sought her own room. Since her heart had been crushed by the supposed inconstancy of Arthur Crawford, life had seemed to Isadore an intolerable burthen; and when she stood by the coffin of her father, and felt her utter loneliness and desolation, she had murmured at the Providence which prolonged her life. But now, the mingled feelings of bitterness towards the parent who had so cruelly wronged and deceived her, and of scorn and hatred of the man who had wedded her for her gold, were almost forgotten in the new idea which now reigned paramount in her mind; every thought and feeling was concentrated in one object; to see Arthur once more, to ask his forgiveness for all the pain she had so unintentionally caused him, and to tell him how grossly they had both been betrayed; and knowing that he resided in the city whither they were going, she eagerly hastened the preparations for their departure. Her husband and the slaves, who had grown accustomed to her unnatural calmness of manner, had now fresh cause for wonder and alarm in her flushed cheeks and nervously agitated demeanor; but at length all was ready, and Isadore once more bade adieu to the home of her childhood, and in due time reached the destined port. What a crowd of recollections came thronging to her mind, as she stood on the deck of the vessel, and looked forth on the beautiful city, which she had left under such different circumstances, and which was the home of the being she so longed, yet dreaded to behold.

In a few weeks after their arrival, Isadore found herself installed as mistress of a sumptuous establishment, and her society courted by the elite of the city, to whom her wealth and beauty rendered her a valuable acquisition. In her intercourse with this circle, Isadore gained the desired information of Arthur. She heard the name of Dr. Crawford mentioned with admiration by the young and fair, and with respect by the older and more worldly; he was then absent for a time, but was expected to return soon. With this information came back all the wild excitement, which had been gradually giving way to the heart sickness of hope deferred; and she joined eagerly in the fashionable circles, with the expectation of meeting him. In this hope, she accepted an invitation to a large and splendid party, the most brilliant affair of the season; she was the cynosure of all eyes, followed and admired; but at length disappointed in her object, and weary of adulation, she stole away from the revellers, and entering a little boudoir, she buried herself among the cushions of a fauteuil and was soon absorbed in thought. Her reverie was disturbed by the entrance of another person. She started from her seat, and the intruder then first becoming aware of her presence, hastily advanced to apologize; as he did so, their eyes met—the recognition was instantaneous—and they who had parted at the gate of Vere Place two years before, as affianced lovers, with the vow yet warm on their lips, now met with an impassable barrier between them. For a moment they stood spell-bound; Arthur with dilated form, and a countenance where pride, love, and reproach were struggling for the mastery; and Isadore, pale and trembling, with glazed eye and parted lips that vainly essayed to speak; but as he turned to leave her, with a mighty effort she mastered her emotion, and springing forward she laid her hand on his arm, and murmured—‘Arthur.’ At the sound of that voice, the past came rushing back, and with a faint groan, Arthur sank back on the sofa. Isadore seated herself beside him, and with the simple eloquence of despair, she recounted all that had passed during their separation; she spoke of the faith in his love which had sustained her under his apparent neglect,—of the trust that had been firm while a shadow of hope had remained,—she told how she had been worried, harassed, and taunted, till in despair, she gave her hand to the man she despised; she hurried on to her father’s death, and the recovery of the letters; she dwelt on her anguish at the discovery of the base deception to which they had both been victims, of her sufferings since that day, and ended by imploring his forgiveness. As she turned to bid him farewell, another was added to the inmates of the boudoir. It was Rivers,—and the betrayer, and the betrayed stood together! Isadore looked the adieu she could not speak, and Arthur was alone. The next morning he received a package, containing his letters, accompanied by a note from Isadore, bidding him farewell: ‘I have relieved my mind of that dreadful burthen,’ she wrote, ‘and I have your forgiveness—I have severed the last tie that bound me to earth, and now, at least, I may pray to die! We must never meet again in this life, but I shall see you in the land where sorrow is never known, and friends are never parted.’ After that night Isadore never again appeared in public; physicians were called, but she had no apparent disorder, and they termed her complaint an affection of the heart. Ah! they little knew how the affections of her heart had been crushed and blighted! As a last resource, they recommended the air of her native clime, and thither they carried her. She lived to reach it; but on the fourth day after her arrival, she was borne to her last resting-place; not in the tomb of her fathers, but in a retired and pleasant spot, which she had herself chosen.

Six months from the day of Isadore’s burial, there was a wedding in one of the churches of the fair metropolis of New England, and Rivers led to the altar a young and lovely bride. But though young in years she had lived long enough among the heartless and worldly, to learn to prize gems and gauds before the priceless affections of the heart. Isadore’s princely fortune was lavished to surround them with luxury and splendor; but their reign was of short duration. Mr. De Vaux's income was chiefly derived from his plantations, and his will bequeathed it to his daughter and her heirs; and as she left no child to inherit it, it passed to a cousin, then resident in the West Indies. Ere the year following Isadore's death had expired, the heir claimed his rights. Before Rivers had recovered from this shock, she who had wedded for gold, deserted him and returned to her father's house, and he was left almost penniless and alone to commence life anew. Thought he not then of her whom he had wronged and betrayed, for the sake of that wealth which was now taken from him, in just retribution?

Arthur Crawford heard the news of Isadore's death with mingled joy and grief; joy that she was at length released from that terrible thralldom, and sorrow for the beautiful flower so early blighted and destroyed. He left his home soon after, and none knew his destination, though some ventured to surmise that he made a pilgrimage to the grave of Isadore. But when he returned, all felt that a change had come over him; and though his manners and conversation were still as graceful and pleasant as before, yet there was a gentle gravity and dignity now pervading all he said and did, that effectually put a check to all inquiries concerning his absence.

In a sweet and lovely spot in the sunny isle of Madeira, where the sun shines brightest, and the grass looks greenest, is a lonely grave! It is surrounded by an iron railing, and within the enclosure bloom many rare and fragrant flowers, which show that a careful hand superintends their growth. Above the mound is a broken column of snowy marble, which tells plainly as words, that beneath it sleeps one cut down in the morning of life; on the side is sculptured a wreath of amaranth blossoms, and within the garland is engraved the name of—ISADORE!

BIOGRAPHY.—There is no part of history which seems capable of either more instruction or entertainment than that which offers to us the select lives of great and virtuous men, who have made an eminent figure on the public stage of the world. In these we see at one view what the annals of a whole age can afford that is worthy of notice, and in the wide field of universal history, skipping, as it were, over barren places, gather all its flowers, and possess ourselves at once of all that is good in it.—Middleton's Life of Cicero.

Thou art not There.

I WANDER still, at sunset hour,
To view the scene to us so fair,
But it has lost its magic power—
Thou art not there!

I wind along the streamlet's side,
And pluck the flowers we thought so rare—
But faded seems their beauty's pride,
Thou art not there!

At night, I raise mine eyes on high,
When moon, and stars, their glory wear—
Vainly, I seek a cloudless sky—
Thou art not there!

I listen to the songs we love,
The notes fall harshly on mine ear—
They cannot now my spirit move,
Thou art not here!

'Pictorial Illustrations.' No. 1.

BY MISS M. A. DODD.

'How I do love pictures!' said cousin Fanny, as she turned over the leaves of a new annual which was elegantly illustrated, 'how I do love pictures and poetry!'

'I love them as well as you do,' said I, laying aside my work, 'especially pictures, they have always been my delight from my youth up, and I retain to this day a childish fondness for "picture books" of every description. At table my attention is always attracted by the designs on the dinner or tea-sett; I never pass a print shop without pausing to gaze at the ornamented windows; and an annual, or one of the mammoth weeklies, or anything set off with "pictorial illustrations," affords me hours and hours of pleasure.'

'Ah!' said Fanny, looking off from her book, 'I find in you a "kindred spirit." I rejoice at the interest which is now awakened, and the opportunities that are opening for exercise and improvement in this art, and I think the present age will be a new era in the history of picture making. It shows the progress of intelligence and refinement among us when we begin to encourage some employments which have not the accumulation of wealth, as their chief end, in view; and I hope our young men of genius will renew their energies, believing that in time they may reap the fruit of their labors, if they faint not. O, how proud I am of our artists and sculptors, few though they be, and some of those few struggling with the evils of poverty; I love to hear their names mentioned, and should rejoice to take them by the hand, and call them brothers. It somehow seems to me as though they were fashioned of different materials from other mortals; as though their minds were more pure, and more elevated above all low and trifling pursuits; and I even fancy that the air they breathe and the ground they tread, are hallowed.'

'Why, cousin Fanny, you are really eloquent and enthusiastic upon this theme.'

'Do you think so? Well I wish we could paint, and you can; for some one says, "poets are always painters, though painters are not always poets;" but come let us have some pictorial illustrations of our own; put by your work and paint, or pen my portrait.'

'Stop till I grind my colors and make ready the canvass. In what costume will you be taken?'

'O, in my every day rig, "for loveliness," &c. you know.'

'Well, then, here it is, full length, large as life, and not at all flattered.'

"Seven Fannys I adore, Seven Fannys and no more."

Thus sang the poet, and I do not blame him for adoring so many, if they all resembled the one whose picture we are about to behold. Our Fanny is neither tall nor short, but just about the right height for a woman. Her form is well proportioned and very slender, her hands are soft and delicate, and her foot is unexceptionable in shape and dimensions. Her features are not very regular or beautiful, but her blue love-beaming eyes, her mouth the home of smiles, her lips which drop sweet words like honey, and the bright, open expression which lights up her whole countenance, show that the charm which lingers around her, does not consist in the outside coloring of the lily or the rose, but rather in that beauty which the painter cannot convey to his canvass, and which time will not fade or destroy. The language is winning, her actions kind, and her manners graceful. She will share your joy, and charm away your sorrow, and happy are they who come within the sphere of her influence, for around her is an atmosphere of love. As I finish the task and lay aside my pencil, I imprint a kiss on cheek, and lip, and brow of the picture, for I love Fanny dearly.'

'Now Mary, you make me blush; for I cannot endure to be thought handsomer than I really am, but if that is truly my likeness, I am better looking than I ever supposed myself to be; and now you are about it, why not try your skill on "aunt Jane," and see if she will look as well painted.'

'There, don't stir, Jenny dear, you are sitting in just the right light to have your picture taken; the soft mellow light of an autumn afternoon; it sheds a sort of halo round you, and adds to the brightness of your brilliant face. There! let me catch that thoughtful expression of your deep blue, upturned eyes, as you gaze upon the golden sky and seem wishing for wings to soar away beyond it to the unexplored country which it hides. There, you see now what a serious, almost unearthly look you have with those eyes of yours, whenever I meet their glance I cannot help thinking of heaven. Gay and light hearted as you ever seem to be, those eyes, the mirrors of your mind, tell that your thoughts are often serious, and sometimes sad. They go down into the grave where the forms of the young and lovely are buried, and see the glazed eye, the marble brow, and pallid lip; they mount up to heaven and behold those forms changed from death unto life, crowned with glory and honor, and made immortal. Am I not giving the subject of your meditations, as well as the color and expression of your eyes? What a head and neck for a painter to copy! and what a handsome mouth! See, I have parted your dark brown hair away from your smooth, white forehead, and finished the long lashes that you may drop them over those earnest eyes. Now if that does not resemble our handsome young aunt, then I am no painter. Too sober is it, do you say? Oh no! for though she can make a stoic smile, and cheer the saddest heart with her gaiety, I have ever remarked that her countenance still retains that peculiarly serious expression. There Jenny, is your portrait, hang it up somewhere, and I dare say it will get copied into the papers.'

'Well Mary, you improve; and now do just give us a sketch of the person you see yonder leisurely crossing the street; I presume he is coming in here, and he will stay long enough to have his likeness taken if you wish him to.'

'O no, Fanny, do not ask me to paint him, for none but the hand of a master could do him justice. If I should try to copy that stern look of his, it would certainly frighten me away from my work; and his smile, I could never catch that fleeting smile.'

Do you remember our excursion up the mountain? I wish I could put that down on paper as it is pictured in memory. What a lovely day it was, how pure the air, and how blue the sky, there was not a cloud so large as a man's hand visible in the whole etherial expanse. The forest was shorn of its beauty, and the dry leaves which had so lately danced in their greenness to the breeze of summer, were now fallen from their high estate, and rustled beneath our measured tread, making melancholy music. There was no other sound save the soft sighing of the autumn wind and the falling of beech nuts on the crisp leaves at our feet. Our path wound upward, steep and stony was the way, and yet not very wearisome; for sometimes we paused to look back upon the country beneath us, and once or twice we rested upon a seat of velvet moss. We talked and laughed with apparent gaiety, for the scene was bright, and yet it saddened us; we said not why, and we asked not wherefore; for such feelings are seldom expressed in words, though they ever come over the sensitive heart on a lovely autumn day which saddens while it smiles.

At last we reached the summit, and the path turning abruptly round, revealed the scene which we came to view. Below lay a vale hollowed out from the encircling mountains with but a single dwelling to break its seeming solitude, and miles away the white spire of a village church tapered above the trees; then, all around, rose peak above peak, and line succeeding line, till they were lost in the distance and curtained by the bending sky. What was it that we saw, far away across the vale of the Connecticut, which caused our hearts to beat, and our lips to murmur "glorious!" It was the snow-covered and still more lofty mountains of another state. Long did I gaze upon them, but I cannot describe their appearance. I thought of glittering sand piles in the desert; of the sun-tipped waves of ocean; and of the storm-clouds which have spent their fury, and lie calmly reposing on the edge of the horizon, spreading their burnished outlines to the sun. When I breathe the free air of the mountain tops, I seem to be nearer heaven, and adoration of the mighty Maker of all things fills and exalts my soul. I see the beneficence and love of God in the painted flower, the rippling river and silver streamlet of the vale; but his might and majesty are manifested in the formation of the mountains, and who can dwell among them without having their hearts filled with sublime conceptions of his power! But let us take a farewell look at the landscape, for the day is waning, and the sun sinking in the West, warns us to depart; perhaps we may come again when the earth and sky wear a different aspect.'

'Well, Mary, I must say you are quite an artist, but there is E. with his swift horse driving up to give you your daily ride, and I suppose you must go; but we will resort to this amusement at some other time, and while away a pleasant hour with our pictorial illustrations.' M. A. D.

Lines on the Death of a Friend.

BY MRS. J. R. SPOONER.

DEATH has been here! His cold and iron grasp Hath broke the social circle—and we mourn
Thine absence from our midst—our pleasant friend!
And tender sympathies gush freely forth,
And we are led 'to weep with those that weep,'
For thee, as daughter, sister—mother—wife—
And O in each relationship how dear!
Thrice blessed ties! and in thy heart so strong,
So deep, these fond affections grew, each day
Seemed but to add a threefold cord to life.
For thou didst have so much to make thee blest,
Thine seemed no common lot—'twas not thy fate
To see thine earthly idols fade and die—
And time's cold changes never wrung thy heart
With disappointment's chill, and hope deferred.
Yes! thine were sunny days—no storm-clouds cast
Their gloomy shadows o'er thy way. The rose for thee
Gave up her fragrance, but retained her thorn.
Mysterious dread of death is interwove
So closely with our natures, that how'er
'The spirit' may be 'willing to depart
And be with Christ, which is far better'—still,
Her frail companion, trembling flesh, is 'weak,'
And shudders at the solemn pageantry
Of funeral pomp—the cold, dark grave—
And train of mourning friends, all strike the heart
With chill and sad emotion! Thus to thee!
Yet no unchristian fears or doubts had place,
To mar the peaceful tenor of thy soul;
For with a holy meekness thou didst wait
Thy spirit's summons, at the last sad hour.

Let us not mourn, dear friend, that thou hast changed
Earth's happiness for heaven's! Father, forgive
Our selfish tears—and grant us grace to feel
Through faith and hope, that she is happier now.
Great God! how wondrous are thy ways!
By eye of faith we know thou doest well—
Though why 'tis so, is hid from mortal ken.
And in my musings, I have marvelled much,
That this, our friend, with all her dear ones round her,
As a fair shrub, with blossoms rich and rare,
Is by the storm uprooted—yet the while
A blighted tree, shorn of its branches, stands
Untouched—alone—thus seemeth it to me,
Strange wonder, thou art taken, I am left!

Letters to Elizabeth. No. 3.

WINTER RAMBLES.

HAST thou forgotten, dear Elizabeth, the rambling disposition of thy friend? Are our morning and evening walks through the beautiful Highlands all, all forgotten? If not, perhaps thou wilt listen to a brief sketch of a few very pleasant winter rambles. It is pleasant to feel the freedom from the chains of worldly care, which is found by the wayside and in the wild, and to read a chapter from the book of nature in that season in which we least expect to find such beauty on its pages. A lovely January morn was that which we chose for a ramble over the Schuylkill. The sky was bright above as that of May, and the breeze with softened tone spoke of the same fair month. We passed slowly from the busy city, even as the noisy world passeth slowly from the heart which hath dwelt long amid its spirit-wearying cares. We lingered long by the waters of the beautiful stream, as if to wash each stain of earthliness from our souls, ere we passed over its silvery waves to seek the vales beyond.

Never shall I forget the sensation of delight which thrilled my soul, as with clasped hands and tear dimmed eyes I listened to the words, 'We are now in the country.' I wished to be away from the presence of other eyes and the sound of other voices, that I might kneel down once more in the wild solitude of Nature and hold communion with its spirit-eyes and list the music of its spirit-tones. I wished again to bathe my fevered brow in the limpid wave, and still my throbbing heart with its wild melody. The past with its mysterious power came over me, and its dearest and brightest recollections were of the forest and the hill, the verdant field and the dancing stream. The future stood before me pointing with prophetic hand to hopes for which youth had striven, and mingling its dreamy visions with the cold realities of the present, rendering their hues even yet more cold and stern, like the light which falleth over winter's snow. There was a dim feeling of ignorance came over me, like one who has slept a long and troubled sleep, and hath scarcely yet awakened. Was it not so? Had it been but memory which had called up those cherished forms which had once been ever with me? Did I not hear again the voices whose least tones had been of love? But inquiring eyes were bent upon me marvelling at my dreamy mood, and I must bid these haunting memories to their prison-house once more.

We were standing upon the grassy bank which wore the verdure of the early days of spring, upon one side was a grove of evergreens, on the other the city we had just left appeared, sitting 'like a bride amid her sister cities.' There was an enchantment in the scene for the heart which for months had been absent from its native wilds. Almost unconsciously I found myself searching for violets along the mossy way, and seeking to twine a wreath for 'January's front severe.' Lingeringly we took our way back to the bustling streets, the walks of busy and care-worn men, but we bore thither the quiet spirit we had won from the valley and the stream, and long may it be ere it is all effaced.

What shall I tell thee of my first visit to Fairmount? It was a truant one, and little did we think when we donned our cloaks for a walk, that it would extend so far. We wandered on, finding theme for conversation in every thing that met our mirth-seeking eyes, and for joyous thought in every happy human face, from the gay smile of the light hearted maiden, to the dark-hued child singing its rude song, from the mirthful countenance of the school child, to the cheerfulness of some quiet quaker face. We knew that it was winter, but we believed it not, for wisdom falleth far short of faith in its influence. The spell which was around us, had fallen upon our hearts, and we could not turn our steps to a homeward course. We thought not of return, and Fairmount with its beautiful scenery was near us ere we were aware. Little we recked that dinner was waiting our return, and our friends marvelling where the truant ones had fled; ideality had subdued alimentiveness, and the absent were forgotten in the present.

It is idle to speak of Fairmount. Words can never describe its loveliness to one who has never visited it, and to thee, to whom it is a familiar place, it were useless to say aught save of my own impressions with regard to it. We passed from the muddy and unpaved streets near it, to a spot where art has finished what Nature had so nobly planned. As we ascended the flight of steps and looked down upon the grand and beautiful scenery which every where appeared to greet the eye, one thought alone filled my mind. It has been eloquently expressed by another:

'The whole glad earth is beautiful,
To minds attuned aright,

And wheresoe'er my steps have turned,
A smile hath met my sight.'

We clambered down the hill-side with rustic daring, to win a branch of cedar as a token of our visit, and said farewell with one heartfelt prayer, Father, I thank thee that thou hast given unto me the love of the beautiful!

Art thou not wearied, sweet friend, by this most uninteresting relation of hours happily spent? Thou wilt think, in truth, that amid all the scenes with which this goodly city could furnish me as themes for thought, one might have been chosen more replete with interest to thee; but pardon me, for I would thou shouldst know that which adds most to my happiness. 'Come leave thy dreams of Ossian awhile, and let us walk out to Girard College,' said a friend; 'Most willingly,' I exclaimed, dropping the book which had occupied my attention. February never smiled upon a more lovely day than this of which I speak, and the party consisting of six all blest with the happiness of youth, went forth with merry hearts to enjoy its balmy air and sunny sky. It was such a sky as we must look upon and love, however little we may be disposed to dream of the clouds. So much of religion, pure and unfettered religion dwells in its depths of blue, varied ever and anon by clouds white as the garments of angels, that the spirit must be bound with a triple chain of weariness that striveth not to break its prison-bars and soar again all fetterless and free from earthly creeds. Oh, would I were a star, that I might dwell forever amid that glorious sky, far, far above the petty cares and idle joys of life, the pleasures, and vanities, and vexations that breathe upon the stainless mirror of the soul. Yet this is a sinful wish for a believer in the gospel of love.

'Then hush my heart, be still awhile,
And thou shalt go to rest.'

We soon reached the destination of our walk, the unfinished edifice which is to unite so much of the beautiful and magnificent. I need only say that it is Philadelphian. Now thou must not be jealous of this same Philadelphia, for I do assure thee that my heart is still in New England, my own fair home. It is strange how all I see or hear reminds me of its distant hills and vales. I seated myself upon a decaying stump near this monument of taste and magnificence, and while my eye wandered over its marble columns, the work of feeble man, my thoughts were roaming back to the dark forests of my native clime, where statelier columns wrought by God's own hand, rise in their still and solemn grandeur, where arching boughs shut out the sun as well, and the green turf beneath is all more fair than these cold marble floors. It is well that man should erect such edifices, yea, and make them as stately and as beautiful as he may, but let him acknowledge them but as humble imitations of the all-surpassing works of God. Where found he models, save in the woodland temples which are around us on every side? The most beautiful sculptured monument I have ever seen, was a broken column surrounded with a wreath; but it might have found its model in a lofty tree broken by the whirlwind, and left with only a few green leaves to tell of desolation and hope.

My sheet is nearly filled, so I must say to thee adieu, my friend, and only whisper, forget not me. Soft skies have smiled upon my way, kind hands have been extended to greet me, true hearts have echoed back my every thought, and gentle tones have ever been my welcome, but my wayward spirit still returneth to the absent, and there is joy in the thought—I shall soon be with them.

Sonnet to Kate.

AND thou hast left us! well, adieu,
Since fate decrees that we must sever;
We all confess we never knew
A spell so deep as thine is—never.

The soul that lights thy dark keen eye,
Has chained our hearts to thee forever;
And years on years may hurry by,
But we cannot forget thee—never.

Thy voice can make the saddest, gay,
Thy smile can smooth the roughest features;
It is not strange then, thou shouldst stay
But little time amongst earth's creatures:
For angel's visits, since old time began,
Have been but few and far between, to man.

'WOMAN. Nature has given woman an influence over man, more powerful than his over her; from birth to death, he takes help and healing from her hand, under all the most touching circumstances of life: her bosom soothes him in manhood, supports him in sickness and in age. Such influence as this, beginning at the spring of life, and acting in all its most trying moments, must diminish or increase his happiness, according to the moral and intellectual gradation of woman. Thus, upon her improvement in particular, depends human improvement in general.'

Mysteries of Heaven.

BY REV. JOHN G. ADAMS.

'DARKLY we move—we press upon the brink
Haply of viewless worlds, and know it not;
Yes! it may be, that nearer than we think
Are those whom death has parted from our lot!
Fearfully, wonderously, our souls are made—
Let us walk humbly on, but undismayed!'

MRS. HEMANS.

WHERE is heaven? Has it locality? Is it, as we have heard, a place where outward glories, beauties and splendors are seen; or is it only inward and spiritual?

That there is indeed a place; that there are many places or 'mansions' in the great universe of the Eternal, where wonders, glories and enjoyments unseen, unfelt by mortals, are realized, we hesitate not to believe. Reason and revelation distinctly intimate, if they do not specially describe them. We often seek them. Our own souls wing their way from these earth-born tenelements into the clear skies of the Infinite, among the burning mysteries there spread abroad. We ask, not only for our own future resting places, but for the abodes of those who have gone from us,—the loved, the departed—whose earthly places will know them no more forever. And where in this vast expanse are they? What spot is gladdened with their presence? Do they

'Walk the earth

Unseen, both when we sleep and when we wake?'

Are they ministering spirits whispering to our souls holy words of the past and for the future? or do they dwell away, where we shall yet meet them in the 'house not made with hands eternal in the heavens,'—in 'a city that hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God?' How shall these queries be answered? What is the full explanation of these scriptural illusions? How is the highest heaven of the soul described? What language shall make it known?

These questions we must answer as mortals. We have not yet angelic power. We walk the paths of earth; and have our conversation yet below. In reference to the things we have just spoken of, we are partly in the light—partly in darkness. 'Heaven is where virtue is.' It has its seat in the godlike soul—the soul in which pure happiness ever takes up her abode. Wherever goodness, mercy, humility, love, and true adoration exist, there is heaven—in this or in any other world. This we may safely say we know. The unvarying laws of God warrant such an assurance. But of the place where heaven is—apart from the earth;—the central court of the universe from whence Almighty first sends out its mandate and its power;—where cherubim and seraphim adore, and Christ the Savior dwells, and angels waiting stand to do the perfect will of God,—of this we cannot now know. It is not revealed to us. It is a secret which belongs to God alone: and this is best. It would not greatly benefit us, if we knew its location. We should still be on the earth—the frail, sinful children of mortality. We should have the same blindness upon us, the same weaknesses to contend against, the same sense of our own imbecility, and of the immeasurable distance between us and the infinite source of all.

Again: similar questions arise in relation to the joys and employments of celestial beings;—how heaven is made happy—how it differs from earth? How many good minds have been busily occupied in endeavors to solve these questions, and how little advancement have they made. It is not right that we should know these things. 'It doth not yet appear what we shall be,' said the beloved apostle to his brethren; 'but we know that when he (Christ) shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is.'

A revelation now of that which is in reserve for us hereafter, would be too much for us with our present constitution to endure. It would unfit us for earth, its employments and duties, take us from our sphere, and give us in answer to the present calls and responsibilities of this life, only transports and ecstasies concerning that which is to come. On this subject, the remarks of Dr. Blair are worthy the pen of a christian writer:—

'Were the celestial glory exposed to our admiring view; did the angelic harmony sound in our enraptured ears; what earthly concerns would have the power of engaging our attention for a single moment? All the studies and pursuits, the arts and labors which now employ the activity of man, which support the order, or promote the happiness of society, would be neglected and abandoned. Human life would present no objects sufficient to rouse the mind, to kindle the spirit of enterprise, or to urge the hand of industry. Impatient of his confinement within this tabernacle of dust, languishing for the happy day of his translation to those glorious regions which were displayed to the sight, he would sojourn on earth as a melancholy exile. Whatever Providence has prepared for the entertainment of man, would be viewed with contempt. Whatever is now attractive in society, would appear insipid. In a word, he would be no longer a fit inhabitant of this world, nor be qualified for those exertions which are allotted to him in his present sphere of being. But all his faculties, being sublimated above the measure of humanity, he would be in the condition of a being of superior order, who, obliged to reside among men, would regard their pursuits with scorn, as dreams, trifles, and puerile amusements of a day.

If, then, we are not yet permitted to understand the secret things which belong to God, what shall we do? Murmur and be disquieted, and refuse to enjoy the present, and the revealed truth of heaven? Say,—let us learn that we are deeply concerned in that which is already so clearly made known. We have enough—amply enough to study—of the actually present, the tangible, the positive,—without undue anxiety for the unknown of the future—the shadowy, or mysterious. God will open to our understandings all the treasures of his wisdom designed for us, in his own appointed way,—at his own best time. Till then let us know that we have almost every thing yet to learn concerning the very being we now enjoy. How many of us know our own duties—our relationship to God—his relationship to us? How many of us understand our own weaknesses, and are profited by what we ought to have learned, long since, in the school of earthly experience? Yes—how many of us who would often be living in the next existence, are fitted to know and enjoy the present? How many know what life is, and how to render it most agreeable to themselves—most conducive to the happiness of others—and thus most acceptable to our Father in heaven?

Until these things are considered as they should be,—until we are made wiser and better from the things already revealed,—more truly enlightened—more zealously engaged in the work of righteousness—more humble, obedient, devotional and pure,—let us not be over anxious about the mysteries of heaven—the secret things which belong to God. He will perform all his gracious promises; he will see that all the purposes of his love are accomplished; he will never leave us nor forsake us. It is for us to imitate him,—to be faithful in our sphere—and work together for the good of humanity while the light of heaven shines upon us to cheer our path below.

I cannot, perhaps, more appropriately close this subject, than in the relation of a dream, from the German of Herder:—

‘A pious visionary, too deeply absorbed in the contemplation of the Uncreated, forgot thereby the duties of his calling—the necessary burden of a mortal upon the earth. Once when, in deep reflection, he sat by his midnight lamp; he slumbered, and, in a dream, the gates of heaven were opened to him and he saw, what he had so long wished to behold, the ever-living throne. It was encircled with fire and enveloped in clouds of seven-fold darkness, from which lightnings flashed and awful thunders echoed; and before him and behind him was night. Terrified, he awoke, but he had not yet received instruction. He longed to behold the form of the throne, and again he sank into his revealing slumber. Four living creatures bore the throne, and with their faces they looked, and with their wings they darted to the four quarters of the creation, fulfilling the commands of Jehovah. Fiery perspiration ran down from them in streams, and from their unceasing motion they were so confused, they knew not how near they stood to the Throne, or what might be the majesty which they bore. The manlike figure in the holy chariot was just about to approach him, when suddenly, the vision of his slumber vanished, and he awoke still more uneasy than he was before.

He wished to behold the revealing angel, and the prophetic sleep a third time came over him. The Seraphim stood there next to the flaming throne; but their countenances were veiled even to their feet, and to him their song was unintelligible, when one of them approached him and pityingly said: “And darest thou, mortal, wish to gaze upon what even we are not permitted to behold? It is enough for thee that the bearers of the throne have been given to thy sight; for thou also art in the midst among them.” He ceased and the dreamer awoke. Just then a moth flew round his lamp—“it darted into the flame, its wings were burned, and it sank down.” “Was not I a fool,” said he to myself, “to require an angel to teach me that which this little burned moth has taught me?” He renounced henceforth the contemplation of the Seraphim, and became that for which man here below was created—a living laborer under the throne.

The lesson we may draw from the vision is this:—Since we cannot pierce the clouds and darkness around the throne of Jehovah, let us be content to know that justice and judgment are the habitation thereof; and that our chief duty now is to work beneath it in the fullness of our soul, might, mind and strength.

Romance of Woman. No. 6.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

ALFHILDA.

THE romantic Sagas of the Northmen, are said to be filled with many striking incidents of the heroic bearing of the Skioldmeyar, or Virgins of the Shield, who were frequently women of high birth, and becoming inflamed with martial enthusiasm, went forth as pirates on the seas, or more commonly fought in land battles, as in the time of the Cimbri who invaded Italy and were so signally defeated by Marius. Among others, is the tale of 'Alfhilda, daughter of Sigurd, king of the Ostrogoths, who was chaste, brave, and fair, but always veiled from curiosity, and living in a secluded bower, guarded by two champions of prodigious strength and valor. These the suitor for her hand was required to vanquish, or forfeit his own life if he failed in the enterprise. Alf, a young Sea-king, encountered and slew them both; but the lady herself, not disposed to surrender tamely, put to sea with her female companions, all clothed in male attire, and completely armed for war. A fleet of Vikingr chose the intrepid princess for their leader, and with these she continued to rove the Baltic, until the fame of her exploits reached the ears of her lover, who pursued the squadron into the Gulf of Finland. The lady gave battle, and though her vessel was boarded by Alf in person, she made a most determined resistance, until her helmet, being cloven asunder, disclosed to the astonished youth the fair face and lovely locks of his coy mistress, who, being thus overcome, no longer refused him the hand he had so magnanimously won.'

Crichton's & Wheaton's Scandinavia.

THERE's the tramp of a warrior through the dell;
There's the flash of a shield where the sunbeam fell;
And helm, and halbert, and sword throw back
A gleam of light o'er the rugged track;
For the bold Sea-king, from his realm of wave,
Where the Bersaerker* guarded Alfhilda the brave,
Had come, in the might of his love and fame,
The beautiful Skioldmeyar's heart to claim.

But who might enter Alfhilda's bower?
What eye dared gaze on that Gothic flower?—
'Twas a bold emprise that the Sea-king sought,
But he in a thousand frays had fought,
And his strong right arm, with its valiant sword,
Had routed in battle the Vikingr horde,
Had vanquished the bravest that swept the waves,
And dotted the earth with his victims' graves.

Yet neither on land, nor his own home sea,
Such valorous champions e'er met he,
As the terrible guard at that strong, old tower,
Where the Shield-Maiden dwelt in her royal bower.

* The Bersaerker were body-guards attached to the persons of kings and great chiefs. They were famed for their prowess.

† Vikingr were pirates.

The ramparts that spread round her barred domain,
Were the bones of men that her guard had slain,
And pickets of skeleton arms swept round,
Each with a skull of a Vikingr crowned.

But a message is speeding from Odin's Hall;—
The Bersaerker now at their gates shall fall;
For those Fatal Sisters, the Valkyries,
Who bear from Odin his death decrees,
Are waiting the issue of Alf's emprise,
To lead the slaughtered to Paradise.
For day shall not wane ere their grim heads tower
From the skeleton walls of Alfhilda's bower.

'Tis done! and Valhalla resounds with song,
For the valiant dead through its portals throng;
And chiefest of all in the ghostly crowd,
Are they who at Alf's high prowess bowed.
But vain to that warrior his bold success—
No princess awaited a lover's caress;
Like a bird through the dell had the Shield-Maiden flown,
And the Sea-rover stood in her palace—alone!

A vessel rides forth from a rock-bound cove,
Freighted and armed o'er the seas to rove;
And brave hearts beat 'mid her gleaming sails,
Though the boldest of these 'neath one eye quails;
For a lofty Spirit rules over the ship,
Though the beardless cheek and the ripe, red lip,
Are tokens that woman, the proud, the free,
Has marshalled her host on the stormy sea!

Each helm of brass, on those high-borne heads,
O'er locks of auburn its armor spreads;
Each glittering shield has its sacred part
To shield in the conflict a woman's heart.
For Alfhilda has rallied her shield-maid band—
They rove the seas at her proud command—
And thus by the fleet of the Vikingr seen,
She is followed, and hailed as their own Sea-Queen.

Bold are the deeds of this pirate horde—
Many their conflicts with arrow and sword;—
And blood is shed o'er the stormy waves,
Where thousands go down to their coral graves;
For the maiden once guarded by rampart and tower,
Is roving the Baltic—a queen in power!
Alfhilda of Gothland, the royal, the free,
Has marshalled a host on the stormy sea!

And Alf has heard of the valiant chief
Who pilots her squadron o'er rock and reef;
Who has stained the tide with her foemen's blood,
And battled the fury of fight and flood.
And his own proud heart with a jealous glow,
Has urged him forward to meet the foe;
But little he dreams 'tis the brave Shield-Maid,
In the Vikingr's armor and power arrayed.

They meet in the Gulf of the ancient Fin,
'Mid the roar of waves and the conflict's din;
For Alf has invaded the ship of his foe,
And they meet in combat, with clash and blow.
The Sea-king had fought in a thousand frays,
And spent in battle his youthful days,
Yet ne'er had he met, on the land or wave,
Such valorous thrusts as the Sea-Queen gave!

But idle the conflict beyond that stroke
Whose weight through the helm of the maiden broke;
On the startled gaze of the warrior fell
The power of a strong and a deathless spell;
And he who had fought in a thousand frays,
Who had spent in the conflict his youthful days,
His conquering sword to the Sea-Queen gave,
And knelt in his triumph—a willing slave!

Good deeds always get paid for in advance.
So should newspapers be thus treated!

Burial of a Child.

ALONG the crowded path they bore her now, pure as the newly-fallen snow that covered it; whose day on earth had been as fleeting. Under that porch, where she had sat when Heaven in its mercy brought her to that peaceful spot, she passed again, and the old church received her in its quiet shade. They carried her to one old nook, where she had many a time sat musing, and laid their burden softly on the pavement. The light streamed on it through the colored window—a window where the boughs of trees were ever rustling in the summer, and where the birds sang sweetly all day long. With every breath of air that stirred among those branches in the sunshine, some trembling, changing light, would fall upon her grave. Earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust. Many a young hand dropped in its little wreath, many a stifled sob was heard. Some—and they were not a few—knelt down. All were sincere and truthful in their sorrow. The service done, the mourners stood apart, and the villagers closed around to look into the grave before the pavement stone should be replaced. One called to mind how he had seen her sitting on that very spot, and how her book had fallen on her lap, and she was gazing with a pensive face upon the sky. Another told, how he had wondered much that one so delicate as she, should be so bold; how she had never feared to enter the church alone at night, but had loved to linger there when all was quiet; and even to climb the tower stairs, with no more light than that of the moon's rays stealing through the loophole in the thick old wall. A whisper went about among the oldest there, that she had seen and talked with angels; and when they called to mind how she had looked and spoken, and her early death, some thought it might be so, indeed. Thus, coming to the grave in little knots, and glancing down and giving place to others, and falling off in whispering groups of three or four, the church was cleared in time of all but the sexton and the mourning friends. They saw the vault covered and the stone fixed down. Then, when the dusk of evening had come on, and not a sound disturbed the sacred stillness of the place—when the bright moon poured in her light on the tomb and monument, on pillar, wall, and arch, and most of all (it seemed to them) upon her quiet grave—in that calm time, when all outward things and inward thought teem with assurance of immortality, and worldly hopes and fears are humbled in the dust before them—then, with tranquil and submissive hearts they turned away, and left the child with God. Oh! it is hard to take to the heart the lessons that such deaths will teach; but let no man reject it, for it is one that all must learn, and is a mighty, universal truth. When death strikes down the innocent and young; for every fragile form from which he lets the panting spirit free, a hundred virtues rise, in shape of mercy, charity, and love, to walk the world, and bless it. Of every tear that sorrowing mortals shed on such green graves, some good is born, some gentler nature comes. In the destroyer's steps there spring up bright creations that defy his power, and his dark path becomes a way of light to heaven.—Dickens.

'Comfort ye my People.'

BY IONE.

MOURN for the sinful dead,—
They who have walked the thorny paths of care,
Without the peace by calm repentance shed,
To win the spirit from a dread despair.

Mourn not the gentle flower,
Stricken at morning while the glittering dew—
Tear-drops of angels—night's unsullied dower—
Hung on its leaves their freshness to renew!

Mourn not the sinless soul,
At rest from all its wanderings, in the land
Whose plains are watered by the gentle roll
Of the bright river at our God's right hand!

When, in the gay parterre,
The sweetest flower is trampled in the dust,
Sighing, we miss its fragrance in the air,
And bathe in tears the ruins of our trust.

When from the heart's bouquet,
Kind angels cull the flowers, we turn and weep!
They still shall flourish in immortal day,
And He who took them, shall his treasures keep.

Through him, the spotless one,
Who clasped earth's blossoms to his yearning breast,
We breathe the earnest prayer, 'God's will be done,'
His own are gathered to their promised rest!

A Fragment.

THE punishment of sin—I use this phrase for want of a better—is sufficient for sin. It is bad enough to live without the vivifying presence of God in this world. It is so great a misfortune, that we should labor to preserve our fellow-men from its endurance. Those partialists who tell us that many of the worst sinners are prosperous in this world, will, in the next breath, say that houses and lands, money and gilded carriages, do not constitute happiness; but that the humble cottager, if he have Christ for his possession, is happier than princes who have him not. 'The kingdom of heaven is within you.' The pain attendant on sin, is given in mercy to guard us against sin—to prevent us from departing from the light of God's gracious countenance. The tree of life, in Eden, was cut down, lest men should live forever without God, and death was pronounced in mercy lest we should wander forever.

Obituary.

To oblige a subscriber, we make a record here of a death, the notice of which we received in January, but was overlooked in making up the February number.

MRS. JULIA M. FERRIS, died in Hillsdale, Michigan, on the 28th of April, 1841, aged 24 years and 4 months. For several years she had professed faith in the great doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of a ransomed world, and with firm confidence in its truth, she departed this life. May her relatives have a like firmness of faith, that consolation may be abundant and hope fervent.

Importance of Intellectual Culture.

A CULTIVATED mind, says Dr. Channing, may be said to have infinite stores of innocent gratification. Every thing may be made interesting to it, by becoming a subject of thought or inquiry. Books regarded merely as a gratification, are worth more than all the luxuries on earth. A taste for literature secures cheerful occupation for the unemployed and languid hours of life; and how many persons, in these hours, for want of innocent resources, are now impelled to coarse and brutal pleasure. How many young men can be found in this city, who unaccustomed to find a companion in a book, and strangers to intellectual activity, are almost driven in a long dull evening of winter to haunts of intemperance, and depraving society. It is one of the good signs of the times, that lectures on literature and science are taking their place among other public amusements, and attract even more than theatres.

This is one of the first fruits of our present intellectual culture. What a harvest may we hope for from its wider diffusion!

Our Book and Memoranda Table.

REMOVAL TO PROVIDENCE, R. I. The Editor has removed to Providence, R. I., having commenced the pastoral relation with the first Universalist Society of that city. All personal or private correspondence must be directed there; communications for, or relating to this periodical, must be sent to the Publisher.

In leaving the place of our former residence, we sever many strong and precious ties, and part with earnest lovers of truth and devoted friends of religion, endeared to us by unquestionable tokens of affection and fidelity. We leave in full fellowship with all, and rejoice amid sadness that we have the good wishes, and shall have the kind remembrances, of every member of the society. Faithful brethren and devoted sisters have proved their worthiness and strong claims for esteem, and we are free to bear witness to their uniform kindness and christian consideration. We cannot but believe that their course will be onward, and that they will 'keep the unity of the spirit, in the bond of peace.' God give them a faithful servant in holy things, and bless them with all spiritual good.

We part with them to assume greater responsibilities; but our trust in Him who has thus far made our strength equal to our day, is strong, and may his presence guide, strengthen, and prosper us.

NEXT VOLUME—NECESSITY FOR EXERTION ON THE PART OF THE FRIENDS OF THE WORK. Arrangements are now in progress to present a far superior Magazine to our patrons than we have yet sent out, and we feel justified in asking of the real friends of the work, renewed and extra exertions to increase the subscription list. This we feel to be essential to the continuation of the work, with anything like an adequate return to the Publisher. This may seem to be a common remark for conductors of periodicals, but there is in this case, peculiar, emphatic, and deep reaching meaning in it, and we are honest and serious in asking our readers so to consider it. We have suffered by the establishment of new, local papers, by the extent to which our work is borrowed, and the necessity many have felt to lessen their expenditures; and add to these, the loss of a large sum due by treacherous subscribers. But we must not enumerate the whys and wherefores of the earnest call we make, trusting that we shall be believed when solemnly we say that there is a necessity for our friends to see what can be done to give more adequate support to the work.

The new volume will commence JULY FIRST, instead of June 15th, as many objections have been made to the issuing of our work on the 15th, instead of the first, as is usual with monthly publications. A new, neat, and smaller type than is now used, will give a different aspect to the work, and admit of a greater amount and variety of matter; and we shall add, QUARTERLY, a fine steel engraving, illustrated. In short, we hope to offer to our patrons a work of beauty and interest, combining valuable matter with exterior attraction, and worthy of a most generous support from liberal christians.

OUR TITLE. We have received by letters and verbally many suggestions why our title should be altered and made to read simply 'LADIES' REPOSITORY.' By dropping the term 'UNIVERSALIST,' it is said, we shall cease to awaken prejudices towards the work, and will find many more readers than now. But to carry out the spirit of such an alteration, we should have to banish that term entirely from our pages, lest what now startles on the cover, might frighten as soon as the book is opened. This we cannot do. We should rather humbly labor to bring the name into more esteem, than to hide it. We love every letter of it, and rejoice that it was not borrowed from any man, but is a name for the embodiment of the divinest principles, reminding of the completeness of the system of truth with which it is connected. More than this, we wish to cling to the name that the reader may readily understand what doctrine we are advocating, or what views of christian truth we are unfolding and applying. We would ask no higher honor than to be endowed with talent and tact to make the work worthy of its name; and our heart's desire is to approach nearer and nearer to the beautiful Ideal. We thank those who have suggested what they deem would be an improvement, and doubt not but they meant kindly in offering the remarks which have been tendered. Still we must cling to our name, and labor to make it appreciated as synonymous with 'Perfect Man.'

It may not be out of place to remark in this place, that there is, or was lately, published in Cincinnati a Methodist monthly publication entitled 'The Ladies' Repository.' We should not wish to have our work confounded with that, or mistaken for it.

THE PRO AND CON OF UNIVERSALISM. By George Rogers. A. Tompkins will soon publish a new and very neat edition of the above valuable work—a work which embodies a great variety and amount of matter, in relation to the questions in controversy between Universalists and all antagonists. It will be valued by all who may possess it. We refer to a Prospectus in this No. for a fuller description of the work.

THE WASHINGTONIAN POCKET COMPANION; containing a choice collection of Temperance Hymns, Songs, &c. Utica, N. Y., G. Tracy & O. Hutchinson. 1842. This is an excellent collection of Hymns and Songs for Temperance Meetings, adapted to many favorite airs. We are glad to greet such publications, for they do a great amount of good in a pleasant way. This neat, little work, contains 122 Hymns and Songs, together with some valuable hints and suggestions to Washingtonians.

MONEY WANTED—UNREASONABLE DELINQUENCES. We care little about words of 'learned length,' but we should like to command some of 'thundering sound,' if with them we could peel the thunders of the violated law of honesty and integrity into the ears of hundreds of unreasonable delinquents. Letters have been issued from this office during the past week to delinquent subscribers, the aggregate amount of whose dues is over $2000! Who will not say, 'That's too bad'? Let every delinquent who reads this, make a desperate effort to lessen the evil, and remove in some degree the heavy burden from the Publisher. The names of those who are still considered subscribers and from whom no answers are received, will be stricken from the list at the close of this volume.

Will our Agents oblige us by settling as many dues as possible, and by doing so immediately? We shall trust much to their interest in the publication and their friendly feeling towards us.

LETTERS TO REVS. B. STOWE, R. H. NEALE, and R. W. CUSHMAN, on the Knapp Excitement.

We learn that Mr. A. Tompkins will issue immediately a new work entitled as above, from the pen of Br. O. A. SKINNER, which, we presume, will thoroughly discuss the character and influence of such excitements as are created by itinerant revivalists, outraging all the decencies of life, and turning the church of God into a 'low priced theatre.' We are glad that this work is not a mere essay on the evils of the late scenes of confusion in our city, but is full of sober matter, directed to the responsible persons who have prepared the stage and made themselves servants to a rough, gross, and ignorant itinerant. Some of these, we know, have freely acknowledged, in private conversation, that they did not approve the chief actor's tricks and fooleries, but as the people countenanced him, and he was 'waking them up,' they consented to yield him the stage. A retribution will come upon them for their duplicity, and in after days men will wonder that such Expediency was mistaken for Right. We hope that a wide circulation will be given to this work, and that it will be kept as a manual to consult at the times of the periodical returns of spasmodic religion, when 'some are made mad and many melancholy.' It should be made a family book, to guard the unsuspecting against a too easy confidence in the tales and stories that are so abundant in every time of what is called a 'Revival;' for at no time are so many falsehoods circulated as during these seasons of moral calamity. And more than this, the work will have a good influence in showing the necessity of retaining the exercise of our reasoning faculties at all times, and of never deserting the true magnet for clouded stars when the sea of life is tempestuous and around us blow many 'winds of doctrine.'

We are confident that the style of the work will be what it should be—calm, serious, and dignified; and we trust the work will commend itself to the candid of every denomination of christians.

The work will be issued early in march, in a neat style of typography and binding, and will be afforded at 50 cents per copy. Will the friends of permanent religion and vital godliness, 'in all the region round about,' aid the circulation of this important work? We trust the issue will tell nobly in behalf of the interest of our friends in what pertains to true progress.

NEW WORK ON THE PARABLES, for Sabbath Schools, by J. M. Austin. We learn that Br. Austin is preparing a work for Sabbath School instruction on the Parables spoken by our Lord during his ministry on earth, and we must regard such a work, well arranged and developed, as promising to add much interest to Sabbath School instruction. We shall expect a good work, as Br. Austin is a man of patience and great care, and doubtless he will prepare something which will be highly valued. We hope it will not be hurried, as some of our Sabbath School Instruction Books are very deficient, it may be not so much from inability to make them thorough and what they should be, as from the haste with which they were sent forth. Whatever is designed as a permanent work, and to be placed in the hands of children, should be correct in its matter and style.

THE BETTER COVENANT. We have received No. III. of a new weekly paper published at Rockford and Saint Charles, Illinois, entitled as above, and conducted by the proprietors—Seth Barnes and Wm. Rounseville. It makes a good appearance, and we are highly pleased with its general tone. Its size is a small quarto, small and close type, giving a large quantity of matter for the size, and is published at $2 per annum.

WESTERN LUMINARY. Here is another new publication, hailing from Rochester, N. Y. It is a small quarto, large type, and very well printed. It has four editors—C. Hammond, J. Whitney, J. Chase, and J. M. Cook; and is published by J. M. Cook and W. Chase, at $1 per year.

PORTLAND, Me. Br. L. L. Sadler has received and accepted an invitation to become pastor of the Universalist Society in the above named city, and we trust, having every reason to believe, that the connection will be one that shall promote the highest interests of the cause we love in that place. Br. S. has our best wishes and prayers for his success.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS. Our readers will please take a pencil and cross the word 'own' in the last line of the poem in the February No., entitled, 'Are we slumbering now?'

The present No. has been made up amid the hurry and bustle of moving, but we have no apologies to make, as we believe this No. is as good as any, and we have not slighted it at all.

Our thanks are due to our kind correspondents for their liberal and excellent favors. We cannot enumerate, as the confusion around us has diseased our organ of Order, and we are troubled.

We hope to receive many contributions from those whose promises yet remain to be fulfilled.

That moss-covered vessel I hail as a treasure,
 For often at noon, when returned from the field,
 I found it the source of an exquisite pleasure,
 The purest and sweetest that nature can yield.
 How ardent I seized it, with hands that were glowing,
 And quick to the white pebbled bottom it fell,
 Then soon with the emblem of truth o'erflowing,
 And dripping with coolness it rose from the well,
 The old oaken bucket, the iron-bound bucket,
 The moss-covered bucket arose from the well.

The Marys at the Sepulchre.

BY HENRY BACON.

'AND there was Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary, sitting over against the sepulchre.'

As we awaken our imaginative powers to give a reality—a present existence to the incidents connected with the above record, we behold a scene of solemn and tender interest. It is early morning, and the twilight has not yet departed from the hills, and the shadows are dark and dense in the garden where the Lord lay entombed. Yet even now those shades are departing, as if emblematic of what was about to be for the mental world over which the gloom of error's night had long hung, shrouding from human sight the most beautiful of all the creations of God. The silence of the garden is broken by sounds amid the dry leaves in the paths, and slowly and timidly some female forms approach, with their robes wrapped close around them, for the air is chill, and its chillness is more than ordinarily felt as their hearts are sad. Yet now their countenances are not so dark and sorrowful as when they entered the sacred retreat, for they find a sympathy in the aspect and solemn beauties of the place; they feel what many grief-stricken hearts have felt, that amid the vernal loveliness of the garden—in communion with its green and fragrant things, there is a mysterious power to soothe and bless, stealing into the heart to allay its fever, invisibly and softly as the dew into the cup of the sun-burnt and drooping flower. They love to be there. For them nature seems to put on new beauties, and the rustling of the foliage by the light wind, breathes for them a soothing melancholy music. They are happier there than they have been through the wakeful night, while they were in their homes thinking over what they had heard from many voices around them during the past day, while the multitudes passed to and fro—for it was the Passover Sabbath—and as they recalled also what He himself had taught them. They meditate now on his declarations that he should rise again, and they marvel, yet dare not to doubt, respecting the fulfilment. They come nearer the tomb with spices and sepulchral perfumes, but pause and sit down over against the sepulchre—a short distance opposite the tomb; the place is hid from them by the foliage of the richly robed trees. There, in solemn and affectionate mood, Mary Magdalene and Mary the wife of Zebedee, sit. They are thinking of their Master—he who was ever so gentle and good. Mary Magdalene is dwelling on the compassion he manifested when she was a wretched being, possessed, as she and her kindred thought, of demons. She thinks of the blessed day when the holy man drew near and gazed steadfastly upon her with eyes so holy, so heavenly, so full of divine authority, that she felt that even demons must confess and obey their power. She remembers how she knelt, glad to kiss even the fringe of his robe; and how she felt his hand upon her brow, cooling as the fountain in the desert to her heated brain; and how she rose, made 'whole'—once more to mingle in life's realities, once more free from the power of wild and torturing fancies, once more to be useful in the exercise of the gentle humanities of a happy social existence. Her heart is full of blessings on the merciful hand that woke her from her awful dreams! And now she muses on his teachings—on the works of mercy he has performed—on the hatred which the proud had shown towards him, and on the even tenor of his godlike course! She thinks how she saw him when he was doomed to bear his cross—how when they that loved him wept, he turned and bade them weep not for him! She remembers the late scene on Calvary with all its horrors—for she was there! There she tarried till the last agony was over, and she beheld her Lord in death! And O as now she sits over against his sepulchre, she sees him as then she beheld him—immovable and dead! She is sitting at the sepulchre of her hopes, and her heart is sorrowful indeed! She could not but once hope that all would love him whom she loved—so good, so amiable, so everything that should wake human admiration and respect. She could not but once hope that his would be a noble kingdom, embracing the good of every name, and rescuing thousands from the paths of shame where the morally dead lie in corruption. She could not but hope that many a mourner's heart would be comforted by him, many a wounded spirit healed, many a soul rescued, as she had been, from a world of visions awful and terrific! But alas! where are now her hopes? All buried with her Lord, over against whose sepulchre she sits, mourning that there is a great stone rolled against its mouth, that feeble woman cannot move away.

And who is it sits by her side with full sympathy in her solemn musings? It is the mother who once was the most ambitious of all—who once fell prostrate at Jesus' feet in the act of worship, and asked of him a favor. He bade her speak her wants—and O how she did then make known the ambition of her soul! Yet there is beauty in it, for it shows how the mother's heart is in her children's advancement. It should be so—if the mind rightly knows what true advancement is. She remembers how the Lord looked upon her when he said, 'What wilt thou?' She remembers too the change that came over his countenance, and feels again the sorrowful rebuke she read there, as she asked, with her two sons beside her, that one might sit on his right hand and the other on his left, when his kingdom should be established—that to them might be given high stations of honor. She remembers how he glanced upon her sons and asked them, if they could bear the sufferings that must come to one worthy to have what was asked for each of them. She remembers his pitying look as they answered in their ignorance, 'We are able.' She remembers his answer, and recalls those solemn words he spake to her, earnestly, yet kindly, 'Ye know not what ye ask.' O since that hour she has studied to know her duty better, to become more spiritual, to throw aside an undue uplifting pride, and to teach her sons humility. She too followed Jesus to Calvary. She too saw the awful scenes of his death. She too thanked God that to her was given

'A strength which by its deep, o'er-mastering power,
Sustained her heart in that dread, solemn hour.'

And to her even Israel's sabbath has been a weary day, as it kept her from the tomb—the sepulchre of her hopes. She was glad when the first glimmerings of twilight came, when she knelt in prayer, and went forth to meet Mary Magdalene, with her to visit the sacred retreat—the garden of the sepulchre. There they sit, and while they pause, more of the faithful sisters approach, and as they there mingle melancholy thoughts, they say among themselves, 'Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre?' for they would perform the holy office of anointing the revered and beloved dead. They feel nerved with new strength and advance, and lo! the stone is already removed and the body is gone! Their first thought was, that the enemies of Jesus had stolen the body away, and grief overwhelmed them that they should be denied the performance of the last office of affection. But lo! an angel appeareth to them and asketh Mary Magdalene why she weepeth? 'Because,' saith the mourner, 'they have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him.' He tells them he is risen as he prophesied he should, and they fly to tell the disciples the glad news. But Mary, as she turned, met as she supposed the gardener—a form clad in the gardener's robes—and was asked, 'Woman, why weepest thou?' In her bewilderment, she again thought of Jesus as dead, and said, 'Sir, if thou have borne him hence, tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away!' as though Joseph's love had cooled and the sepulchre was deemed too good for him. 'I will take him away,' that he may trouble you no more—I will seek for him a tomb. It was enough—the last proof of deep and ardent affection was given, and, O God! what a bliss was given her! She had turned to hide her tears, and O what an electrifying power was in the sound of her own name Mary! as she knew the voice and turning exclaimed 'Rabboni!' Master. She would have embraced him, but he forbade her, and gave her the mission to go and tell the disciples that she had seen him, and that he was to ascend to his and her Father and God! Her hopes were all given back to her, her grief departed, and she was happy indeed.

We leave the scenes of the past, sacred and blissful as they are, and ask: Why should woman, to whom the Gospel has come, have the same love the Marys had, and that has hallowed their name so that she is blessed indeed who is worthy to wear it? I answer, Because in two important respects, she is like them; and these are,—

1. Jesus hath done much for woman; and
2. Woman is often called to sit over against the sepulchre of her hopes, against the door of which there is a great stone rolled, too heavy for her to remove.

I have said that woman should love Jesus as the Marys did, because of what he hath done for her. And has he not done much? Has he not blessed her with the richest benefits? Has he not proved himself her truest friend? I trust the heart can answer these queries far better than words. It can, if reflection has been given to them aright—if ever in holy and sweet solitude woman has thought over the history of Jesus and what he was to her sex. How different is her condition from what it was before christianity was established—before the voice of that religion went forth to bid man release woman from degrading servitude and make her his true companion and equal. It is christianity that has breathed into woman a consciousness of her noble nature—that has taught her her rights and interests—that has instructed her how to cultivate her affections, feelings, and intellect—that has shown her what relations she holds, what important duties she has to perform, what glorious results she may produce. It is christianity that has sanctified her dearest union, as it was never sanctified before, and redeemed her from a thousand evils to which her sex is now subject, where that religion has never been established. It is christianity that has given her hopes most essential to the happiness of her being, giving her joy and gladness when the music of the viol and the poetry of the dance have no charms to her—when the freshness of youthful life is departed, and the records of the past are mourned over with deep sighs and hot tears. It sanctifies her marriage—it kneels with her as she learns her first born his earliest prayer—it speaks of heaven as she gazes on his cherub countenance as he lies in the beauty of sleep—it teaches her how to be faithful to her affections—it strengthens her when trials come—it makes her an angel at the sick bed—it gives her patience and submission when despair would claim her—it opens heaven as earth grows dark, and brings Jesus to her at the tomb. It is now abroad doing a great work for her improvement, to wake man to a deeper and fuller consciousness that his dignity is united with her exaltation. Ay, they should all be Marys—permitting nought to come between them and the clearest manifestations of unreserved and heartfelt devotion to Jesus. They should often visit the sepulchre of the entombed Lord, and earnestly meditate on what would have been their lot had he not risen. They should strive to sympathize with the watchers there, and wait for the angel of glorious hope—for the presence of the risen Jesus! That Jesus whose first protector, friend and teacher, was a woman. In whose history she is always mentioned in union with deeds of kindness and expressions of attachment. From whom she ever received the tenderest regard, and to whom she was steadfastly devoted, ay, even to the death. At whose sepulchre she was the first visitor—who first received the tidings of the resurrection, first rejoiced in them and spread them abroad. And O when the little company of the faithful waited on the day of Pentecost for the fulfillment of his promise, woman was there; and when the tongues of heavenly fire—of warm and thrilling eloquence were given, did not woman also receive of the gifts? They did, or Peter would not have quoted all the words of holy Joel where he uttered the words of God: 'I will pour out my spirit and your daughters shall prophesy. On my hand-maidens, I will pour out in those days of my Spirit, and they shall prophesy'—utter truths discerned by the inner vision enlightened of God. O woman, if she love Jesus—and indeed she should—may have as powerful an eloquence as ever was possessed—the eloquence of an amiable life, wherein examples and deeds are heart moving words. Home is her temple, and there she may be a christian preacher. Life will assume a worthier aspect. Her joy will be in her duties—not in the gaities of fashion and the unsatisfying follies of unsanctified pleasure. She will cease to mourn the departure of 'the days of chivalry'—the days when man's homage was merely outward, not honorable to himself, or to be coveted by her—days when beauty was worth more than amiability, and the pure palm was clasped by a hand of blood. In those days, too frequently called the golden days of woman, she was but an object of sense—her value fast lessening as her beauty faded and her youth departed; for love was not hallowed by those feelings of sympathy and imperishable esteem for mind and heart, which make affection in the christian lover and husband survive the departure of youth and beauty. It is christianity that makes mind valuable, by declaring its immortality; that makes love the ennobling passion, by giving it purity and sacred earnestness; and unites souls by sympathetic bonds strong and enduring as the unions of heaven. Christianity weans woman from slavish attachment to the artificials of life, and consecrates her whole being to noble duties and pure enjoyments.

I have said woman should love Jesus as the Marys did, because she is often called to sit over against the sepulchre of her hopes in sorrow. And is it not so? Disappointment, sickness and death, have not yet been ruled out of power. They are still around us—man and woman. They are near—they may be felt to-morrow; nay, even to-day their evils may be experienced. She that liveth to pleasure is indeed dead while she liveth—dead to what is advancing, to what she really needs, to what her best and highest interests require. But not only to her, but to the good and faithful evils come; and happy are they who mourn like the Marys, for like the Marys they shall be comforted.

Look in reverently upon that mother. She blessed God devoutly when he gave her her 'new name,' and she has blessed him many times since for the same. She hath rejoiced much in the beauty and gladness of her child, and the year was one sweet summer in her home. Time winged its flight, and while it flew with rapid speed, she taught her son to be wise and good—to be strong against evil, and devote himself to useful and honorable pursuits. A thousand hopes were garnered up in him—hopes of his gaining human love, of his being the benefactor of his race, of his living in the hearts of all who knew him. But the world has dealt sadly with him, and he is morally dead—and there his mother sits over against his sepulchre, but O how unlike the sepulchre of Jesus that was new and in a garden! A huge stone is in the way which she has not the strength to remove, and her heart is sad. But good angels draw near and give her sweet encouragement. She meets Jesus, and her heart is made strong. She thinks of what he has taught, and recalls the beautiful story of the prodigal son! It is so like her boy leaving home, that she weeps; and she weeps more bitterly when she follows him to the scenes of guilt and wretchedness. But her tears stop their flow as she sees him pausing to think of home—its plenty and all its dear attractions, and at last he resolves to return in penitence and love. She thinks it is her own beloved child, and she kneels in thanksgiving. The stone is rolled from the tomb—he is risen, saith the angel. Love is again all active, and hopes revive. She is still willing to live and labor, though awhile since she would have been glad to die. Filial affection in a sinful world cannot do without Jesus. Where he comes not, the heart must grow cold or break. O be thankful, mothers, that for ye Jesus lives.

Let us visit yon home where at midnight the lone wife sits beside the pale lamp, at her task. Why those tears that course down her cheeks? Alas! she too is sitting over against the sepulchre of her hopes. The light has shone upon the circlet of gold she has still preserved upon the heart-finger, and memory is now busy. O what hopes she once knew! what precious promises of happiness were hers! He to whom she gave herself, has forgotten his early love—his vows and resolves are unheeded, and he is indeed in the abodes of death. She sits and knows not what to think. She begins to ask herself if she has not suffered enough, and if she should not throw him from her? But her heart will not let her answer, for Jesus meets her—she sees him in the beauty of his unfaltering love, and learns to estimate the glory of love's martyrdom! She is at the cross with the Marys, and there learns with them to forgive. That sweet smile which just passed over her face, and gilded the tear as it rolled from her eye, was kindred with the smile of Jesus when he prayed. 'My Lord threw not from him his murderers, nor will I,' says the midnight watcher. Her patience returns, and her prayers have a new fervency and pathos in them. O to her there may soon come a resurrection morn, to give her a new sabbath and a new heart, when her hopes shall be untombed and come forth in more than their early beauty! O suffering and forsaken woman, hope on—never despair. It is the glory of thy sex that they have best imitated the unconquerable love of Jesus, and have sat over against the tomb with an unfaltering trust in better days—have looked beyond the grave for what this world would not give them. Let it ever be so, for if, as Paul saith, 'the woman is the glory of the man, love is the glory of the woman. Let them glory in each other.

Let us take another view of woman's need of the religion of Jesus, by gently entering into yon darkened room where a mourner sits. She has just returned from the discharge of a sad office—the entombing of as sweet a babe as ever made a worldly mother proud, or reminded the christian parent of heaven. The sabbath has not yet dawned in brightness upon her, and there she sits over against the sepulchre of brightest and most dear hopes. To her Jesus by his truth draws near. He is holding a little one in his arms and blessing it, and speaking of heaven. That infant is the image of her own, and she gazes on the fair vision till heaven's beauties gather around her, and she feels again united to the departed. Her hopes revive—they take hold on immortal things, and the heaven she would have made for her child in time, she rests assured God has given it in eternity. Thanks, adoring thanks be to thee, O Father! for the comfort Jesus gives to the mourning mother—that makes her realize that her babe was taken from her that it might be made what she often called it—a blessed angel!

I will not lead you to more illustrations in detail of my theme, but plead of you to think—to think of her who has sat in patient sorrow over against the sepulchre of her hopes—the sea! The white sail, like a dove in the blue air, comes not to bless her vision and make her heart glad. He has ceased to brave the winds, and wrestle with danger. The waters have become his winding sheet. The farewell will no more be said—the departing sailor no more cheered from shore—the meeting no more enjoyed on earth; but if she love Jesus, she will learn of a world where 'there is no more sea'—where such partings, sorrows and trials, as she and the dead have known, come not, and where love is fed by everlasting joy. I plead also of you, to think of the sister, and her for whom the bridal wreath was woven, who sit over against the sepulchres of hopes that made the beauty of life; and as you think of the many Marys that weep, own the worth of christianity, confess its divine virtues, and adore the beneficence of Him who bestowed the inestimable treasure.

Thine, O woman! is a noble mission. Life may have noble objects, and thine may be an estimable character. In your keeping are the means for contributing to the daily and hourly happiness of others, of influencing and moulding the general manners of society, of breathing a purer and nobler morality into the community, and of affecting the whole being of the rising generation by early impressions. Thou art called 'weak,' but it is only by those who do not know thy strength—for thy strength is great. Confess it to thy own heart, and use it as Jesus directs thee, in the fear of God and by the spirit of love. Thine then shall be noble conquests. In thy soul shall reign a power to make thee true, unfalteringly, to love! Thou wilt live for Jesus in living for the highest and best good of those around thee; and with a true faith thine eye will be ever open to see, what Jesus promised Martha she should behold—the glory of God.

Romance of Woman. No. 7.

THE GRAVE OF ISABELLA.

IN the last will of Isabella of Castile, she expressed a wish to be buried in the Alhambra, 'in a low sepulchre, without any monument.'

Mrs. Jamieson's Female Sovereigns.

THE Moor had passed from Granada's halls—
The cry of the Prophet had left her walls,—
For the silver clarions of Old Castile
Had swelled a longer and louder peal.

The Alhambra stood in its pride and power,
Surmounted with many a strong old tower;
But the Moorish Crescent had given place
To the glittering Cross of a stronger race.

* * * * *

What do they there in that home of kings?—
The stroke of a spade through the palace rings—
In the marble court, where the lime-boughs wave,
They hollow the earth for a lowly grave.

She cometh to rest—that beautiful Star
Whose rays glanced over the waves afar,
And scattered a dim, but a startling light
On a new, rich WORLD in the realms of night!

She cometh to rest; but no stately tomb
Shall mock her dust with its splendid gloom;
The fragrant flower from the bending tree,
The only mark on her grave shall be.

Yet over her bed shall the massive towers
Their shadows cast through the moonlight hours;
A gorgeous tomb to the vanished reign
Of the Moorish kings in the land of Spain.

Then build no pile o'er her lowly grave—
Her monument lies on the western wave;
All silently here, where her sorrows cease,
Leave the dust, alone, of the Queen of Peace.*

* Her people bestowed on her this beautiful designation, 'Isabella of peace and goodness.'

Rural Rambles. No. 4.

BY MISS L. A. PEABODY.

THE BLUSH ROSE.

'You have chosen a sad spot for our resting place, after such a fine ramble as we have had through the dark old woods; and such a pleasant morning too!' said my youthful companion, as we emerged from a narrow path which wound its way through an umbrageous forest. It was a haunt I loved, that lone, woodland path,—for I had been a frequenter of its solitudes from my very childhood; and I remember, as it were but yesterday, my accustomed wanderings to that shady retreat, from the time when the purple anemone and its paler sisters, with the lowly arbutus, one of the fairest and sweetest of spring's daughters,—the meek violet and modest innocence, and many others of those fair forest and brook-side fairies, who are the first to lift their modest heads to greet the approach of Spring; and almost daily were my visits repeated the long summer through, when the trees wore their fair, green robes, even till chilling blasts had stript them of their more gorgeous drapery, and the humble fall-flower had faded from the earth.

There was a small recess or natural arbor by that path-side, in my younger days, which the hand of the woodman has since destroyed, and which I then deemed the most beautiful spot on earth. It was formed by several trees, at almost the same distance from each other, in nearly a circle, their branches meeting and interlacing above, and young saplings and small shrubs growing round their trunks. A wild grape-vine had sprung up near the roots of one of the trees, and spreading its slender vines from one tree to another, clasped its delicate tendrils round their branches, and formed a screen almost impervious to the rays of the sun. The wild-wood rose and the honey-suckle, with a profusion of beautiful flowers, were grouped around in small clusters; and I remember how I used to gather them in my apron, and carry them into this little vine-covered retreat, then, seating myself upon the seat of rocks which I had raised, I talked to them as though they were animate and rational beings, calling them by such tender epithets as I was wont to bestow upon the favorites of my childish plays. It seemed a holy place,—that wild bower, and I sometimes thought that angels visited it; and I deemed the low sighing of the winds through the pines, the murmuring of the brook, and the sweet singing of birds, the music of their 'golden harps.'

Pardon this digression, gentle reader! I will not longer weary your patience with the details of my childish fancies; it is enough that those loved scenes of my childhood once existed, but with time have passed away. And let us now take a view of the spot to which we first directed our steps, after leaving the wood-path, and which my friend designated as 'a sad spot for our resting place.' It was a small tract of land enclosed by a neat and simple railing of triangular form—a place consecrated and set apart by our villagers a few years since, as a holy place wherein to lay their dead.

'You call this a sad place, my dear Sarah,' I said, 'but to me 'tis a loved retreat. Around it clusters the most holy and beautiful associations,—for here,' I added as we approached a low mound,—'rests one of the brightest ornaments of earth—the glorious temple of a meek and holy spirit.'

'She was about four years older than myself,' said Sarah, 'her age is inscribed sixteen, upon the marble.'

'Yes, she passed from earth with her young and trusting heart, even as the bursting rose-bud, which is culled because it is fairer and sweeter than the full-blown flower. And I deem it meet that the beautiful and good should thus be called away in the spring-time of their existence, ere they have learned the sin and selfishness of mankind.'

'Was she beautiful?'

'Yes, she was beautiful and good; and the very image of her mind's loveliness was painted on her fine countenance. Hers was a broad and intellectual forehead, and a neck of exquisite symmetry, white as the pure snow wreaths. Her fair brown hair fell in long wavy curls over her neck, and there was a slight tinge upon her cheek, which reminded us of one of the most beautiful of flowers—the blush-rose, by which name she was often called amongst the villagers, who almost idolized her.'

'Was she a playmate of yours? dear A.,' inquired my companion.

'Yes, we occupied seats beside each other at school, and as our homes were but a short distance apart, we were almost always sharers in each other's sports. Sweet Ellen Frances! I can see her now, as she stood in the midst of her young companions, with a kind word and cheerful smile for all; and they were valued by all as angel favors.

'Memory is still busy, and I see her again,—but oh, how changed! She is lying upon her couch; the mild zephyrs of a June morning are bearing in to the fair invalid, through the open window, the sweet fragrance of the roses which are blossoming before it. The marble whiteness of her neck and face, is only rivalled by the snowy robe which envelopes her fragile form, while her clustering hair, which is parted on her brow, falls loosely over her shoulders. The soft lids gently unclose and reveal their beautiful treasures—large, deep blue eyes, gentle and expressive; a faint smile dimples around her mouth, and gentle murmurs come from her lips, like the thrilling music from a spirit-harp.

Father! I'll speak first to you, said the dying girl, for you have been a strong and faithful guide to me in my earthly pilgrimage, which, though short, has been one of happiness. I am conscious that my departure to 'the better land' draws near, and I would receive the forgiveness of my dear friends, for all waywardness and unkindness of which I have been guilty; for I know that my imperfections have been far too many for one who has had such kind advisers, as it has been my happiness to have. Do not distress yourselves, my dear parents, for I am happy, and feel willing to leave this world, for our Savior has given us the promise of a glorious immortality.

Mother! but a few words, for my life is fast ebbing away. Forgive me, dear mother, for all the grief I have occasioned you; kiss me, and bless me. And dear Julia, do not grieve so; your poor sister will soon be freed from all her pain and sickness. And I love the thought which long has cheered me, that I shall be a guardian angel to the dear friends whom I shall leave behind me. Weep not, my dear mother and gentle sister, for I am happy.

And you, my dear friend, (she added, addressing herself to me, as I stood sobbing as if my very heart would break) you, my dear friend, it may be, are destined to live many years after I shall be laid in the tomb. And oh, strive to live a holy and blameless life, and the high and holy One will be with you. Now farewell all. I shall soon cease to breathe, yet never forget a spirit's love is with you. And—'

The words died away upon her lips; and further than this, I have but little recollection, for the excess of my grief was so great, as almost to deprive me of the power of observing what afterwards transpired; yet this I know, that she passed away calmly, even as an infant falls to sleep upon its mother's breast.

The sun was getting high in the heavens, and when we rose to return homeward, my companion had ceased to think the burial place of my early friend, 'a sad spot,' so strangely does sympathy cause the shades and obscurities to disappear from a scene, and so quickly will she invest it in the most beautiful and fascinating coloring which it is in the power of the imagination to afford. We retraced our steps through the woodland path, and as we discoursed still further of the lovely Ellen Frances B., the prayer rose involuntarily to my lips, that my future life might be as pure and blameless as hers.

LOVE. LONG-SUFFERING. . FAITH.

PEACE. GOODNESS. TEMPERANCE.

LOVE. I came the first of a radiant band,
Sent out on the earth by God's own hand;
I came, e'er the breath of life was given,
To him who was made i' the image of Heaven.
But darkness rose, and the serpent's breath
On the garden fell, with the scourge of death!
Our band was broken—and since that hour,
We've met no more as in Eden's bower.
Our meetings are short, and we find no home,
But apart o'er the world our spirits roam,
And the spirit of love is oft-times lone.

JOY. Not now alone—thy sister is here,
The next, who came to this mortal sphere.
We meet not oft—the last was where
Two hearts were pledged with vow and prayer;
I tarried not long, I might not stay,
When light and hope were passing away!
How long dost thou thy vigil keep,
With hearts that mourn, and eyes that weep?
